Douglas county held a school of methods at Lawrence, where they discussed "Purity in Literature and Art," "The L. T. L.," "Industrial Education," "Work Among Colored People" and "College and Social Settlements."

Atchison county convened at Cummings. Only two of the five unions were represented, but those present were much encouraged by the reports, and felt that it was indeed "good to be there." Mrs. Greenlee invited the delegates to her house for dinner, and the afternoon exercises were held at her hospitable home. Rev. Mr. Harlin gave the address of the evening. One new union was reported organized.

Lyon county union met in Emporia; five unions reported. Special attention was given to the peace department, Sabbath observance and L. T. L. The death angel has borne away two members of the Americus union and one from Neosho Rapids.

Franklin county held a school of methods at Princeton, conducted by Mrs. Jessie Maxey, state corresponding secretary. The usual reports were read, and several departments were discussed. President Smith was present to give a word of counsel and instruction at any and all times, adding interest to the meeting in many ways. A question-box and a "model local union" comprised the afternoon program. If all local unions were such "models," we would indeed be a "model" organization. President Smith was the speaker of the evening.

The state executive committee met at Clay Center for its semi-annual session. Many phases of our work were discussed. The treasurer's report showed a slight falling off in dues as compared to previous years, owing in great measure to the extreme hard times in the western part of the state, and although our yearly dues are one dollar per member—with no further assessments—it was voted to give the unions of the more prosperous portions of the state an opportunity to contribute something toward paying the dues of our Western sisters. It is hoped that numbers will respond. Money may be sent to the state treasurer, Mrs. Ella W. Brown, of Holton, or, if desired, she will, upon inquiry, give information as to unions unable to pay.

Mrs. M. C. Gillette was appointed superintendent of parlor meetings, Mrs. Hutchinson, superintendent of fairs. It was decided to hold the next annual convention at Hutchinson, and that Miss Willard be urgently invited to be present. But comparatively few of her constituency west of the Mississippi river have ever been so favored as to look upon her face, although her "speaking" likeness hangs on many walls.

Our president has been "swinging around the circle" so to speak, and like President Johnson she "left the constitution" of the W. C. T. U. wherever she made a stop. She reports a renewed interest all along our lines, in the work of the W. C. T. U., new unions organized and old ones being strengthened and built up.

Kansas has recently been favored with a visit from Miss Clara Parrish, National Y organizer. Her stay among us, though brief, was a blessing wherever she was called, highest words of commendation are expressed concerning her work, and we would be very glad to have her return in the near future.

At the spring conferences of the M. E. church, Mrs. Hartough, state recording secretary, represented the W. C. T. U. at the Kansas conference, and Rev. E. F. St. John bore our fraternal greetings to the South Kansas conference, Mrs. Hutchinson, president seventh district, and Mrs. Carson, president sixth district, to the other two conferences of the state; Mrs. Kemp, president third district, to the yearly meeting of the Friends at Lawrence; President Smith to the annual meeting of the Christian church held at Ottawa, and Mrs. Julia A. Chase to the annual encampment of the G. A. R. Sons of Veterans, W. R. C. and Ladies' G. A. R.

A line from our state president says: "There is a general interest manifested along almost every line of our work; throughout the entire state, and district and county leaders are making every effort to secure their quota of new members which shall bring a total membership to the state of two thousand this year. Notwithstanding the hard times the work moves on, and by this bringing to our ranks the impulse of new, vitalized blood will in the end make the resubmission of our prohibitory law impossible. Kansas W. C. T. U. is in good working condition."

The two Chautauqua assemblies convene this month and we have a prominent place on the program of each.

NEW JERSEY.

OUTLOOK HOPEFUL.

Delegations of ladies were at the state house in Trenton last week, and again this week, urging the legislature to pass a bill to amend the constitution so as to allow women to have voice in management of the public schools of New Jersey, the women of twenty-eight other states already enjoying that privilege. Mrs. Florence Howe Hall, of Plainfield, acted as spokeswoman, and with her were ladies from that place, Newark, Orange, Belleville, Westfield, Jersey City, Bayonne, Ocean Grove, Elizabeth and Trenton.

The judiciary committee of the senate and house gave them hearings, and they presented petitions which had been circulated by members of the W. C. T. U., the Grange women's clubs and other societies. These petitions contained the names of nearly 3,500 men and women, that had been sent from every county in the state. Several senators expressed themselves as heartily in favor of the measure. As the joint resolution passed the senate on the 12th inst., it only gave the right to woman in the country districts to vote for school trustees, and left their city sisters no say at all in school affairs. This would give back to the women of the state the right they had exercised since 1888, until the supreme court last November declared it unconstitutional. On June 13, just before the close of the session, the house passed the bill with but one dissenting vote. It must again pass both houses next winter, and then be submitted to the voters in the fall of 1896. All who are interested in the cause of temperance instruction in the schools must wish success to this movement.

Our state president is greatly encouraged by the organization of new unions. We have had twelve added this year, and four Y's thus far. With persevering effort we could have the number doubled before the year closes.

Our state convention at Paterson, in October, will open more fields in the upper part of New Jersey. This meeting has already been announced and homes provided for one hundred and eighteen delegates in addition to seventy-five who will be entertained at Passaic. All committees have been appointed and are at work. It is hoped that every union in the state will be represented. The semi-annual conventions all over the state have been held with marked success, and increasing numbers of those interested in the cause who have hitherto been indifferent. Morris county held their meeting on May 3, at Boonton. The Presbyterian chapel opened wide its doors to about fifty delegates. One interesting feature of this convention was the presentation of a "Life Membership Certificate" to our county president, Mrs. Earl C. Greenman, a plan devised to cancel the debt on Rest Cottage at the Waverly fair grounds. Morris county's wise example is being followed by others.

Crusade Day was generally kept. Temperance lessons are taught in the Sunday-schools throughout the state. Public school teachers are faithful along this line.

Whoever writes a line which helps a struggling soul to evercome appetite and to get nearer to God does a work which will live forever.

VICTORIES FOR WOMEN.

Our county conventions have followed each other in systematic succession from the adjournment of the legislature up to date, keeping Mrs. Peet, the state president, in something like perpetual motion attending them; and there are yet more to follow. Their regularity of arrangement shows increasing thoroughness of organization. All along the line there exists a healthy activity. We have not been gratified with increase of numbers so much as by deepened interest and more intelligent appreciation of our work.

Comparatively few changes have taken place among the leaders. Now and then one retires from some conspicuous post, only often enough to teach us that new workers will always be raised up to fill every necessary place. We welcome among us Mrs. U. J. Croake, a worker from Washington. She is already appropriated as president of Alameda county, one of our most important counties, having thirteen local unions. In the city of Oakland, the county seat and the Pacific coast Athens, a lively fight for Sunday closing of saloons has been going on for some time. The people petitioned the city council and when the matter could by no device be any longer deferred, the time was set for hearing on Wednesday night when "all the cranks would be safe in prayer-meetings." A W. C. T. U. woman heard of that appointment and forthwith proceeded to notify the various pastors of the point. The consequence was that the prayer-meetings for that week were held on another night and the "cranks" were out in force at the city hall, which could not contain them, so a mass-meeting was held on the steps. The battle still wages; the rummies appearing to have gained some little temporary advantage in the council, while the "cranks" have been doing good permanent work in the manufacture of public sentiment, which will tell at the next election.

The local option law of this state was considerably strengthened by our last legislature. Under its provisions sanitary districts may be organized anywhere, under conditions making it possible to prevent a liquor license from being issued within their limits. Sanitary districts are being organized now in Santa Clara county for that object, and will shortly be followed by others.

How we prayed for the schemes of that last legislature to be confounded, and most gratefully and reverently we acknowledge the answer to our prayers. It quite recalls the story of the good people who met together and prayed for rain, and when the rain came in copious floods some weak brother complained that "those Methodists always would overdo a thing." So the legislature gave us more than we had expected. We asked for a law to give women the ballot, and they gave us a constitutional amendment to be voted on in 1896, undoubtedly expecting to kill the question by that means, but affording the most magnificent opportunity and duty of an educational campaign.

There being five states in the same position, the suffrage question must take immediate precedence in all of them, and it will not be amiss to tell how some good workers have been trained for it here. In presenting Miss Severance's "Extra Session," a gentleman totally indifferent to the matter was invited to take a part. This reversal of conditions impressed him as the strongest possible argument, and he has become a real missionary in the good work he is doing for the cause. Others have done the same. Try it.

The woman's congress recently held in this city has popularized equal suffrage wonderfully. San Francisco never saw anything like it before. Susan B. Anthony and Anna Shaw were the lions. In dramatic parlance, they drew full houses, and many who came to see these distinguished women were amazed to find other women talking as well as they. The congress was the fashion. The largest church in the city could not hold it; nine hundred people were counted standing through one of Miss Shaws' addresses. It was a suffrage convention throughout, and at its conclusion a suffrage amendment association was organized with Mrs. Sarah B. Cooper, the president of the congress, at its head.

For the first time in this city women have been asked to serve on the committees for the celebration of Independence Day. It was probably expected that they would shrink from such duties; there may have been shrinking, but there was no shirking. They are doing excellent service which seems to be appreciated. However, the gallantry of the literary committee was tested when the women demanded a woman speaker for the Fourth of July; some conservative gentlemen nearly choked, but they took the dose, and Anna Shaw will be on the program of the glorious Fourth in San Francisco. What next?

SUNDAY-SCHOOL DEPARTMENT.

Dear Sisters:—The third quarterly temperance lesson appears July 21 in the regular International Lesson Series. We desire that the special effort of Sunday-school workers on that day may be the distribution of well selected temperance literature. We have sent state workers sample leaflets and papers, including the June issue of The Young Crusader, with its valuable supplement for use in connection with the quarterly temperance lesson. This leaflet will be especially helpful to teachers, and is suitable for general distribution. Do not fail to order in large quantities.

We recommend the use of our department leaflets: "In Sunday-school Twenty Years Ago," No. 131, and "Mary Jane," No. 132. Price 15 cents per 100. "Daniel and His Friend" and "The Bible on Temperance" can be secured of Mrs. Julia A. Bidwell, Chittenango, N. Y. Price 25 cents per 100.

Give to Sunday-school teachers and superintendents National Leaflet Nos. 20 and 21, price 90 cents per 100. For pastors and parents National Leaflet No. 53 is good. "Picture Leaflets" and "Our Little Folks" are very desirable for use in the primary department, price $1 per 1,000. "Loyal Leaflets" for the intermediate classes, price 50 cents per 100. "Gospel Lights" and "Signal Lights" are suitable for general use in mass-meetings or placing in church pews, price 15 cents per 100.

Secure a W. T. P. A. catalogue at once and make other good selections from our abundant supply of literature. Let us value our opportunity of sending seed-thoughts into the home. The children are willing messengers. We urge, also, that pledge work may be done and Sunday-school rallies held on the coming temperance Sunday. Send stamp to National superintendent for sample copy of "Rally" Program. Our year is drawing to a close. Already encouraging reports are coming in concerning the effort for a universal temperance Sunday.

We especially ask that on temperance Sunday the following resolution may be presented for signatures to pastors and Sunday-school superintendents everywhere. To this end we invite the coöperation of all unions whether engaged in Sunday-school work or not. Aid us in spreading this thought and opening the way for a glorious celebration of November 24, of this year.

Whereas, The honorable secretary, Charles Waters, of London School union, has presented a plan for the co-operation of all Christians in temperance work, by the universal observance of the fourth Sunday of November in each year as Temperance Sunday, and

Whereas, This plan is heartily indorsed by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and many prominent Christian workers, and commends itself to every lover of gospel temperance, therefore,

Resolved, That we hereby indorse the above plan and pledge ourselves to seek its adoption.

Please report results of all work done to your respective state superintendents or to the National superintendent of Sunday-school department.

Yours in service,
Stella B. Irvine,

LOYAL TEMPERANCE LEGION.

NEW HELPS.

The past few months have been a transition time, not only in regard to badges (to which a recent official column has called attention) but also in regard to some other L. T. L. supplies. Owing to the fact some superintendents have been unable to obtain certain kinds of seals or other articles ordered from the W. T. P. A., we are glad to announce that the following supplies are now ready for your orders:

JUNIOR CERTIFICATES FOR SEALS.

The Juniors now have the privilege of securing the seals for volumes III and II of the Temperance Lesson Manuals by passing satisfactory examinations upon these Manuals. The certificates, which are of cardboard in size suitable for framing, are prepared separately for above volumes of the Manuals, so that care must be taken in ordering to state for which volume the certificates and seals are required. These seals will be duplicated on the diploma when that is secured later in the Senior grade. The seals mentioned above can, of course, be won after the diploma is secured if not earned before; but we earnestly urge our superintendents to set before the wide-awake Juniors this opportunity for securing the certificates and seals. Let us show the W. T. P. A. that there is really a demand for these certificates which they have kindly furnished at the request of the L. T. L. conference of state superintendents. The certificates can be procured at the rate of two for five cents; the seals at five cents per dozen net.

DIPLOMAS.

We can now offer to our graduates a diploma of size, material and embellishment more in keeping with their age and attainments. This diploma is of cardboard, eleven by fourteen inches for framing, and is sent out by the W. T. P. A. only on the order of a state L. T. L. superintendent. Only pledged Seniors (those of twelve years old and upwards) can receive the diploma. The price is ten cents for a single diploma; ten or more at five cents each, net.

NEW PLANS FOR THE L. T. L.

A revised edition of the leaflets has just been issued containing several changes, especially in the seals themselves. Each L. T. L. superintendent should be supplied with this leaflet which gives a definite description of the diploma course of study and of each one of the many seal courses. The price is for single copy, three cents; ten copies, twenty-five cents; one hundred copies, two dollars. No discount can be allowed, as this simply covers the cost of leaflet and postage.

CATALOGUE.

A new catalogue of L. T. L. supplies is now ready, and can be obtained from the W. T. P. A. for the cost of postage. No superintendent is equipped for her work without this catalogue for constant reference.

We wish to make public acknowledgment of the great kindness and patience of the W. T. P. A. officials in the many perplexities incident to the bringing about of these changes, simple as they seem.

Helen G. Rice, Nat. Supt.

Cor. Secy's Notes.

So many letters of inquiry as to why I did not go to the World's Convention, and so many expressing surprise at the fact, have come from the sisters everywhere, that "I rise to explain" from my point of vantage in this column. It certainly is not through lack of interest in the great meetings, dear sisters, that I find myself to-day sweltering in Chicago, instead of drinking in the glories of Switzerland. I wanted very much to go at the outset, but two obstacles stood directly in the way. Later, when it seemed possible that one might be removed, my plans had become so matured that I could not go without giving up much that I felt was for the best interests of the work here. In fact, from the beginning, the second obstacle was my feeling that I ought to remain at my post. I confess a feeling of regret has come to me occasionally, especially when yesterday the first letters from the wayfarers were received, giving such glowing accounts of the voyage, and the delights they were enjoying. Nevertheless, I comforted myself with the thought that there is always a next time, and that when that next time comes, I shall plume my flight for far-off shores.

It is good to know that the Convention has been such a wonderful success. Its impetus cannot fail to be felt the world around; not less in our own country because the methods of work are better known here. Rather, it seems to me, that in proportion to their knowledge, our delegates must return with new enthusiasm and new vigor. You will be glad to know that of the four who left us from the Temple, Mrs. Barker, Mrs. Grow, Miss Stewart and Mrs. Edholm, not one was ill an hour on the outward voyage. Whether or not such good fortune awaits them on their return, it is difficult to tell. We will hope that it may.

Surely all good things come to the Temple at one time or another, and it was a special delight to welcome yesterday the president of the Christian Endeavor Society of New South Wales, Rev. Closs, who was on his way to the Boston convention, to return almost immediately thereafter to his faraway home. He gives a good account not only of the Christian Endeavor work in his country, but of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union as well, with which he is in hearty sympathy. One of the last things he did before leaving South Wales was to make an address before the union there, in which he spoke strongly on the question of woman's suffrage. We predict for our brother that he will be quite the lion at the Boston convention, unless there be other delegates from as great a distance to share the honors with him. How small the world is growing in these days, and how truly a common purpose makes all lands one.

A recent visitor from a shorter distance, but one no less welcome, has been the husband of our dear Mrs. Woodbridge, who is in Chicago for a few days on business connected with the bringing out of her biography. I am sure the white ribbon sisters need only to know that such a book is to be issued to insure its ready sale among them. It is being published by the W. T. P. A., and orders can be sent either to them, or to Mr. F. W. Woodbridge, Ravenna, O. The book has been written by Mrs. Woodbridge's old pastor, Rev. Mr. Hills, and is a most loving tribute to her personal worth, as well as her many-sided ability. It will have a prominent place in W. C. T. U. literature, and will also be invaluable from a historic standpoint, because it contains much concerning the beginnings of our work and many of Mrs. Woodbridge's best addresses. Mary A. Woodbridge has never ceased to speak through the W. C. T. U., and, by means of this book, she will speak more loudly, and come more closely to our hearts.

Mrs. McWhirter, the bright little treasurer of Indiana, evolved some time ago a plan for high school contests on the effects of intemperance. She issued a circular giving directions, which has been sent out quite largely through her own state, and as a result several schools have held these contests, offering prizes, and a great interest has been awakened in these places upon the subject. Mrs. McWhirter, I am sure, will be very glad to answer any questions you may care to ask concerning the best methods of carrying on this work. Perhaps this is just the entering wedge which is so much needed in places where it seems so hard to arouse an interest in temperance work. I quote from a letter recently received on this subject: "This is the first time I ever knew the W. C. T. U. in this place to get up anything that the people were enough interested in to make a subject of conversation. This is on the lips of every one."

I have no question that monopoly, suffrage, franchises, money, labor, etc., will become—are becoming—moral and religious issues. They have already, perhaps, to many, but as yet knowledge is insufficient for an appeal to the average conscience which is the ultimate arbiter of politics. Every great question but one, before the country is, by reason of deficient debate or lack of agreement within the parties, hopelessly remitted to the domain of trickery and partyism where conscience never enters, and where statesmanship is contortion, although every one of those questions is worthy; and, as yet, knowledge and conscience are together as to but one issue. The voice of the Church has declared for but one thing in politics, and that is the suppression of the alcoholic beverage traffic. To be consistent as Christians or practical as politicians we ought to deal with that matter without delay.

of Christian statesmanship to-day, is to effect a union of independent voters at prohibition while allowing each voter to preserve a manly, honest and sensible attitude to other questions, and without asking other reforms to "side-track" for this of ours. Lack of time compels me to speak my thought very incompletely, but the whole logic of the situation impels me to the conclusion that Prohibitionists must unite about prohibition, while as to other things they agree to differ. At present we are practically at war about the only thing we agree upon, because we disagree as to the something else. That is babyish.

And again, every other question before the country must wait on legislation, while prohibition laws abound, that wait only for enforcement. It is perhaps unfortunate, but now inevitable, that politics should be done by political parties, and I venture the opinion that it is a misfortune that party organizations should not be more permanent than ours are. The two great parties have magnificent organization and honorable names—and these ought to have a value, although I frankly confess that if I had the casting vote, I should permit them to be sacrificed upon their country's altar, so that we could start anew. Both arose from impulses of patriotism, not yet wholly lost, but far spent, and both have failed of their ideals by reason of three causes:

First, The seductions of partyism; Druidical idolatry and human sacrifice have survived to this day as partyism, churchism, sectism. The fatal and almost invincible malady of leadership is machine worship. My own party, which next to that of the old abolitionists is the noblest specimen of party-hood the new world has ever seen, is not exempt from the disease, but in its splendid pioneering of this cause it has been so wronged, insulted, lied on, that although it has been almost divinely true, it has suffered in its disposition, and like some scarred and powder-burned veteran, hates too well, and sometimes sees enemies where there are none. And while it has been simply magnificent in the bravery and justice of its criticism of the old parties, it has by pure stress of the struggle for existence drifted straight into partyism itself, and is water-logged there to-day, and many a local effort toward the right suffers defeat nowadays because our people sacrifice it to what is thought to be the interest of the national Prohibition party. We ought to be able where conscience is involved to rise above partyism.

The second disease of parties—which is a secondary form of the first—is fatty degeneration by "spoils." Success kills them exactly as indulgence kills other decadents. It would save time, trouble and heartache if we could discover or invent a surgery and diet for that.

It is generally believed that it would kill the saloon to take the money out of it. I think it would kill partyism to TAKE THE SPOILS OUT OF IT.

But how? The answer is to be found in the very preamble of our Constitution and in the apportionment of governmental power among three equal and independent branches—Legislative, Executive and Judicial. The Constitution begins: "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare and secure the blessings of liberty," then follows the provision that the Legislature shall make the laws, the Executive enforce them and the Judiciary settle disputes about them. The spoils system appertains mainly to the administrative function. It seems to me that not only the triumph of reforms, but also, the stability of the government depends upon a readjustment of political action so that Christian men may get together as to things agreed on and secure enforcement of laws already enacted without abandoning other honorable labors, or delaying the passage of other laws by disagreeing where they do not differ.

The third infirmity of parties is the policy of trying to maintain the parity of unequal things. Reforms that are ripe for victory are ununitable upon an equal footing an when moral reforms go forward with those that are purely or primarily politic or economic, righteousness gets left behind. Look at the parties now. It is a very dreary prospect that opens to them for the coming year. A very large per cent of each of them is ready for prohibition on grounds of principle, enough in the aggregate to win it and enforce it, too, but the righteousness of prohibition must wait on the policy of money, although no party has a policy upon money. This is political palsy.

Now, I am ready to open my plan to you. It is that we combine politically in the name of Jesus Christ, the Conqueror, and form of Independent voters whose entire scope shall be the head of the ticket, in federal, state, judicial and municipal elections.

That is to say, we will leave all other questions, for the present, to be dealt with by the general patriotism of the country as they shall be presented and fought to the front in legislation by the several parties, and we will remain in or leave our parties as we may be advised or feel constrained, but we will stand together like a wall for prohibition, and to that end will, First: Secure enforcement of prohibitory law so far as it exists. Second: Reform the Civil Service. Third: Inform the legislatures of our demands, authoritatively. Fourth: Suppress the entire traffic in alcoholic beverages, and put the sale of alcoholic liquors for lawful purposes into the hands of Federal Government. The strategic point, in view of all these things — educationally, politically and religiously—is the administrative branch of the governments. We must capture that or fail. With that taken success will be swift and sure. The only remaining argument of our enemies is that, "Prohibition does not prohibit." Well, let us make it prohibit, and new prohibitory legislation will scarcely need a champion. Let us make the "White House" the clean house and the president a Godlike man instead of a foxy partisan. And let the onward upward majesty of a Christian executive stand for law, for honor, for God and drag the diurnal spites and cheats and spoils toward the good.

The next secular division of voters is to be about money. Very well, let that and tariff and suffrage and the rest fight their fight for congressmen, and in Congress, and we Christian Democrats, Republicans, Populists and Prohibitionists each in his party, take a hand and do his best to elevate the party ideals and improve the personnel of legislatures. But as to president, governors, sheriffs, judges, mayors and the like, we will know nothing of old party lines but upon a basis of take the executive and judiciary for the united people, to enforce and perfect the legislation already obtained and secure more in orderly, dignified and authoritative ways. This means that in 1896 Christian men shall take the field with a union ticket for presidential electors and that hereafter in the states, counties and cities as rapidly as we can organize ourselves, we shall unite on candidates for governor, mayor, sheriff and judge or justice where elective, always on a simple platform declaring for enforcement of law, reform of the civil service, and the information of legislatures as to the state of the country or the jurisdiction, whatever it may be, the suppression of the beverage liquor traffic but not touching other legislative matters or legislative candidates. If the parties see we are in dead earnest, one or more of them will be glad to nominate our executive candidates in the hope of winning us to their legislative ones, —or if each party has its nominee, yet—in any case a man may vote a Republican ticket and be true to his church, or a Democratic ticket and not sacrifice his convictions, or a Prohibition ticket and not renounce his opinions about other things.

The Federal Constitution provides that the president shall be commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States and of the state militia when in actual service of the government; that he may require the opinion in writing of the head of any executive department upon any subject relating to his office; that he shall have the appointing power of ambassadors, public ministers, consuls, judges of the Federal Courts and practically all officers; that he shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union and recommend such measures as he shall deem necessary and expedient. Give us a brave executive pledged to prohibition and it would mean a sober army and navy, the suppression of canteens and Soldiers' Home saloons, prohibition in Alaska and the unorganized territories and in the Civil Service. It would mean Prohibitionists for cabinet ministers and Federal judges, and a practical by means of executive messages—all this without any new legislation.

I cannot now follow out the thought in detail, no man's mind is big enough to calculate the multiplying forces to accrue to lines of righteous, civil conduct. But this would put an end to the spectacle of a president drowned in the party pool and even after being rolled upon a barrel of Scotch whisky still so unconscious of the state of the country as to gurgle about car couplers and overlook the liquor traffic. Our secretary of state will never issue beer literature through the federal consulates. Our commissioner of internal revenue will never make an address of welcome to the brewers' congress. Our president will never pardon convicted saloonkeepers for party reasons. Our vice-president will never appoint whisky senators upon the temperance committee. Congress will not ignore our petitions when the President presents them.

And in the case of cities, imagine a mayor, pledged to enforcement of law, civil service and prohibition. His first order would appoint an honest chief-of-police and patrolmen to match. The council would grant license for a saloon. The mayor would refuse to issue it or sign it. Mandamus would be had to compel him, but backed by a united church and stayed by a high purpose he would carry the matter to the United States supreme court, and I predict that when some brave and honest man stands in that court with a great lawyer to speak for him, and says: "It is against union; it is against justice; it is against domestic tranquillity; it is against the common defense; it is against the general welfare; it is against the blessings of liberty; it is against ourselves; it is against posterity;" the court will say: "It is also against the Constitution and the law;" and hell will enlarge itself to receive back its own. And the Church, honored for her clean hands, trusted for her truth and feared for her power, will swing forward in spiritual ways

A CYCLE IN AN HOUR.

This plan honors the Church, enforces the Sabbath, cleanses parties, reforms the civil service, the army and the navy; provides a general and local plebiscite upon conscience questions, respects minorities, obeys majorities, enforces law, and, while tending straight to prohibition, has the merit of great moderation. Every election will be a plebiscite, and when the people know what the people want they will find a way to get it. Imagine four Christian voters at the polls—a gold standard, high protection, prohibition Republican; a free trade, free silver, prohibition Democrat; a tariff reform, anti-woman suffrage, prohibition Populist; and an equal suffrage, tariff commission, prohibition Prohibitionist. Neither asks either anything, but each takes our executive paster, affixes it to his ticket, hands it to the judges of election, and remains a Republican, a Democrat, a Populist, a Prohibitionist, and best of all—a man. And lo! the church is in politics with four men and no quarrel instead of one man and three quarrels.

Do you object that this is a plan for a new political party? It is,—a new, clean party built on Jesus Christ, devoted to the executive of the voice of the people and the keeper of their judgment—and permanent whatever vicissitudes may overtake the other parties. Our ship of state is a side-wheeler with one wheel more or less continually out of order. We will repair them if we can, or unship them if we take the notion, but meantime rig a screw dead astern to help them both and keep the old craft on her way in any wind or any sea, with our pilot on the bridge. I should like to call it the Liberal party, for the condition of its being is that it be liberal to every honest opinion as well as true to its own.

Will it work? I don't know, but I hear the voice of all the centuries saying, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me."

Compositors are supposed to be able to decipher all kinds of handwriting, even that of editors and ministers. On this point Mr. Robert Clark, the Edinburgh printer, used to tell a story.

Prof. Lindsay Alexander came into our office one Friday with the manuscript of a sermon.

"You must let me have proofs of this to-morrow," he said.

I told him the time was too short. He must give us a few days longer.

"No," he said. "I must preach this sermon to-morrow. It is a special sermon. I wrote it ten years ago, and now I can't make out a word of it."

"I give it up; why is it, Jack?"
"Why it's in-secure, you goose."

"Why don't you ever write any poetry, Scribe?" asked a friend.

"I did write a poem once—an 'Ode to Oblivion.'"

"Indeed! What became of it?"

"It reached its destination."

The Princess of Wales, in her girlhood days, was taught to fashion her own gowns; trim her own bonnets and "do" her own laces. A pleasant story is told of her helpfulness:

The princess visited an old protégé of hers living in one of the cottages at Sandringham. The good dame was knitting a stocking, and the princess took it out of her hand, saying, "You can't do the heel as fast as I can." And she sat and chatted with the old lady, knitting the nattiest heel possible. It is needless to say that sacred stocking is treasured in a drawer with the needles just as the princess left them.

A lady, after correcting her little girl's pronunciation, said: "My dear, try not to talk so flat." That night the little one was found propped upright against the head of her bed, preparing to go to sleep. "Why is that, daughter?" asks the mother. "Mamma, I thought if I didn't lie flat I wouldn't talk flat."

The Estrangement of Young People from Christianity. Translated from the French of Eugene Bersier, by J. E. Rankin, D. D., LL.D., president of Howard University, Washington, D. C. Funk & Wagnalls Company, New York, London and Toronto. Price 50 cents.

This excellent address of Bersier's is in the nature of a confidential talk with young men and women brought up in the Protestant faith, but who have reached that crisis in their lives in which the teachings of childhood no longer carry conviction and in which they must pass in review before their own minds the claims made by old beliefs. Every young person, M. Bersier thinks, must encounter this experience, and with many it is the decisive experience of life. The objections to Christianity that then begin to occur are touched upon in this little book with a skillful hand and in a candid spirit.

Letters of Celia Thaxter. Who does not welcome glimpses of the personalities of noted people? And what reveals the personality in more charming abandon than letters written for but one person's reading. Celia Thaxter's letters are kaleidoscopical in their bright variations upon the "everydayness of life." Her pen glides easily, as her great nature moved, from a day's washing to the writing of a poem or the delight of a letter from Whittier; from the grandeur and terror of the sea to the calm joy of a woodbird's note; from the semi-comic experiences of a young mother with her bewildering brood to the dauntless facing of soul problems by one whose thought had matured in nature's own great freedom. "How I longed," she wrote, "to speak these things which made life so sweet,—to speak the wind, the cloud, the bird's flight, the sea's murmur,—and ever the wish grew." "And so it was she became, growing from and with this wish, a poet the world will remember."

The letters are edited by her friends whose names are not given.

THE INCOMPARABLE CHICAGO & ALTON.

In these United States of America at least, and it is highly probable that throughout the entire world, the official record for the safety and welfare of its passengers made and maintained by the Chicago & Alton Railroad cannot be surpassed, if indeed it can be equaled.

Over its completely rock-ballasted, dustless roadway between Chicago and Kansas City, Chicago and St. Louis and St. Louis and Kansas City, eighteen magnificently appointed express trains are run on uniformly fast time every day. But in spite of this heavy passenger traffic the official records show that from December 4, 1879, to December 4, 1890, eleven years, there was no passenger, who was in place as a passenger, killed on Chicago & Alton trains. Moreover there was not a passenger seriously injured, to the extent of losing a limb, an eye or a member of any kind during that time.

During the entire period of the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago, when it was not an uncommon thing to find the usual passenger traffic of the road increased two, three and four-fold, and special excursion trains and extra sections of regular trains were very many, there was not an accident of any kind—a most remarkable record.

Besides being America's most popular railroad, the Chicago & Alton is the Pioneer Dining Car Line, the Pioneer Pullman Sleeping Car Line, and the Pioneer Palace Reclining Chair Car Line.

Be sure that your ticket reads over the Chicago & Alton Railroad, when its matchless and direct lines can form the whole or even a part of your journey.

Among the new leaflets now in press are:

National Leaflet, No. 114, "How the Y. W. C. T. U. has Helped Me," being the testimony of fourteen young women concerning the influence of the Y. W. C. T. U. upon their lives. The names of those who have contributed to this symposium are well known leaders in Y work. We commend it for extensive circulation among our girls who are not yet white-ribboners. Y's should make it part of their business—and pleasure—during the summer vacation to scatter these leaflets broadcast among their girl friends.

Department Leaflet No. 78, "Walking in His Shadow," is reprinted by request from the writings of our promoted comrade, Lois Smith, and is a little leaflet full of gospel comfort.

Department Leaflet No. 92, "Enforcement of Law," is one whose subject matter should be thoughtfully and prayerfully considered by every local union. So far as we know Illinois is the only state which has a special department for the enforcement of law, and the writer of this leaflet, Mrs. Mary E. Metzgar, state superintendent, presents therein its raison d'être and shows its effectiveness as a part of W. C. T. U. work.

The little folks as well as the "grown-ups" of the L. T. L. will be delighted to know that a third volume of "Marching Songs" will soon be ready. Like Nos. 1 and 2, it is compiled by Miss Anna Gordon, and the long range at which most of the work has to be done necessarily makes the progress of the book somewhat slow. But it will be ready for the National Convention.

"The three copies of 'A Wheel Within a Wheel' received this morning," writes a worker. "Please send three more as promptly as possible. Am delighted with the book, and hope to dispose of many. It is all lovely—like the writer, and the pictures are so good!"

This word of encouragement comes from across seas: "We think your 'Thumb Nail Sketches' a beautiful book and most creditable to the editor and to the publishing house."

And it is useful as well as beautiful. If you are calling to your town any of our women who speak, write, organize or administrate for the society, it will be to the interest of the local union to send for this book and copy the sketch of the one whom they desire to introduce to the public, for use in the local press. It may interest our readers to know that among the first orders—an order which reached us before the completion of the book—was one from South Africa.

We call attention to our Purity Package, containing literature specially adapted for use in mothers' meetings and for the study of mothers at home. Also the Evangelistic Package, which includes publications very helpful to workers in this department and just what is needed for distribution at gospel meetings. Further information concerning these packages will be found in our advertising columns.

Have you read our W. T. P. A. coupon offer on page 1? If you have, read it again, cut it out and send to us promptly with your orders, remembering that during July and August you receive one dollar and ten cents for every dollar thus invested.

Organizers' Corner.

Since January 1 I have been almost constantly in the field, but my labors have been confined to New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Washington, D. C. I have given an illustrated address nearly every evening, besides speaking in fifty-seven public schools and fifteen Sunday-schools. Several W. C. T. U. and Sunday-school county conventions have invited me to give my method of making total abstinence teaching attractive as well as impressive, i. e., by chalk-talks.

I have organized thirteen Loyal Temperance Legions, several Senior grades, and have filled orders for thirty-six sets of my "Outline Charts," some of them going into Sunday-schools, Junior Endeavors and public schools to help others "chalk-talk." For the benefit of L. T. L. workers I will give some new methods and signs of encouragement I have gathered as I have conferred with the faithful workers and addressed thousands of bright boys and girls. I have found places where the different L. T. L. classes or platoons were meeting in the homes of their respective teachers three times in the month and the fourth week holding a general rally for reviewing, singing, practicing gymnastics, rallying cry and the different salutes. This method may help to solve the problem, "how to find superintendents," as it relieves them of much labor and works well.

I would suggest this question for every W. C. T. U. woman to ask herself prayerfully:

"Since I know God has called me to do Christian temperance work, and since so few of our Christian men and women will heed this call but will work in Sunday-schools and Endeavor Societies, is it not my first duty to do the temperance work among the children and organize a Loyal Temperance Legion?" More than one has caught a new idea in the above question, and said, "Yes, Lord, I will."

I have found the unions supporting live L. T. L's to be most active and successful in other lines of work, so give this recipe for restoring a dead or dying union—"organize an L. T. L."

Again I find where L. T. L's are languishing, it is usually because of ignorance of our advanced and attractive methods of work. It is where they do not take THE UNION SIGNAL, The Young Crusader or their state paper, and know little or nothing of our diploma plan or state L. T. L. organizations. My recipe for this is, every union should supply its L. T. L. superintendent and officers with these papers, the organizers' outfit from W. T. P. A., Mrs. Hunt's "School Physiology Journal" and a set of "outline charts" for chalk-talking if she cannot draw.

My meetings have varied in interest and attendance according to circumstances but when well arranged and advertised they have been most gratifying. In one town with a timid union, one wise, earnest woman took much of the responsibility upon herself of arranging, and the result was a well-filled opera house, two ministers to assist, the Catholic priest to preside, and quite a little sum added to the treasury with the probability of an L. T. L. later on.

July 7 I address a mass Sunday-school meeting in Schenectady, then go north to Saratoga, Washington, Warren and Franklin counties probably. Later I attend the New York state L. T. L. convention in Havana, and fill engagements in central New York, then to Long Island, New Jersey and Pennsylvania till the National Convention in Baltimore.

We are a small band of women in the country; have only ten members but are doing what we can "For God and Home and Humanity." May God bless you in your work. MRS. H. M. D.
Faribault, Minn.

In February the Y. W. C. T. U. of the University of Michigan sent a box with these words accompanying it: Hope this box may do some good. We want to show our interest if only by a small gift. If we can help in other ways we should like to hear from you. MARION OTIS.

DEAR MADAM:—Through THE UNION SIGNAL I learn that funds for the Temperance Hospital of Chicago are to be forwarded to you. Enclosed you will find—— to be thus applied.

I wish I could multiply it many times. I have known but little of the institution, but would like to inform myself of its history, methods and many matters pertaining to it for I am deeply interested in the banishment of alcoholic mixtures from the sick room. I have two dear boys, eleven and six years of age, who have never known the taste of anything that can intoxicate. Should I be obliged to call a physician for them there is not one within my reach that would not prescribe alcoholic compounds. My whole soul cries out against it—not for mine alone but for the victims on every hand. Oh, that we might have a crusade against intemperance everywhere.

Very truly yours in the white ribbon sisterhood, MRS. W. S. S.

DEAR SISTER:—Please accept my mite for the Temperance Hospital. I have a son in the hospital in L— being treated. I have worried for fear they may give him liquor to stimulate him. We are in hopes he will be well enough to come home soon. Praying that the time will soon come when the accursed stuff will be no more,

I remain yours,
A. M. O.

Let the sons and daughters be sent to the Temperance Hospital and stop this worrying. MATILDA E. KLINE.

Signal Notes.

THE average age of the Justices in the United States supreme court is sixty-two years.

AMERICA has two hundred and forty thousand saloons and five million Christian workers.

FIFTY cases of drunkenness in the police courts in one day indicate that Lynn, Mass., is enjoying the full result of her return to license.

A WHITE CROSS Society has been established in Mandalay, Burma, at the instigation of Rev. W. R. Winston, of the Wesleyan Mission. The members take upon themselves substantially the same obligations as in this country.

UNTIL a year ago it has been customary to serve punch at Harvard commencement celebrations. At that time all distilled liquors were forbidden at the class spreads and the same restriction enforced this year promises to become permanent.

SIX rulers in the eastern hemisphere are of youthful age: Alfonso, king of Spain, is eight years old; the king of Servia, eighteen; the Khedive of Egypt, twenty; the Emperor of China, twenty-three; the Czar of Russia, twenty-six, and the Queen of the Netherlands, fourteen.

THE universal scope of the Christian Endeavor Society will be strikingly manifested at the Friday night session of the Boston convention, when representatives from seventeen different countries will deliver addresses. Two hundred and fifty meetings will be held during the five days, and over one thousand addresses will be delivered. Fifty thousand young people are expected in attendance.

THE subject of public playgrounds for children in large cities is receiving more and more thoughtful consideration. The mayor of Philadelphia is actively interested in establishing them in the more densely crowded sections of that city. In Cincinnati it has been decided to furnish the Civic League with a list of lots on which gravel has been dumped, which may be used as playgrounds. They will also have sand piles in one part of Washington Park for the children.

AT a recent meeting of women in Cincinnati a league was formed for the purpose of systematic, advanced study of civic government. The league is composed of refined, cultured women who have not taken any active part in the suffrage movement, but being convinced that the time is soon coming when it will be their duty as well as their opportunity to vote they are not willing, as one of them said, "to add to the already too large list of ignorant or thoughtless voters."

A GREAT railroad corporation recently collected and tabulated all the facts pertaining to the men and conditions of every accident which occurred on its lines for five years. Forty per cent of all accidents were due altogether or in part to the failures of men who were drinking, beside eighteen per cent where there was every cause for suspicion of a similar condition. In one year, over a million dollars' worth of property was destroyed by the mistakes or irresponsibility of beer-drinking engineers and switchmen.

IT is difficult for American theological students who begin Hebrew on entering the seminary to obtain a working use of the Hebrew Bible. The advanced division in the Chicago Theological Seminary affords an opportunity to those who become connected with it to gain a mastery of the language. Sufficient preparation can be made by correspondence without expense to the applicant, in about two months of consecutive work. A prize of one hundred dollars is offered for the best paper, and fifty dollars is promised each of those who pass the written examination by answering seventy-five per cent of the questions. Two of the Fellows of Chicago Theological Seminary have taken their preparatory work in this department, also one of the professors in the seminary and one in the University of Chicago, both of whom are eminent scholars. It is the earnest effort of those who have the Old Testament department in charge that all students who undertake this advanced work may be able on graduation to study their Hebrew Bibles with pleasure and profit. The entrance examination occurs September 11 at 9 a. m. Address Samuel Ives Curtiss, 45 Warren Ave., Chicago.

The Dr. J. H. McLean Medicine Co.,
St. Louis, Mo.

Gentlemen: About three years ago, while working at my trade as blacksmith, I was taken down with Kidney disease. I suffered severely with pain in my back and general weakness, and was compelled to quit work. I was treated by several different doctors, who filled me full of drugs and medicines, but without benefit. I had begun to get discouraged when I received one of your almanacs and read of a case in it that was similar to mine, cured through the use of Dr. J. H. McLean's Liver and Kidney Balm. I concluded to try it. The result was entirely satisfactory as I began to improve immediately. I used, in all, three bottles, and was able to go to work once more, and ever since have enjoyed the best of health. I would be doing less than my duty if I failed to give you these facts, so that others may hear of the wonderful powers of your Liver and Kidney Balm.

Yours truly,

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Ten Armenian refugees arrived in New York, July 6.

President and Mrs. Cleveland welcomed a third daughter on July 7.

The craters of Mounts Ætna and Vesuvius are again very active.

Americans in Paris celebrated the Fourth by visiting Lafayette's tomb.

Chicago will ask for the headquarters of the Christian Endeavor movement.

The National Educational Association convened in Denver, Colo., last week, with 10,000 teachers in attendance.

Mrs. O'Leary, who owned the cow which kicked over the lamp that started the great Chicago fire in 1871, died July 3.

The Fourth of July was celebrated with unusual demonstrations and a corresponding number of accidents and fatalities.

Gladstone has written a letter of farewell to his constituents and retires from Parliament applauding the Liberal party.

Willis L. Moore, of Chicago, has been appointed chief of the United States weather bureau, to succeed Professor Harrimann, removed by the President.

The internal revenue bureau has received a number of applications for a refund of the money paid on income tax before the law was declared unconstitutional.

The French Parliament has passed a law abolishing the tax on liquors containing less than 15 per cent of alcohol, and prohibiting the manufacture and sale of spirits declared to be dangerous by the academy of medicine.

IT will be of interest to our readers to know that Miss Willard kept the World's convention in order with the gavel presented to her by white ribbon comrades of Churchville, N. Y., the town in which she was born, a gavel made from a beam in the room where she first saw the light of earthly day.

MADAME ANTOINETTE STERLING has sung all through the great meetings of the British and World's Conventions. We learn with pleasure that she is to come to America in the autumn and will sing at the twenty-first annual meeting of the National W. C. T. U. in Baltimore, October 15-20. It is expected that she will accompany Miss Willard and Miss Gordon when they come home to attend this convention.

JUST at this time the country flower gardens are full of the dear, old-fashioned flowers that city folks never see; the vines do all the better for being relieved of their burden of blossoms. The Willard Y's of Chicago are eager to distribute these flowers to the sick in hospitals and the poor in tenements, and will be very grateful if the friends who remembered them last year, and others who would like to coöperate with their flower mission, would send by messenger or express to their headquarters, room 1111, the Temple.

WILL the National Reform Conference, reported on page 9, have any bearing upon future events? It was wholly preliminary, it is true, but is it not a forward step to have reached the preliminaries of a union of reform forces? Separated they are powerless; in union they are strong. Who knows, but that on this spot, sacred to the principle of emancipation, of freedom not from African but American slavery, the nucleus has been formed around which will gather the now dispersed forces, that united will make an epoch in the history of government?

GENERAL NEAL DOW, now in his ninety-second year, is to address the Christian Endeavor Convention at Boston, July 10–15, which will consist of not less than fifty thousand persons. As a matter of course the General does not expect to make himself heard by such an assembly, but he will be seen, which is much, and what he says will be repeated by some younger man of stentorian tones. We doubt if there is a parallel to this record made by the most famous temperance man in the world. Gladstone excites the admiration of the world, but his retirement from the platform has preceded that of Neal Dow by many years.

HAVING been presented with samples of the Crusade souvenirs by the Hillsboro committee, THE UNION SIGNAL can most heartily endorse their quality and beauty. Every state, county and local president should have one of the handsome and durable gavels, made of hard wood, and adorned with a silver plate, bearing the inscription,

DECEMBER 24, 1873.

HILLSBORO, O.

Other white-ribboners will enjoy the little wooden cabinet, neatly made from the church material and holding two photographs, one of the church and the other of Dr. McSurely, Mother Thompson and Mrs. McDowell. The honoraries will find good use for the beautiful cane. All the money received from the sale of these souvenirs will contribute to swell the fund for the finishing and furnishing of a memorial W. C. T. U. room in the new church. Address W. A. Harman, Hillsboro, O.

THE farewell meeting to the white-ribbon delegates in London took place Sunday afternoon, June 23. As Miss Stewart's account of it arrived too late for insertion in the regular proceedings we gladly give it place here:

Exeter Hall—that historic gathering place which has resounded with the tones of voices renowned in eloquence, the hall in which the famous May meetings of reform and philanthropic societies of every description are annually held—presented a festal appearance to the large audience at the farewell meeting to the delegates, June 23. The familiar World's banner, first used at the Boston Convention, upon the organ loft, the large motto on the gallery opposite—"We wage our peaceful war for God and home and every land"—the beautiful lilies, palms, gay banners, all gave the room the appearance of a genuine W. C. T. U. gathering. Beyond the fact that Miss Willard was to preside and Madame Sterling sing, nothing was known of the character of the meeting. But no one was left long in doubt, for after the opening hymn and devotions, during which Mrs. Grow read the "Traveler's Psalm" and Mrs. Hannah Whitall Smith offered prayer, the chairman divulged her unique program: "It is well known," she naïvely said, "that the temperance women are minute women, and so I simply asked to have a list of the names of those who were to sit upon the platform, and have no other program. Not a single woman was told she would be called on." The amazement on the faces of those who sat facing the audience was intensely interesting to those beyond the pale. But the result proved the correctness of the president's faith. Scintillating truths and nuggets of golden thought dropped in showers. Mrs. Archibald, of Canada, who came first, gave as her thought that W. C. T. U. meant "Will Christ Take Us." Mrs. Thurman emphasized God's call to Christian women in the grandest organization the world has ever known. New Zealand and Finland workers, Mrs. Shepheard and Mrs. Trigg, gave gleams of hope from the work in these lands. Miss Downey pointed out that many of the W. C. T. U. workers take to preaching the gospel. Mrs. Hoffman called attention to the glaring contrasts in London society, and the need of the work penetrating every portion. London was compared to Babylon. "With all your power, your learning, your history, you are dealing in slaves and the souls of men," was her condemnation. Mrs. Jennie June Croly, of Sorosis fame, took pride in saying that in the twenty-seven years of the existence of woman's clubs there had never been intoxicants at any of their meetings. "Mother love and Christ love is the foundation of the W. C. T. U.," said Mrs. Barker. Referring to the glorious gathering in Royal Albert Hall, and contrasting it with the small beginnings of the early years, Mrs. Rounds rejoiced at having been given a place in the great work. "Swing low, sweet chariot," was sung by Miss Hallie Brown just after the reading of Mrs. F. E. Harper's beautiful verses on the great convention. A brief review of the week's doings and a few earnest words, "not of farewell but of Godspeed," were given by Lady Henry Somerset. Minute speeches were then called for, and not a soul within reach of the chairman's keen eye escaped a call. Gems of thought were uttered in quick succession, and so spontaneously that the venerable and knightly Sir George Williams, the pioneer philanthropist, founder of the Y. M. C. A. and president of the Band of Hope Union, was moved to say, "Often have I sat in this hall, but never in my life heard so many speakers at one meeting. I never knew how beautifully a meeting could be conducted until to-day!" There were thirty-seven speakers in the two hours, besides the singing—a record hardly to be broken by any other organization or any other chairman in any land! Miss Willard announced another "farewell meeting" to take place at Spurgeon's Tabernacle on the return of the delegates from the continent in a fortnight. Our next issue, August 1, will tell of the Grindelwald Conference.

THE BATTLE HYMN OF PROHIBITION.

BY T. L. WEAVER.

(Air, "Glory, Hallelujah.")

For the breaking of the morning of a grander, better day,
We have waited in the gloaming and have never ceased to pray,
Until our eyes are weary watching in the twilight gray,
But right is marching on.

God has said that Christ shall conquer all the peoples of the earth,
And for this the world has waited since the blessed Saviour's birth,
And incense has been rising from each good man's cottage hearth,
Our Lord is marching on.

The camps of Prohibition are encircling all the plain,
Its soldiers brave are marching through the sleet and through the rain,
And they will free our home-land from this deep and damning stain,
And they are marching on.

Westfield, Pa.

THE LAST DAY AT THE OLD HOME.

BY MINNIE E. BIRD.

There were clouds of dust, and tap of hammers, and swinging of doors in the wind. A drayman drove up and deposited some empty packing boxes on the piazza. The children's shoes clattered on the bare floors as they ran about, upstairs and down.

The front parlor, where the old man was accustomed to sit most, was left to the last, though the tacks were out of the carpet and the furniture and pictures had a restlessness as they waited for their turn to come, and he felt it. "Mother" was out in the chaos, moving about with feeble steps.

It was her life they were folding up and packing away in the boxes. She wanted to see to it to the end. She could not imagine living apart from those carpets and curtains and pictures. Her children were born here, and had run through the rooms just as the grandchildren upstairs were doing. The house was always full in those days, and there were lights and fires and voices in every part of it.

It was to those voices the old man was listening, as he sat by the window for the last time, wrapped in reverie. Presently "mother" came, too, and sat down by his side. They had grown old and feeble and childish together in this old house, and every nook and corner of it was consecrated by sweet or sad or solemn memories.

Is it so altogether unlovely, this "growing childish"? What is it but going back to the sweet simplicity and frankness and faith of the little ones, before the newness is worn off of living? Between childhood and childishness, one has to wear so thick a mask to save his face from life's arrows that the heavenly air may be more difficult to breathe for these, than for the childish ones to whom the kingdom was likened.

Out of this room the girls had gone, gowned in white, to their graduating; here one after another, they had stood in white for their wedding; here, so long ago that—and yet it might have been yesterday—the little gown was so yellow the grandchildren laughed at it, their little son was christened, and here the far-away daughter had brought her little child, to be buried from father's, and they had wept with her over the first break in the family circle, as they listened to the notes of "Safe in the arms of Jesus," struck softly upon the old piano. Old now, old now, but all the world was new and strong and young in those far-off days.

A memory came to the sad old man. His glance had fallen upon the piano, and suddenly he saw it, open, as it had stood one night. When was it? He could not remember how many years, but it was long ago. There had been no sleep in the house, and it was past midnight. Twice mother had gone to see if the gas was still burning in the hall, and then to open the door of his room, who was youngest and brightest and favorite or all; but it was empty. At last a latch-key rattled uncertainly in the door, and he went down stairs, while mother waited in suspense. Oh! the clumsy steps, the over balance, the dead weight, oh! the boy, the boy!

He helped him to his room, and then went slowly down the stairs again and into the parlor. He wanted to be alone. A tongue of flame started up from the covered fire, and in its shining he saw everything in the room so plainly, that he seemed to be seeing it even now. Mother might know how many years it was.

"How long—how long was it?" he said with labored effort, for his throat and tongue would not help him convey his thoughts. The little old lady could not understand. She was thinking of her home-bringing, when the old house was new and they were young, and so she said,

"It's fifty-five years, father, fifty-five years."

He shook his head impatiently, but he could not make her know; and he remembered that the piano was open, and "The Three Fishers" was open on the music rack, and when he stooped mechanically to look at it, he read,

"The women are weeping and wringing their hands,
For those who will never come back to the town."

He did not go to bed that night at all. And that was only the beginning.

Some of the other children and grandchildren were always with them, they were never alone, but when he said at night, in the quaint formula of his church, "Let us go to prayer," he felt the house was empty and desolate, because of the vacant chair among them at the prayer hour.

And then (ah! that was a day of thick darkness), he read in his morning paper his boy's name in connection with a drunken brawl in a disreputable saloon—for there are social distinctions in saloons!—and from that day on his father's house had never seen him. God only knew where he was, or, worse thought, what he was.

His father had held him in his arms when they sang,

"Safe in the arms of Jesus,"

over the little dead child; over his memory, they could only sing,

"E'en though it be a cross
That raiseth me,
Nearer, my God, to Thee."

He did not remember, mercifully, his reverses, their long illness, and growing infirmities, and he felt half resentful that the children should insist upon breaking up the old home. Now, if ever "the boy" should come back who would welcome him?

The last nail was driven, the sun beat in at the curtainless windows, and the children on the street stood and looked on as people do at a funeral. In the evening they sat together, the daughters and their husbands, and the two old people, whose home henceforth was to be with their children. All their thoughts and all the conversation was of the old days and the old home. The moon was shining in now, at its bleak, dark windows, and a rising wind made the doors swing on their hinges.

Presently he said, "Let us go to prayer," and they knelt in their places. His words grew more and more indistinct, and when they wondered at his silence and turned to him, a startled outcry rang through the quiet room. Upon his knees, with his prayer upon his lips, the old man had passed to the home "where they go no more out forever."

No one heard the click of the gate in the confusion that followed, or saw the ragged, unkempt, ill-looking tramp who had been looking in the window and now passed on down the street. He walked faster when he was away from the house, and only stopped when he stood in front of the silent house that day deserted. He leaned awhile upon the square topped gate post, where a boy used to perch often and often once, and at last started to enter the yard.

"Here, you!" called a policeman who had been watching him from the other side of the street. "Get out of that. What do you want in there?" He came across as he spoke and the tramp turned back.

"Say, mister, gimme a dime? I'm hungry."

"You don't mean exactly hungry, I reckon; anyway there's nothing to eat in that empty house at midnight." He held the gate open and looked narrowly at the man as he shambled out. To his amazement he saw that he was crying. "Here," he said roughly, "go and get a drink if you want it. But don't you go looking into any more houses." He handed him a dime and the tramp started on his way. When he had walked till he was weary he stopped outside a saloon door and looked up into the sky where faint streaks of light were beginning to show. A church clock struck somewhere in the distance. The wind caught a long black streamer of crape on the door of the house opposite and blew it out until it pointed at him like a long black finger. He gave a nervous start and looked up into the sky again. Then he opened the saloon door and went in; but far away in quite another part of the town the old father had entered into peace.

And the saloon-keeper's license hung in plain view on the wall where all could see it.

KHAMA AND DRINK.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

One of the most honored names of the Polyglot Petition is that of Khama, chief of the Bechuanaland. The Aborigines Friend is a journal of the transactions of the Aborigines Protection Society, and we note with anxiety the report in a recent number of that magazine that the chartered company favors such interferences with the present arrangement for the prohibition of all strong drinks in Khama's country as will enable English and others traveling in that country to gratify their tastes in this respect. The highway from that country to Matabeleland passes through Bechuanaland. A line of railway thither is now being built, but the road is at present traversed by the help of cattle wagons or horses. Meanwhile the travelers and road makers and others employed on the route want to be supplied with liquor. It is apparently for their convenience that canteens and "hotels" are proposed. But all experience shows that wherever canteens and the like are set up it is impossible to restrict the use of them to those for whom they were ostensibly designed. This is the statement of the Aborigines Friend.

Six years ago Khama wrote the British authorities:

"It is not the same thing to offer my country to Her Majesty to be occupied by the English settlers as it is to allow men so worthless and unscrupulous as ——— and ——— to come outside of all governments and flood my country with their drink after all the long struggle I made against it, withstanding my people at the risk of my life, and just as they have themselves come to see how great a salvation my drink laws have proved to be. It were better for me that I should lose my country than that it should be flooded with drink. To fight against drink is to fight against demons, and not against men. I dread the white man's drink more than the assegais of the Matabele, which kills men's bodies; but drink puts devils into men and destroys both their souls and bodies forever. Its wounds never heal. I pray your honor never to ask me to open even a little door to drink."

It is true that the Hon. Cecil J. Rhodes has written to the government repeating the assurance that the natives are not to have liquor, but he says nothing about the setting up of canteens for the "convenience of Europeans," and it is well known that if liquor is sold at all natives will be sure to get it. Hence we earnestly hope, as we feel confidently assured, that our white-ribbon women in South Africa will do their utmost to help stand guard over Khama's country and against its invasion by the drink.

CHURCH RESOLUTIONS vs. THE SALOON RESOLUTION.

BY JOHN G. WOOLLEY.

[Extracts from a speech delivered in Boston before the Convention of the United Societies of Christian Endeavor, July 11, 1895.]

The bewildering paradox of the Christian reformer, in these days, is that he must speak of politics without mentioning politics, unless, indeed, he feel constrained to say something contemptuous of the only political party that stands for the only political thing that the Church, politically, stands for. You smile, but that is the indispensable condition of commanding the cordial attention of that touchy fugitive from divine justice that goes by the alias of "Christian Public Sentiment." I refuse to try to do it. I should despise myself for such capacity of shrinkage in my manhood as would fit me to scull an argument along the devious larvæ-breeding lagoons that go by the name of "policy."

Copyright. All rights to print in book or tract form reserved.

Away back at the sky line of history, limned in heroic outline on the flushing East of legendary time, whoever looks may see a glorious crank or, in theological language, a minor prophet. And like a bugle blast of some blenched and horror stricken but unflinching Titan, sounding a challenge to perdition's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, his voice splits the great deep of twenty-five centuries of cruelty, as rapiers of the lightning flash through summer clouds, and scandalizes the "good form" of decorous and perfunctory litanism, hallooing, "Woe unto them that supply drink to other men!"

Voices of his critics do not survive, but doubtless, prude "per diem" orthodoxy shrunk aghast into its gabardine and said, "this Prohibitionist is a nuisance and a seditionary. You cannot make men sober by law, statutes should never be in advance of public sentiment. That was the blunder of the Golden Rule, the weakness of the decalogue, the farce of Sinai. I am as good a Prohibitionist as he is but not third party. He is throwing his influence away. He is setting the cause back twenty years. He wants an office. He is a sore head. He is in it for money. He is paid by Babylonish gold. The best we can do now is to work vice on shares and confine it to the tenement districts. Why does he not content himself with scotching sin in general, or tweaking the nose of heterodoxy as the major prophets did. Noah made wine and so did David. Solomon said, 'Wine is a mocker,' a thing for medicine and pudding. Let this upstart fanatic stick to that, or hold his peace!"

But he said, "There is no muzzle in Palestine that will stop my mouth. I will wear no armor that does not fit me, I will worship no book nor retrogress to any other man's ideal; I refuse to be careful for anything, but in everything, by prayer and thanksgiving, let my wants be made known unto God; I will stand upon my watch tower and see what He will say unto me."

So I, least of the prophets of the great reform, a fugitive from the black galleys of the pirate ship of drink's despair, with the purple welts of a thousand whippings on my heart and whom it is as lawful for any drinkseller to entrap and damn, as it is to kill a rat, have come again, dead spent with toiling up and down the land, to tell you, in the name of the transcendant citizen who threw his vote away on Calvary, what God has been saying to me in the swish of the cat-o'nine-tails of two hundred and fifty thousand licensed bastinadoes in this Christian land. Expect no soft, sheeny sentences from me to-night. Let no sleek politic doctrinaire admonish me to be careful. The white faces of my dead father and mother came to me this morning before the dawn and said, "Get up and curse the saloon!" O friends, O father, O mother, O graves of my dead, O my country, O Heaven, O God, hear me! If I held here in a crucible, white hot, the most scalding, corroding and consummate curse of God I would pour it out upon the liquor traffic with a steady hand!

But stop! Who knows how far that curse would burn its way? Who is it, in the great white dominion and in these states, that keeps the drink on sale?

I have no word to utter here against the distiller, the brewer or the drink-seller. The public virtue was for sale, they bought it at its own price, and paid for it in hard cash, bloody dimes wrung from the hands of folly, poverty and toil, and while they own it they have a right to enjoy and profit by the usufruct. My voice is to the voting church. "Awake, thou that sleepest, arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light. Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O arm of the Lord. Put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem. Shake thyself from the dust. Arise, loose thyself, O captive daughter of Zion, for ye have sold yourselves for naught, and ye shall be redeemed without money!"

The case is between church resolutions and saloon resolution, plural versus singular, division versus solidarity, a pious sprinkling pot versus an ocean current of practical politics, local option versus universal empire. Multiplication of fractions, that is to say, division, pursuing the saloon, which is an integer. The difficulty, dimly seen for years, has crystallized into the maxim, "Temperance people ought to get together." Of course we ought; but where? It happens at every change of the moon, that some pliable philanthropist pushes his peripatetic bandbox into the public square, and challenges the saloon to mortal compromise upon some contemptible Scandinavian basis of profit-sharing, or the more brutally straightforward and American method of a fixed price for taking civic honor out of politics, and for the debasement of public virtue to the plane of stark revenue—like a brothel, and simpers to worn and anguished women and haggard, beggared men, as they crawl out of the wreckage of their drink-rent lives, "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for saints and saloon-keepers to vote together in unity."

And when some heart-wrung man cries out against the truculent infamy this same philanthropist sneers at him as a new-washed, impudent drunkard, "over scrupulous," "a maligner of the Church" "an auxiliary of the saloon," while the bell Pharisee, with honesty at half-mast, struts into politics and delivers over the Christian vote into "a league with death and a covenant with hell," and answers the wail of stricken homes, the voice of the Church and the plain word of God, with the pusillanimous logic of the bargain counter: "It is not what we want, but it is cheap," and then, upon election day the voting Church eagerly ambles after a party leader to the polls and silently ratifies his offer of a lease of God's world to Satan, for a mess of spoils, and would mitigate the perfidy by saying that wrong is sometimes right in politics. And that is a lie, as black as ever flapped its bat wings at the glory of a sunset!

And I, for one, dare stand apart and be a fool for Christ's sake, and call wrong wrong, in religion or politics or New York City or hell or Norway. For a man, a woman, a city, a state or a nation to "buy the truth and sell it" is treason against the God of Truth, label it what you may; "tax" in Ohio, "license" in Massachusetts, "mulct" in Iowa or "bribe" in New York, it is shame everywhere and forever. We would better stay apart eternally than get together in the nicest wrong.

Take a vote upon the various propositions that have come up in this reform and there is just one that can command the universal sympathy of Christians and that is that "the saloon ought to die."

Then why not kill it? Why have we not voted it to death long ago? The answer is very simple and brings me at once to the gist of this argument. We have not voted the saloon to death because the ruling politicians would not let us. How could they prevent? Are Christian men slaves? Yes; abject, motley slaves, contraband of machine statesmanship and annually put up and sold upon the auction block of party.

Why has Iowa violated the express will of her people and by a general statute compounded the felony of liquor selling and consented to become the laughing stock of courts? Because she supposes that she has a statesman so neutral tinted that he can make an invisible race for the presidency provided he can go before the party free from the fatal blemish of hailing from a state that is unfriendly to the saloon. Why has Rhode Island gone back into the service of the saloon and concentrated her intelligence and conscience upon a measure to establish free gold cures for her home-made drunkards? Because the hand of Providence—Rhode Island—a private office broker, points out the party peril of being steadfast.

Why has Christianity been insulted in Ohio and denied the right of self-defense against the saloon? Because her favorite son was a candidate for president and the leader of the house said that to estrange the saloon-keepers would swamp the party. Why has the enforcement of the prohibitory law of Kansas been betrayed in difficult cities into the hands of its notorious enemies? In order to hold the saloon vote in the party. Why did those senators of New Hampshire find it necessary to cringe and trim and lie to prevent the prudent and necessary strengthening of the prohibitory law? Because that sacrifice of patriotic manhood was necessary for the party. Why does Maine's chief justice habitually insult the law that he has sworn to enforce and permit himself to be known and despised as the saloon-keeper's friend in a prohibition state? Because the party interest requires that Christianity and crime should be politically harmonized by a flexible judiciary. Why did Michigan disfranchise a large number of her noblest citizens? Because they felt in honor bound to unite against the ruling party. Why has New York disfranchised everybody except Platt and Croker, the "twins" in the zodiac of dirt? Because the recent wave of civic honesty in the city was a common menace to both parties and so in self-defense they make the empire robber's roost, bipartisan. And so throughout the land the Christian vote cries craven, hangs its harp upon the party willow on election day and sings the party version:

"All hail the power of Jesus' name,
Let angels prostrate fall,
Bring forth the royal diadem
And sell it Lord and all."

This is plain talk, but not a word at random. Somebody must talk plain and I have no parish to please, no trustees to satisfy, no session to consult, no subscription list to consider, no career to foster, no presiding elder has an eye on me, no bishop counts me in his diocese, and this is Boston, the home of independent thinking and free speech.

The defeat of the Church, the disgrace of the law, the despair of reform is the all but universal substitution of partyism for patriotism. This country will go straight for prohibition whenever it shall suit the interest or convenience of the two great parties to let the people loose with the saloon. We await their pleasure.

Meanwhile a young Christian man arriving at his majority and entering into respectable party affiliations, must shed his greatest and clearest political conviction, as one would leave his mackintosh and rubbers at the door. But in the face of that truth ninety-five per cent of Southern Christians and about forty-eight per cent in the whole country pour out the blood of their civic virtue in defense of a party, which is the open enemy of prohibition, and this they do for the utterly unpatriotic and unworthy motive of "beating another party." And again, ninety-five per cent of Northern Christians and about forty-eight per cent in the country at large, annually bind the Son of God and lay Him on the altar of unpatriotism as a sin offering for a party organization which is as destitute of honor to the Church as the moon is of atmosphere, and they do this because they hate another party.

If we believe it to comport with Christian profession to keep silent about the saloon at general elections, or that it is indifferent what we do about it there, we ought to expunge our top-lofty resolutions like honest men, and stop the braggart lies that have been published in our name. Be patient with me! I know you will scorn to take such action. Well, then, for the sake of the chivalry of your manhood, the luxury of self-respect, the strength of your youth, the truth of the church, stand up like brave men, and make your resolutions good.

Do not ask me to instruct you how or when you may achieve the victory, or what party will win it. I don't know. No man can tell you that, for no man's mind is big enough to calculate the tension of ideas, the strength of organizations, the lines of least resistance, the resultant of infinite forces, and antagonisms, the percentages of friction, or the quantum of inertia in the civic world. I have but one clear vision to-day about it, and that I have come a thousand miles to give you. It is this. We must overcome the sag of dirty politics. How? Get out of it! But where shall you go? Never mind. Get out of the slough, and then inquire the road.

Christian citizenship means at least two things—Christianity and Citizenship. The voting church by trying to be true to parties, has been untrue to both. The Christianity that stays in dirty parties loses its savor precisely as the fishes of Mammoth Cave have lost their eyes. Politics is average virtue. The first duty of a Christian is to raise the average. Because we have lost sight of that, the parties have been able to disfranchise civic Christianity and transmute the power of the church into saloons.

There are men enough at this convention to stop that now, and we have no business to ever pass another resolution against the saloon until we have made up our minds to march out of that fellowship. Last general election ninety-five per cent of Christian men consented to shut their eyes to the saloon to help one moderate drinker beat another to the White House, and yet that ninety-five per cent are continually asking us to propose something practical. Wash your hands; that is practical.

Somebody is sure to say that I have spoken here in the interest of the Prohibition party. I make you my witnesses that I do not. No party owns me; no party claims me. I speak in the interest of a clean church, and in my judgment the very day the church cuts loose from dirty politics there will come a new cleavage of voters, new ideals of citizenship, new measures of candidates, new meanings of loyalty, new victories and a new country, and the Prohibition party will have done its work and will disappear, except in its one clean, noble page of American history, and there will be a new party either for Christians or for saloon-keepers, for no honest party can hold both. I speak in the interest of a robust and vital Christianity, that will not be under obligation to saloons, nor mix with cowardice or lies.

Oh, my friends, come up where the church stands like an impregnable fortress upon the crown of the rock of ages. Come up where the air is better, the horizon wider, and where in the skyward silence you can hear God speaking. Let the unclean parties know of you what they know of Francis E. Clark, John Willis Baer, William Shaw, Wilbur Chapman, Ballington Booth, Bishop Fitz-Gerald, Joseph Cook, De Witt Talmage, and some two hundred and seventy thousand others in the states alone, that though their citizenship go mute and inglorious forever for want of a party, their vote cannot be had, on any terms, for a man or a party that does not say, in the platform, "Down with the saloon." Join every one of you to-night in the pledge of Habakkuk, "I will stand upon my watch-tower and see what God will say unto me."

General Grant said, "There is a moment in every battle when the first advance means victory." The battle royal of the centuries is on. The church that never lost a fight with wrong, or ever succeeded in a stratagem against it, faces the saloon upon the fairest field and fairest terms the universe could furnish, the ballot-box of a republic where, by divine right, the people rule. The voice of the trimmer is heard in the church and the state, saying, "Let the saloon alone one more campaign, and let me lead you toward the good by stealth and the aid of enemies." Away with trimmers, great or small! Cowards to the rear! Call in the pickets! Close ranks! Guide center! Forward, with this new battle cry, The Church for Christ!

WILLARD HALL, NOONTIDE LINKS.

This side of heaven nothing is sweeter, more persistent, more all-conquering than mother-love, and to have missed it, is to have missed the real joy of life.

There came to me a letter from a Kansas town that reads in this wise:

"I have a beautiful boy of fifteen, who has gone from home, and I do not know where he is. Will you pray that he may come back to me, or that I may have tidings from him, or, if this be denied me, that I may have grace to bear this, the greatest sorrow of my life?"

Strong men wept at the reading of the letter. All hearts were tender, and many a prayer went to the throne for that mother, whose heart is breaking.

There is an old Scotchman, for whose coming I watch, and whose absence gives me a sense of loneliness.

His name I never heard, but he nearly always sits in one place, and every day, in heat or cold, rain or shine, he stands on the corner handing out invitation cards to the noon meetings.

The cut of his coat is by no means modern, but there is a shine in his eye, and a cheeriness in his voice, that makes one soon forget about that.

He never fails to speak for the Master when opportunity affords, and if my memory serves me right he has never omitted to say that he thanked God for giving him a Christian mother.

There tarried at the close of the meeting one day a gentleman who wished to speak with me.

He said, "I am Rev. —— from the city of——, and I am here on a sad errand. I have a daughter, a most brilliant woman, going wrong in this great city. Something told me to come here and tell you about it. Can you and will you go with me and try to persuade her to return to her home?"

. . . . . .

Oh, God! Be merciful to the hearts that break and the souls that drift.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

British Temperance Women in Council.

Dear Union Signal:—One of London's liberal and eminent divines, Dr. Joseph Parker, whose pulpit is, as Miss Willard declared, "the Gatling gun aimed at all evils," raised his voice in prayer at the opening of the Nineteenth Annual Council of the British Women's Temperance Association. The place of meeting was the City Temple, Dr. Parker's church, in the center of the business streets, and the dates were June 17 and 18.

Over the wall hung our familiar motto, "We wage our peaceful war for God and Home and Every Land," the American flag was draped with the English ensign; flowers light up the double platform, and banners which might have been American ones hung round the balcony. Each delegation had its allotted sitting, space was reserved for the press, young women pages were in attendance, the policemen at the door kept the aisles clear and order reigned supreme. Had it not been for the exchange of words—council for convention, shire for state, steward for page, and the good Britishers' ready, approving "Hear, hear," one would not have dreamed but that it was our own National convention in session. So much alike have the two countries become in ripeness of method through interchange of thought and ideas.

But one feature was radically different, and that was the seating of a large body of women upon an intermediate platform, over the front pews. These women I soon learned, were the National executive committee, numbering one hundred. They are nominated and elected by the members at each annual council, and hold quarterly meetings during the year for the transaction of business.

The entrance of the president, Lady Henry Somerset, was the signal for applause. The evidences of love and affection for their great leader increased as the session continued. At the calling of the roll, each delegation rose in its place, any especially large company, like that of Kent, with its quota of fifty representatives, receiving hearty applause. Over seven hundred delegates had been expected on a basis of one for each fifty members and fraction thereof. That the total had been closely reached was indicated by the crowded appearance of the church.

The main feature of the opening, and indeed, any session, was the reading of the president's address. This was plainly the work of a master mind, depicting with infinite art and reality the exact condition of affairs in the British reform world of to-day, and the relation of the B. W. T. A. to these matters. The reading was perfect in expression and clearness, causing the words to stand out with life and force from the printed page. Only a portion was read, but you must have some gleams from this glowing, ripe production of a noble, Christian woman's intellect and boundless charity.

Her opening words were:

"The Annual Council of 1895 is the most significant and hopeful of all that we have held since the beginning of the great campaign. We have many more delegates from a largely increased membership, including eight hundred local societies, which is two hundred more than has been reported at any previous council. The temperance question was never so vigorously alive in our country as it is to-day. No other great nation ever before saw a Direct Veto Bill included in the platform of the dominant party, twice recommended from the throne, and championed by the leader of the House of Commons. The strength of public sentiment indicated by these facts marks England as the leader of national sentiment and purposed legislation among the nations of the earth. For this we thank God and take courage."

The present meeting was marked in importance by the presence of so many delegates from the World's white ribbon ranks to whom was accorded a glowing welcome in a brief review of what each country had distinctively accomplished. That there is hope for a long-suffering humanity is evidenced by this bold utterance, the crystal gem of the address:

"It is not more true that 'even a worm will turn at last,' than that humanity may reach a point beyond which forbearance shall cease to be a virtue. The most splendid quality of the people is their patience. I admit that sometimes it seems to me a pity that they have not less of it and more self-assertion. As ignorance on the people's part has always been the opportunity of the 'medicine man' and the religious necromancer, so patience on their part has been the hope of the rich and the powerful. Ruskin says: 'Life without labor is guilt, and industry without art is brutal.' The unemployed rich and the over-employed poor are perishing for lack of labor and for lack of leisure. To equalize the allotment of each is the work of the reformer in Parliament and Congress.

"In London nearly one person in five must have outdoor relief in order to live at all. There are five millions of people, and nearly a million are obliged to look to the public for charity; when if they could look to the public for work, and retain their self-respect, London would be a noble city instead of presenting the appearance of a queen wrapped in rags."

Of the splendid work of the London county council she said:

"The action of the London county council on the temperance question indicates the high water-mark of municipal reform. The council has not retained a single license which has fallen into its hands when acquiring property. It has abandoned twenty-seven licenses at a cost of £37,000. Alcoholic drinks have been abolished from the asylums and temperance refreshments are insisted on in the parks."

A splendid and deserved compliment was paid to the home secretary, Mr. Asquith, who is "not a moral Gulliver tied down with red tape."

In connection with board school religion and the discussion thereon, the following little story was told: "Who are the heathen?" asked a Sunday-school teacher. "Please, sir," answered the boy, "they're the people who don't quarrel about religion!"

Loyalty, that comradeship which should obtain between co-workers in our ranks everywhere was never more tersely and significantly defined:

"Loyalty consists in the kind and frank expression of one's actual opinion concerning men and measures expressed in an open assembly of delegates, and with that just admixture of praise and blame that fairly represents the gold and alloy which in this mortal life enter into every character and circumstance, whether individual or aggregate.

"The trouble is that workers have not learned that long conversations about one another are ministers of evil. At the outset the failing discussed seems small; at the conclusion it has grown to be a crime. When in private converse one worker brings out another's faults in ungainly procession, while in public she parades one's virtues; that is not loyalty. When she hedges up one's way by ingenious devices, and yet seems to be broadening and enriching it all the time; that is not loyalty. But what is loyalty? Like love it 'suffers long and is kind; is not puffed up; doth not behave itself unseemly.' Loyalty holds to the organization, defends it, builds it up among those who are either indifferent or unfriendly, upholds it strongly in the presence of those who oppose it, and freely criticises its personnel and methods within the circle of its own counsels. Loyalty follows the New Testament admonition first to seek out one's brother or sister alone, and talk over differences in a spirit of the utmost honesty and good will. If this does not bring about a reconciliation, then loyalty takes two or three witnesses and goes over the matter again. If this is not successful loyalty brings it before the larger assembly. But such directness and good feeling are practically sure to be rewarded by restoration to confidence and sympathy long before the court of last resort is reached."

And so I might continue to give choice extracts from this rich treasury which every worker in every land would do well to possess for herself.

Officers' and superintendents' reports, and the discussion of various resolutions, all of more or less importance, occupied the business sessions which were highly interesting and varied, but which space will not permit me to give in detail at this time. Madame Sterling's music, the introduction of fraternal delegates and visitors, of whom there was a notable array, were the bright occurrences.

The publication, in the local press, of a letter from Miss Florence Balgarnie accusing Frances E. Willard and the National W. C. T. U. of being "apologists for Southern lynchings," forced upon the council the open discussion of the question to which nearly three hours of the second day's session was given. The resolution which opened the question and was passed was as follows:

Anti-lynching—From the National Executive Committee supported by Sixty-five Branches.

In view of the innumerable cases of cowardly and brutal lynchings, both in the cities and country districts of the States of America, by reason of which not only the guilty, but many absolutely innocent persons, have been murdered within recent years, this Council of the B. W. T. A., affiliated with the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union, earnestly call upon their American sisters of the W. C. T. U. to continue to speak out in unmistakable terms in denunciation of this terrible evil, opposed as it is to those elementary principles of justice and humanity which should ever exist, irrespective of race and color.

Lady Henry Somerset, Miss Willard, Mrs. Rounds, Mrs. Thurman, Miss Hallie Q. Brown, Mrs. Hoffman and Miss Balgarnie presented the subject. It was thoroughly aired in an intensely interesting discussion. At the close the great audience was as thoroughly convinced that Hon. Frederick Douglass was in his "sane mind" (despite Miss Balgarnie's implication to the contrary), when he wrote in the fly leaf of the book he presented Miss Willard during the Washington Convocation last February, the day before he died: "To my friend and the friend of the oppressed everywhere, Frances E. Willard."

Miss Agnes Slack, of England, then offered the following resolution and it was passed:

That having heard the statements of our American sisters, this Council emphatically declares its belief that the W. C. T. U. of the United States which has wrought so nobly for the uplift of men and women of every creed and race and color has maintained the attitude which all consistent Christian bodies must adopt, to wit: "That under no circumstances must human life be taken without due process of law.

This ended the whole matter.

The closing session of the B. W. T. A. council was a public meeting of enormous proportions, in Queen's Hall, a large and handsome concert hall seating four thousand people. The platform center was filled with the white ribbon choir, Y's in pretty blue waists with white ribbon decorations and young men who sang "White Ribbon Vibrations," (written by a Nebraska woman) and many fine choruses. Lady Henry Somerset's arduous duties as active presiding officer during the two days' sessions had so wearied her that rest was an absolute necessity. That true woman, Mrs. Ormiston Chant, presided most happily and apologized for being there by saying she had done what she could rather than what she would! Taking advantage of the president's absence, she spoke loving words of praise of that rare leader of whom she said she knew not her equal—in intellectual thinking coupled with warm-heartedness. "What we think about people is, without our knowing it, the atmosphere which protects them in times of storm and danger." Surely Lady Henry Somerset is safely shrined from every ill in the hearts of thousands of her own, to see her among whom is to realize even more clearly the potent influence of a noble life given over to service for others. Mrs. Chant wittily compared the delegates to a "cloud of witnesses" with which London was now "compassed about."

The speakers of the evening were Mrs. Clara Hoffman, of ours, who was at her brightest and best and asked that the visitors be extended a hospitality of mind which would take in the ideas with which they came charged. Miss Agnes Weston, whose noble work among the marines is known the world round, made a beautiful speech whose text was obedience and loyalty and whose varied illustrations drawn from sea life were vivid and true. "Nail your colors to the mast, no surrender," was the message she gave the mariners on the temperance ship. Hon. Henry Wilson, M. P., Mr. J. H. Raper, Miss Willard, Miss Lilian Phelps, of Canada and Mrs. Helen M. Barker gave brief addresses. Mme. Antoinette Sterling sang her deep toned thrilling melodies, and altogether the closing evening was a fitting climax to the Nineteenth Annual Council of the B. W. T. A.

World's W. C. T. U. Convention

Queen's Hall, London, Eng., June 19, 20, 1895.

OPENING SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, 10 A. M.

With "seven raps of the gavel, the number of perfection," the delegates and visitors to the Third Biennial World's W. C. T. U. Convention were called to order by the President, Miss Frances E. Willard. A hush fell upon the women as settling rapidly in their allotted places they joined in the reading of the Crusade Psalm, alternately with Miss Willard, Lady Henry Somerset and Mother Stewart. "It was indeed a token of good," as Miss Willard said, "that the Crusade Psalm should have been read from the Crusade Bible, which was brought to England for use at this Convention."

As on that memorable day so many years ago, the seventy Crusaders then sang the Crusade hymn, so now many times that Pentecostal number raised their voices in the well-known words, "Give to the wind thy fears." Mrs. Todd, acting president of Canada, then made the opening prayer, evoking the Divine blessing upon the Convention.

Such was the opening of the most important gathering yet held in the history of the World's W. C. T. U. Upon the platform (it was an orchestral platform, spacious in area) were seated the leading members of the score of foreign delegations. The central figure was our President, and at her side were Lady Henry Somerset, vice-president of the W. W. C. T. U., and the recording secretaries, Miss Slack and Miss Gordon. The fringe of bright English flowers along the platform's edge was an ornament and no impediment to the speakers. Banks of great Oriental palms were at either end. There was an absence of banners, flags and the usual W. C. T. U. mottoes and decorations. As far as outward sign was an indication, this might have been an audience gathered at any religious service. But the listener soon discovered the animus of the meeting in its proceedings. It was unmistakable.

Queen's Hall proved to be a wonderfully commodious, comfortable and convenient gathering place with its seating capacity for nearly four thousand people. The stalls, or seats, in the body of the house were occupied by the delegates, numbering 234; 125 were from the United States. The B. W. T. A. was represented by its entire executive committee. The rear seats and two galleries were filled at every session by visitors. Ample accommodations existed in the lobby in the way of refreshment rooms, cloak rooms, etc. Booths for the sale of W. T. P. A. and B. W. T. A. literature were presided over by bright faced young English girls.

The roll-call being omitted until the report of credentials committee could be made, the President on motion of the convention appointed the following committees: Finance, all National treasurers with Miss Gorham, of England, as chairman. Credentials, Miss Gordon, chairman; Miss Hood, England; Mrs. Archibald, Canada; Mrs. Shepherd, New Zealand. Courtesies, Miss Ackermann, chairman; Mrs. Todd, Mrs. Osborn, England; Miss De Broen, France; Mrs. Watts, United States of America; Mrs. Peters, Newfoundland.

The executive committee, which had held its meeting Friday, June 14, then presented its report. The executive committee consists of the general officers and a member from each nationality. Fifteen countries were represented at this meeting, which had transacted all the important business of the convention according to the constitution, this plan having been adopted by the first W. W. C. T. U. Convention, on the senatorial plan, in order that the weakest country might have equal representation. The members present were as follows: Miss Willard, Lady Henry Somerset, Miss Gordon, Miss Ackermann, Mrs. Todd, Canada; Mrs. Selmer, Denmark; Miss De Broen, France; Mrs. Hannah Whitall Smith, Great Britain; Mrs. Organe, India; Mrs. Peters, Newfoundland; Mrs. Shepherd, New Zealand, and Mrs. Dann, Bahama Islands. Mrs. Mary B. Willard, and Fr. Von Gizichki, Germany, had been invited to sit with the committee.

Among the important items of business transacted were the election of

ROUND-THE-WORLD MISSIONARIES.

Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt, Boston, Mass., U. S. A.; Miss Jessie A. Ackermann, Chicago, Ill., U. S. A.; Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew, Evanston, Ill., U. S. A.; Dr. Kate C. Bushnell, Evanston, Ill., U. S. A.; Miss Alice R. Palmer, Franklin, Ind., U. S. A.; Miss Belle Kearney, Flora, Miss., U. S. A.

Mrs. Hunt's motion for the admission of the World's superintendents of departments to the executive committee was passed; also that of Miss Anna Gordon, making round-the-world missionaries members of the executive committee as long as they retain their commission. Headquarters are to be in the Memorial Hall, London, and an office secretary is to be appointed by the General Officers.

A new plan was favorably reported to establish resident white-ribboners in China, Straits Settlements, Bahamas and wherever thought best, the W. W. C. T. U. contributing six hundred dollars a year to each missionary. The General Officers are to make inquiries and appoint suitable persons. A Lucas fund for organization work was established. A financial agent is to be appointed by the General Officers. All National affiliated societies were urged to push, in their respective countries, the appointment of one or more members of the different denominations and associations, whose business it shall be to draw their fellow-members into the W. W. C. T. U. The plan of Dr. Bushnell for fraternal correspondence between local unions in different nations was approved. The effort to secure affiliation with the W. W. C. T. U. of National societies of women philanthropists and reformers who have a total abstinence section was placed among the specified duties of the secretaries.

The election of the World's superintendents resulted in the reappointment of nearly all. The departments of press, fairs and expositions, and work among policemen are to be filled by the General Officers. New departments were created and filled as follows:

Demorest Medal Contests, Madame Demorest, of New York; School of Methods, Mrs. Pearsall Smith; Food Reform, Miss M. Yates. Mrs. Jennie Fowler Willing, of New York, was appointed the World's evangelist, to be at the head of a school for training evangelists. Miss Elizabeth Selmer was made lecturer and organizer for Scandinavia. Mrs. Henry J. Osborn, of London, was placed in charge of the World's lecture bureau.

New departments were recommended as follows: Amusements; Coffee Houses; Influencing Household Helpers; Humane Education; Politics.

The President then made the happy announcement of the victory of scientific temperance instruction in the New York legislature and the action of the Canadian House of Commons in declaring for prohibition, despite the adverse report of the Royal Commission of Inquiry. This was received with great applause and the doxology was sung.

Mrs. Burt, president of New York W. C. T. U., spoke a few words telling of their victories in the New York legislature, and thanking God for Miss Willard, "the woman who has led the way." At this juncture the inspiring song, "We all belong," was sung.

Madame Sterling's impassioned upbraiding of the laws which make the "age of consent" necessary was cordially applauded and followed by singing of "Home, Sweet Home."

The convention now prepared itself for the most important event of the session, the hearing of the annual address of the President, Miss Willard, who read with a voice full of tender emotion the opening sentences, then, as is her custom not keeping to the printed text but weaving in many bright and apt interpolations. The address was enthusiastically received and its adoption carried amid applause. A verse of "Blest be the tie that binds" was sung.

[As we have already given generously of Miss Willard's address, we here present the opening and closing paragraphs and the section upon purity.—Eds.]

Beloved Comrades in the Patience of Hope and the Labor of Love:

Prayer was the foundation of the Woman's Temperance Crusade; it was God's Pentecost in the homes of the people. "Though sundered far, by faith we meet around one common mercy-seat" was their first covenant, and the noontide hour sees the white ribbon women at prayer, and the mighty host of the Salvation Army on its knees. Within a year the Christian Endeavor Society, the International Women's and Young Women's Christian Associations, the Christian Workers' League, and many other great bodies have agreed to join in this hour of consecration which is a most significant token of good. May this mighty prayer-wave move on until the militant host of God shall include in its manual of arms the attitude and uplift of prayer whenever the noontide sun stands forth as the symbol of that Sun of Righteousness which shall arise with healing in His beams when and wherever the heart of man will open to let those beams shine in as a purifying and regenerating presence.

WORK FOR PURITY.

Words have souls, nay, what is worse, they have ghosts. Men are more frightened by words to-day than by ideas. If one can but couch his thought in acceptable forms it will be received in quarters where, did he utter it squarely, he would be cast out as evil. We must admit that as a proof of the childhood of our condition, wherein we are "pleased with a rattle, and tickled by a straw," and live in forms and fashions rather than in thoughts and things; but so it is. Words are boulders so ponderous that they are still held on the track whence the force of new ideas has swept everything else. They are like the ice that stays in the hidden upland valley when the snow has smitten the brows of the mountains and warmed the bosoms of the lakes. We must get after them with pick and crowbar and hasten their departure, these old words and epithets that are but the links of heavy chains still fettering our flight to God's sweet heaven of truth.

Another phrase that we must chase out of the dictionary of common speech with a scourge of small cords is the phrase "an illegitimate child." No such child was ever born. Every child that has appeared on this sphere came here in the direct line of those natural laws which are laws of God, and are perfectly legitimate. I even dare to hope that the mother of one of these poor little waifs, as we are wont to call them, is made in some sacred sense "legitimate" by the awful sacrament of pain and shame that she endures. The only illegitimate factor in the problem is the father, who braves neither physical suffering nor legal penalty, who is pillowed in peace and comfort, while she, who by the laws of nature and of God, should, in this hour of her immeasurable need, have been surrounded by his love and sentineled by his protection, is left in the night of her agony, with no eye to pity, and no arm to save.

I refer elsewhere to the declaration of Pope Leo XIII, that there must be but one standard of purity for men and women, and that the highest. This faith is growing. It was never so strong and widely spread as now. Sporadic efforts are made in certain quarters to reënact laws for the degradation of women and the incontinence of men, but watchful friends of purity are on the alert, and not one of these conspiracies against human nature has succeeded in the past year.

The legislature of Missouri recently passed an infamous law, but it was vetoed by the governor. Members of the legislature of New York tried to do the same, but the bill never reached a vote. The mayors in several American cities have given special powers to the police, but the people have risen against them and their machinations have ignominiously failed. The most penetrating eyes in Christendom are those of that great leader, Mrs. Josephine Butler, whose recent utterances sound like the blast from a Highland bugle.

Nothing short of such a proclamation and war-cry as ours can arouse the enthusiasm which is necessary to destroy the organized, tolerated and protected institution which aims at securing to evil men safety in the enjoyment of their disgraceful "rights," and which seals the slavery and secures the destruction of millions of women.

I feel sure we all agree with our great leader concerning this crucial test of woman's personal liberty. We will not lower the white flag of the purity cause by the width of a hair. No ingenuity, no evasion, no covert device "for the promotion of the public health" must beguile and no amount of opposition affright us. So long as one woman on the face of the earth is condemned by a man's law to be kept from disease for the express purpose of ministering to his lust so long the women who wear the white ribbon will combine to destroy that law and put the brand of Cain upon the forehead of that man.

What we should wonder at is not that some women have become degraded, but that more have not been thus ground under the hoofs of social tyranny.

The virginal heart of woman asserts itself in every friendless girl who against the awful odds, arms herself with an honorable bread-winning weapon, and spends her life in hopeless toil, often at five shillings a week, when, if she would listen to the whispered temptation that assails her at every opportunity, she might live in idleness and amid the surroundings of comfort, if not of luxury. Think of the needle-women who sit over their work sixteen to eighteen hours in every twenty-four; of the shop-girl who stands behind the counter, being forbidden by her employers to sit down, and who works from eight in the morning till six or eight at night, when in a single day she could earn more than she now does in a month. Think of the girls behind the bar, where they often stay fifteen to eighteen hours a day, and where the brutal words and ways of the patrons enfold them in an atmosphere of degradation, and yet the great majority even of these keep themselves on the firm level of self-respect and decency. If under the grinding conditions of competition such women can hold themselves to a wholesome and cleanly life, what should we not witness of purity and exaltation in these lives if they had a fair chance to earn their bread, and time left for recuperation, recreation and repose? What we must seek to gain for them is the living wage, which has been aptly called "that sum necessary to maintain an average man (or woman) with an average family in an average state of civilized comfort."

The martyrdom of women under existing laws is their actual canonization. The saints of these days are the saints of the shop who fight with greater heroism than the soldiers of Balaclava, that they may not become the sinners of the street.

THE FALL OF A FAMOUS ÆSTHETE.

The fall of Oscar Wilde and the disgrace of the malodorous decadents whose folly finds its climax in that fall, are different acts in the same drama. To seek sensations rather than principles as the final good of life is the creed of this fin de siecle cult, and the falsity and baseness of that creed have received an illustration the most shameful and astounding.

Decent people will be doubly alert hereafter to disavow a school of literature and art whose text-book is made up of verbal conceits by courtesy called "epigrams" that shine with the false fire of the moral morass, or are the Jack-o'-lanterns of that graveyard in which their author has buried his character, reputation and career.

"Art for art's sake," was the shibboleth of that sneering school of barbaric æsthetes who lauded as their leader the man who declared that no harm was ever done by a bad book or an impure picture; and pointed an epigram with the postulate that ethics did very well for humdrum folk, but æsthetics—and decadents at that—alone could charm the disciples of culture and champagne. Truth was too practical for him, justice too prosaic, honor too commonplace.

The stigma that has been placed upon his record makes every home more safe, and must hearten every mother who, in love to God, is training her sons to habits of purity and manliness.

I incline to the opinion that in a more clear-sighted age, when the laws of God written in our members are better understood, this man would have been consigned not to a prison cell, but to the wards of an insane hospital, and I know this to be the judgment expressed by some of England's highest authorities on brain disease.

Oscar Wilde is serving out his sentence. He did not in words confess his crime against society, but he is confessing it by deeds; and it will be well if society, under the arrest of thought that he has given it, discovers that its own record is far from clear.

PERSONAL.

For to me who have no home, and never shall have in this world, the fullness of the gospel bubbles up from the brimming chalice of the homes of other women the wide world through. They are life's living springs that turn the arid waste to fragrant meadow land. And I believe the mother-heart was given to poor humanity for purposes of wider blessing than we have dreamed as yet. It is deep and changeless as the tides of the sea, and no heart beats quite so close to God's as hers who through the sacrament of pain and danger alone can come into her kingdom, and whose face is the first one ever mirrored in the celestial eyes of a little child. And we "new women," "progressive women," "radical women," if so it please any to call us, are devoted altogether to that ideal home which shall equalize the twain whom God hath joined together, and so empower the mother-heart, that it may work its sacred will in winning the stormy heart of man into the safe and blessed harbor where the holiest experiences that life can know shall mellow and exalt the three-fold nature which is yet one in the unity of the spirit and the bond of peace—husband and wife and child.

Lady Henry Somerset was warmly received as she stepped forward to welcome the delegations in the following happy speech:

It is an honor that has been accorded me in the name of the National Women's Temperance Association of England to welcome these delegates that come to us here from every nation; that come to us from such great distances, that come to us from across the ocean, and whose faces we see assembled in this hall, forming a part now of that great home circle that we call the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

It is a fact that we do not forget, for we cherish it in our hearts as English women that our own Margaret Bright Lucas was the first president of this society, and that you, Madam President, as founder of the society, were generous enough to extend to English women the first invitation to join in the great Convention when you held it in your native land, and not only so, but that America was great enough to call upon an English woman to take that position.

The courtesy and kindness that our American sisters have invariably shown to us, the welcome and privileges that have been extended to us when we have crossed the water, make us feel that our welcome cannot be too warm to them. It makes us feel that we are desirous of extending at this moment to all that come to us from all parts of the world a welcome worthy of the occasion.

It is true that England is not yet sufficiently civilized for that welcome to be a national one, for the temperance cause is not yet recognized as the dominant cause of the world. We extend to princes that come to us from foreign lands, the potentates of an hour, a welcome that shall make them understand the power and the greatness of England, but there is a welcome as warm in the hearts of the best of England's population for you to-day, and while the brief visits of foreign potentates may be remembered for a season, I dare to prophesy that this gathering of women will be memorable in the annals of our country long after other incidents have been forgotten.

It is impossible to gauge that which is to make an everlasting mark on history when we live near the time in which that event takes place. We only see these questions in their true proportions when we look at them from a long way off. It has been so in the history of every reform since the world began, and we do not fail to read in the signs of the time the fact that the great victory of the temperance cause, which shall ere long take its rank among the triumphs of good over evil, is surely not far distant. And we feel as English women that none has done more than you have, Madam President, to bring into the lives and into the consciences of women a realization of their true position towards this great evil. We have to thank our American sisters for the pioneer work they have accomplished. We acknowledge that it is the American flag that has been carried by hands brave and true through the colonies of Great Britain; the round-the-world missionaries have hitherto belonged exclusively to your nation. But we believe the stirring words to which we have listened to-day will so arouse the hearts of English women that many will press forward into the field ready to follow in the footsteps of those brave pioneers. We pray this may be so, and we believe the spirit of God will touch the hearts of many here, and will awake our consciences as to what is our national duty with regard to this question in the lands that are very far off.

Not only has this temperance cause drawn together the sisters from near and from far, but it has brought into our midst a sisterly feeling, a kindly, gentle tie that binds as nothing else can bind, and as you, Madam President, walked upon this platform, and as you took your seat and I saw the president of Illinois—the first woman who beckoned you into this work when you consecrated your life to it and gave up a career which according to earthly gauge might have been considered a fairer one—when I saw her throw the flag across your chair—an action which some would have called sentimental—I thought that this was the true sentiment that binds and helps and keeps us together. Praise God that we have sentiment, for it is sentiment that bids us stand for the welfare of the home; it is sentiment that called you forth and made you the mother of the temperance women the world over; it is sentiment that has called these women represented by Jessie Ackermann to-day, that has sent them brave and fearless to bind the white ribbon round the hearts of the nations of the world; it is consecrated sentiment for the welfare of humanity, and a suffering world. It is you, Madam President, that have taught us this, and in the name of the British Women's Temperance Association we welcome you, sisters, one and all to-day.

The first of the World's superintendents' reports, that of work among sailors, was given by Miss Agnes Weston, who came attended by two marines who had served as Christian and temperance toilers for many years. She told of the wonderful work among the blue coats with whom she has so closely woven her life that she is said to be "dipped in a tar bucket and painted blue."

Mrs. Eva Maclaren, World's superintendent of franchise and secretary B. W. T. A., gave an earnest appeal for greater effort in the franchise department as follows:

I have always felt that the brains of American women were like their own rivers and mountains—made of larger proportions, and when I was so happy as to be asked to take the position in this society that I hold, that idea of mine was greatly strengthened.

There are many perhaps who, not knowing the work of the W. C. T. U., fail to realize the great good that it may do, and I, myself, only realized it when I came, as superintendent of the franchise department, into communication with the women of the different countries which are all being moved by this question.

We women workers in the cause of womanhood in England are inheriting the services of those who have worked and suffered in that cause before us. It is easy for us working together as compared to the work of those women in other countries who are pioneering, and when I receive letters from them I realize how great the work is, and how much sympathy we ought to extend to those women in other countries who are at this present time standing alone. There is only one country that has enfranchised its women; in every other country the women are struggling still, and we have only to look at what has recently taken place in Germany to understand what women still have to combat. In Germany women and apprentices may not even hold a meeting, and Germany is not so badly off even then as some other countries. I would suggest to you therefore, you who have not realized what this association may do, all that by its sympathy it may accomplish in helping other countries. As superintendent of this department, at the close of the last Parliamentary session last year I wrote a letter to every branch of the organization, urging them to keep the suffrage well in front. Every superintendent thinks her particular branch of work the most important, but I would emphasize the fact that the franchise is of the first importance to every woman, and the reason of this is that the suffrage is the instrument by which we are going to get everything else that we want. Stand shoulder to shoulder and do not fear to injure any particular work you may have been engaged in by working for the franchise. Do not allow yourselves to be carried away by the statement that is often made that we are selfish in claiming these privileges for ourselves. We claim the franchise on behalf of the thousands of women who are suffering to-day, but who are, and must be, voiceless until they are enfranchised.

A petition for amendment of the Inebriates Acts that a clause be added for prohibiting licensed dealers serving inebriates the worse for drink, was presented by Lady Henry Somerset and indorsed. The reading of telegrams and other minor business brought the Convention to the noontide prayer, after which an adjournment was taken.

WEDNESDAY, 2:30 P. M.

Following the devotional exercises by Mrs. Jennie Fowler Willing, a tender memorial service was conducted by Mrs. Mary T. Burt. Mrs. Hoffman spoke of Mrs. Woodbridge and Mrs. Lathrap. Mrs. Todd paid a beautiful tribute to Mrs. Williams. Of Prebendary Grier, Lady Somerset said: "No man was more universally loved and respected among the temperance speakers of England." Mrs. Burt spoke briefly of the lives and works of the Rev. Dr. Gordon, W. Jennings Demorest and Mrs. Jane Stapler. John N. Stearn's noble work was presented by Mrs. Burgess and Mother Stewart. Mrs. Richard, of China, made the prayer, and the sad service was closed with the beautiful singing by Madame Sterling of Tennyson's "Crossing the Bar."

Parlor meetings by Mrs. Boden, press by Mrs. Edholm, and Bible readings by Mrs. H. W. Smith were next presented. Mrs. Selmer, Denmark, gave a brief address on her work as organizer and lecturer. To Miss Coneybeare was given the pleasant task of telling the Convention about the noble Chief Khama, of South Africa, who is laboring so hard to protect his kingdom, Bechuanaland, from the inroads of the liquor traffic.

The introduction of fraternal delegates from kindred societies was then entered upon. Through the efforts of Mr. Henry J. Osborn nearly one hundred representatives of religious and reform organizations were present. Among them were Walter Maclaren, M. P., whose mother was a sister of John Bright, "the woman's champion in the House of Commons." He said: "If you desire to get your cause carried to a successful issue first concentrate your efforts to obtain Parliamentary franchise. Every door will then be open to you." "He learned that from his mother," was Mother Stewart's quick comment.

Mrs. W. S. Caine responded for her noble husband, who had been obliged to return to his place in the House of Commons. Sir F. Lee, the veteran reformer, said: "Women as well as men should be politicians," a sentiment that met with warm approval. James Whyte, honorary secretary of the United Kingdom Alliance, Dr. Monro Gibson, the old friend of the Crusaders, Madam Thoumaian, the suffering Armenian, and Mrs. Prastorian, of Turkey, were among those who spoke.

Mrs. A. Dyer, whose husband, Alfred Dyer, editor of the Bombay Guardian, well known as a great worker of the opium cause of India, was presented. She introduced a child of a widow from India, the adopted daughter of Pundita Ramabai and a little one whom Miss Willard termed "The coming woman of India." Mrs. Gulick, of Spain, Mrs. Andrew Murray, of South Africa, and others of the foreign delegation were presented.

Frau Cauer and Frau Gizycki, of Berlin, advanced ladies of Germany, where women are forbidden to form unions for political purposes, made speeches.

This was the close of the afternoon session.

WEDNESDAY, 7 P. M.

As the pupils of the Royal Normal College for the Blind sang the dear strains of "Home, sweet Home," the seats in the auditorium were rapidly filled. The singing of these sightless young people was rightly described as extremely pathetic. The evening program was preceded by devotions begun by the singing of the "Star Spangled Banner." Besides the music of Madame Sterling and Miss Pringle, recitations and addresses were given.

Mr. H. J. Wilson, M. P., highly honored by the Convention for his brave stand on the minority report of the Opium Commission, was received with warm demonstration. He made a fine speech on the opium investigation, upbraiding the government for allowing the sale of the drug in India.

Miss Yates of Maine, Mrs. Hoffman of Missouri, Miss Shaffner of China, Mrs. Charles Archibald of Canada, Mrs. Shanghai of China, Mrs. Shepherd of New Zealand, Miss Hallie Q. Brown of Ohio, and Miss Lilian Phelps of Canada, gave addresses. Miss Ackermann was introduced but merely bowed her acknowledgment, on account of her ill health. Mrs. Barker spoke on the silver question with quaint witticism, producing a good collection. The recitation by Mrs. Joseph Parker, the wife of the celebrated divine, given in Yorkshire dialect, was unusually fine. Miss Helen Potter gave her well known impersonation of John B. Gough in costume, which was received with tremendous applause. At a very late hour the session adjourned.

THURSDAY, 10 A. M.

This meeting convened in the small Queen's Hall and was well attended. Mrs. Blaikie, president of the Scottish Woman's Union, conducted the devotional exercises and the Convention at once proceeded to the consideration of the resolutions. They were adopted almost entirely without important debate.

SUMMARY OF RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE THIRD BIENNIAL CONVENTION.

The Convention first decided to reiterate the resolution first adopted by the Crusaders at the rally of the clans in Cleveland, O., 1874, and which reads as follows:

Resolved, That recognizing the fact that our cause is and is to be combatted by mighty, determined and relentless forces, we will, trusting in Him who is the Prince of Peace, meet argument with argument, misjudgment with patience, denunciation with kindness and all our difficulties and dangers with prayer.

Resolved, That the conflict in which we are engaged is so desperate that we need a union of all the forces we can command, and in the same catholic spirit which has characterized us in the past, we welcome to our love and our labors all true women who will unite with us on the basis of faith and prayer and honest hard work.

Resolved, That the basis of this society is total abstinence, total prohibition of the liquor traffic and the opium trade, the enfranchisement of women, purity of personal life and international peace and arbitration and we invite all earnest women who are like-minded with us to join our organization, put on the white ribbon and become soldiers in our peaceful war.

The Convention expressed itself strongly in opposition to the atrocities in Armenia and urgently called upon the British government to use its utmost power to afford protection to our Christian brothers and sisters in Armenia, Macedonia and other provinces where they are ground under the heel of an intolerable tyranny.

It also stated plainly that the W. W. C. T. U. is "utterly opposed to lynching at all times and everywhere" and pledged itself to use its influence against the infliction of penalties for crime except by due process of law.

The convention deplored the action of the British Anti-Opium Commission (giving thanks to H. J. Wilson who dared to stand alone) and that of the Royal Canadian Commission of Inquiry into the results of the liquor traffic whose reports were in the interests of revenue for the government and applauded the House of Commons of Canada which notwithstanding the adverse report of the Commission had declared for National Prohibition pending the action of the Privy Council.

Appreciation was expressed for the work of Mrs. Ormiston Chant and Lady Henry Somerset against living pictures and approval of the bill introduced by women of New York for indecent exhibitions.

Attention was called to the hardworking women who persevere against great hardships to retain personal independence and purity despite temptation.

The convention stood unalterably opposed to the compulsory medical treatment of women under any circumstances when this is done in the interest of impure relations between man and woman.

The Union Signal, official organ of the World's W. C. T. U., The Woman's Signal and Woman's Signal Budget, published in the interest of the B. W. T. A., Young Women, The Young Crusader, and all national white ribbon organs were declared to show forth the spirit and method of the white ribbon movement and should be in the homes of our workers to help develop that intelligent zeal which is essential to the steady growth and the enlistment of new recruits in the white ribbon army.

Oscar Wilde, the sex novel (harmful to the great cause of human rights), dress (a heavy handicap) were all touched upon. Praise for their efficient service was voted to round-the-world missionaries, Mrs. Youmans, Pundita Ramabai, Miss Morgan, of Wales, Miss Alice Briggs, Mrs. Shuman, Miss Mary Gorham, England. The absence of Mother Thompson was deplored and the presence of Mother Stewart a source of gratification. Tender resolutions in memoriam were passed for those gone before.

Various resolutions were presented in addition to those already passed and referred to the sub-committee: Tobacco, Mrs. Ingalls; abuses in almshouses, Mrs. Perkins; Somerset Y's, Miss Kearney; cold water fountains in every land, Miss Gordon.

The report of the corresponding secretary, owing to the sudden death of Mrs. Mary Woodbridge at Chicago last fall, had been prepared by Miss Anna Gordon, assistant secretary.

Twenty-one countries affiliated to the World's W. C. T. U. have sent in their reports, all of which are encouraging to the progress of the cause.

The treasurer's report is as follows:

October 4, 1893, to May 4, 1895.

| RECEIPTS. | | DISBURSEMENTS. | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Balance from last report | $ 410.30 | For foreign work | $1543.35 |
| From annual dues | 2383.84 | For expenses | 3407.43 |
| From donations | 2195.39 | Balance May 24, 1895 | 38.75 |
| | $4989.53 | | $4989.53 |

Miss Kearney, on behalf of Mrs. Barnes, moved that the young woman's department be changed into World's Young Woman's Branch and that the superintendent be made World's general secretary and a member of the World's executive committee.

The convention then listened to an address from Miss de Broen, of Paris, who told of her mission and temperance work in the French capital. Mrs. Willing of New York, and Miss Clara Parrish of Illinois, spoke briefly. Mrs. Stoddard of Texas, Mrs. Walker of Nebraska, and Mrs. M. Watts of Kentucky, told of the advancement of temperance work in the various states of which they are the W. C. T. U. presidents. Mrs. Barker, National treasurer, and Mrs. Sanderson, president of the province of Quebec, also spoke.

Miss Anna Gordon, World's superintendent of juvenile work, in her report said, "The world must make its progress on the feet of little children." She referred to the adoption of the Loyal Temperance Legion by the B. W. T. A. and also of the new work in Norway and Iceland. Madame Sterling's full rich voice was heard in song and the last noontide prayer was made by Mrs. Thurman. A short time was spent in discussing the offer of Miss Willard to place funds given her five years ago by the contribution of the unions of the United States as a nucleus for the round-the-world missionary fund. This was strenuously objected to by the convention which pledged itself to provide for the missionaries in some other way.

As the chimes struck the closing hour the President made tender reference to the time of parting and the "benediction" was given by Mother Stewart. Thus closed the regular business sessions of the World's W. C. T. U.

Lord Mayor's Reception,

THURSDAY, 4 P. M.

A sunshiny afternoon, a cordial welcome and a happy company made the Lord Mayor's reception foremost among the many pleasant incidents of the great Convention.

Promptly at four o'clock the guests assembled in the reception room of the Mansion House, the residence of the Lord Mayor during the season, and were received with great cordiality by the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress. Following the presentations, the civic head of the great metropolis made an informal speech of welcome, inviting the guests to partake of the refreshments, which were served from the long banqueting tables on either side of the handsome hall. On the arrival of Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Willard brief speeches were made, Lady Henry thanking the Lord Mayor for helping English women to show the foreign delegates that "London had given them the best welcome that London could." Miss Willard in a quaint little speech told about the representatives who had gathered together. The Lord Mayor said that in the eight months during which he had held office this was the first function at which he had to stop at the word "Ladies." He referred humorously to the few "monster men" who happened to be present, and welcomed the delegates because they were women engaged in a good cause. "I like that word 'woman,'" he said, "because every lady must be a true woman, and I truly believe that men are what their homes make them." He then accorded the visitors the freedom of the mansion, facetiously excepting "the plate."

The guests passed the balance of the hour in walking about the palatial drawing rooms and the darkly elegant Egyptian banqueting hall in conversation, and then departed, feeling that the Lord Mayor's reception had been an honor indeed to them and their great cause.

The Great Demonstration,

ROYAL ALBERT HALL, LONDON, JUNE 20, 1895.

All that the week's march of events could culminate, and all that the steadily growing power of the temperance forces of every British clan could bring to bear, was focused upon the great climax of the World's W. C. T. U. Convention in Royal Albert Hall, June 20. It was fitting that such a notable pageant should be held in one of the foremost auditoriums of the world, and only the mind and heart of such an influential leader as our World's vice-president-at-large could have conceived and carried into execution so remarkable a demonstration.

Early in the extended twilight of the longest (and now the most memorable) day in the English almanac, the multitude began to gather. Every aisle and corridor at the numerous entrances to the mammoth hall was filled with those who were to take part. Within, the seats rising tier after tier were all occupied, over ten thousand in all.

Never was a more enthusiastic gathering. From the incoming of the two great leaders to the closing moments of the varied panorama, the audience had but a single mind and impulse. Handkerchiefs were waved and hurrahs came from lusty English lungs and "foreigners" soon caught the impetus. The entrance of Miss Willard and Lady Henry Somerset with Madame Sterling and Miss Weston, attended by a body of English total abstinent marines, was the signal for wild enthusiasm. They were followed by the representatives of temperance societies: United Kingdom Band of Hope Union, United Kingdom Alliance, Methodist Temperance Organizations, Congregational Total Abstinence Association, Baptist Total Abstinence Association, New Church Temperance Society, Friends' Temperance Union, London Wesleyan Mission—West, London Wesleyan Mission—East, Temperance Leagues, Anglo-Indian Temperance Association, St. Mary's Training Home for Girls, London Temperance Hospital, Gospel Temperance Army, General Postoffice Temperance Society, Teetotal Policemen, Railway Temperance Union, Army Temperance Association, Teetotal Firemen, Independent Order of Rechabites, Order of Sons of Temperance, Original Grand Phœnix Order, United Phœnix Order, Catholic Total Abstinence League, Independent Order of Good Templars.

As each delegation proceeded down the center aisle with loud plaudits to the place reserved for it, its leader took a position of honor upon the platform area.

The keynote of the great convocation was then struck by the singing of a temperance ode,

"Here we pledge ourselves anew
Not to touch the drunkard's drink."

This theme was woven in every movement of the great dramatic pageant, the climax of which was reached at the entrance of the representatives in costume bearing the flags of the different countries in which the W. C. T. U. is organized to the national airs played by the great organ and band. The enthusiasm was at white heat as the great chorus of one thousand voices joined in singing

"All round the world the ribbon white is twined,
All round the world the glorious light hath shined."

Ten thousand people then sang in unison "Old Hundred," and repeated the Lord's Prayer led by the clear, resonant voice of the Dean of Hereford.

Lady Henry Somerset then stepped into the brass railed pulpit, a winsome figure in dove gray tints standing among the white lilies, and was received with every evidence of loving devotion. Every ear, even to the highest point in the distant galleries, was strained to hear her words of welcome. "In coming to this country the delegates are coming to their own," she said. "The new woman should be the true woman." Her words were full of a gracious hospitality and faith in the triumph of our great cause.

Madame Sterling's voice rang out in a sweet, tender song which was loudly encored.

With her troop of royal yacht marines as a background, Miss Agnes Weston, the "mother of the navy," gave one of her characteristic speeches with its apt illustrations drawn from seaman's lore. "Not only Britons, but people of every free country, must not be slaves of alcohol." "Keep off the lee shore of drink." "Sign the pledge tonight." A pretty scene was enacted as she decorated a number of the seamen with the medals of the navy temperance society for faithful total abstinence. Three naval cheers were given for Miss Willard and Lady Henry Somerset.

"I have been watching the formation of this magnificent human mosaic," said the brilliant Canon Wilberforce, "and one text comes into my mind, 'The Lord shall sell Sisera into the hands of a woman.' When once the women come to the front it's absolutely impossible to resist them." His witty reference to the "female brethren of the nation" was greeted with storms of applause. There now appeared on the great limelight curtain, as had the words of the previous hymns, the text of the first resolution thanking the government for the Local Control (option) bill and urging its immediate passage. Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Bart., M. P., president United Kingdom Alliance, put the resolution in a terse and forceful speech giving this message to the delegates:

"The truths ye speak are spread abroad
By every wind and every tide,
The voice of nature speaks aloud
Upon your side."

Mr. J. H. Raper, also of the United Kingdom Alliance, in seconding the resolution, said he had been keeping in his pocket the long list of delegates published in The Union Signal and had ticked them off as they were presented in the meetings. He heartily seconded the motion.

The great Polyglot Petition which was festooned four times around the big hall and heaped before the platform was the text for Miss Willard's remarks. Our American leader has won her way into the English heart, as her reception clearly showed. She said: "We are like the little girl who brings her seam to show her mother. We have sewed the Great Petition and brought it to show the mother land."

An action song was announced on the program, but few of the audience were prepared for the touching and pathetic object lesson now given. To the melody of the "Battle song of the Y's," a group of little children, ragged, dirty and unkempt, from the West London slums, came upon the front of the platform. They looked about with amazement upon the sea of faces, the distant lights and the warm coloring, touching curiously with their grimy hands the dresses of those seated near them. Then led by their teachers, the "Sisters of the Poor," they sang the affecting words of Mary T. Lathrap:

"There's a shadow on the home, many hearts are sad today,
It hushes e'en the laughter of the children at their play.
At its coming want and sorrow across the threshold creep,
And amid their broken idols the mourning mothers weep."

As the sounds ceased, across the great auditorium came children's voices in the words of the bright chorus:

"We are coming to the rescue; we are coming in our youth!
The homes we build to-morrow shall be guarded by the truth;
We are coming, coming to the battle of purity and right;
And for a winsome token we wear the ribbon white."

A troop of well clad children came down the aisle bearing the white ribbon; they swarmed upon the platform entwining the "winsome token" about the sad little group there gathered and singing their encouraging words all the time. Never was there given a more affecting and striking object lesson. Tears stood in many eyes.

After more singing by the great chorus and Madame Sterling, the chairman presented Mother Stewart, who was given an ovation but who did not attempt to speak, so full was her heart.

Mrs. Hoffman of Missouri, who was greeted with rounds of applause, and Mrs. Rounds of Illinois, spoke briefly and pertinently, both having been overcome by the power of the demonstration they had witnessed.

The resolution endorsing the Great Petition was now passed on motion of Miss Agnes Slack, seconded by Dr. Henry Lunn, and was followed by one that a deputation, headed by the president and vice-presidents of the W. W. C. T. U. be appointed to present the two resolutions, moved by Mr. Whyte, secretary U. K. Alliance, and seconded by Dr. Hilton. Miss Phelps of Canada, Miss Hallie Brown of Ohio, Miss Yates of Maine, and Miss Kearney of Mississippi, gave brief sentence speeches which, with the doxology and benediction, the great meeting came to an end.

Reception and Garden Fete

AT REIGATE PRIORY

The quaint and beautiful English village of Reigate was stormed on Friday afternoon by white-ribboners, whose processional advent along the leafy, peaceful streets was looked upon with interest by the inhabitants of Lady Henry's quiet retiring place. Two long excursion trains had rapidly borne the happy host out from the city, and to the delegates, worn somewhat with constant attendance at the great meetings and interludes of sight-seeing, the sweet country air and genial sunshine of the perfect June day were as nectar to a thirsty spirit.

The long line of women, with here and there a favored man, proceeded along the village streets, past the familiar "Cottage" (recognized at once by many), and through the gates to the Priory, whose long, low, simple outlines gave little indication of the wealth and beauty within. Just inside the first entrance our Chief, with a happy and pertinent word for each, received the guests, whose number was nearly one thousand. At the door of the great hall, Lady Henry Somerset graciously made all feel at home. The fine mansion was thrown open to the visitors, who soon invaded every corner,—into the perfectly decorated, pale green silk-hung drawing-room; the library in white and gold, with its hundreds of rare volumes; the dining-room, with its dark wainscotings and handsome red tapestry hangings; the dainty reception room, and others rich in rare furniture, portraits, armor and bric-a-brac. But the chief points of interest were the "dens"; Miss Willard's with its simple, comfortable furnishings recognized at once by "mother's" picture over the mantel and the familiar traveling hand-bag with its initials, F. E. W., lying upon the desk. Lady Henry's room appeared very thought-inviting. The familiar face of the beloved Quaker poet looked down upon the temperance workers of many lands who peeped into this sanctum of the reform leader.

Out upon the lawn and in the garden the scene was a festive one. Under a magnificent willow tree a band (appropriately of women) played lively melodies. At the long tables beneath the canvas tent and at many smaller tables near, the guests were being served in true English fashion. It was a sociable, friendly company, for no other introduction was needed than the significant knot of white. Armenian and Scandinavian, Indian and South African, German, Swedish and French delegates mingled with those of English speaking countries in unhedged social converse, giving the gathering a real cosmopolitan character. Of course, with such a company speech-making could not be omitted, so a platform was improvised, and those who could get within hearing distance doubtless heard much that was witty and wise. The occasion was honored by the presence of the Countess Somers, Lady Henry's mother, vying with her daughter in youthful looks. Countess Somers is greatly interested in the reform work of her noble daughter, reading THE UNION SIGNAL and following the progress of the great reform.

So much had the weather, the occasion, the surroundings and the lavish hospitality delighted the happy guests that it was with regret they heard the sweet bells of the Priory clock announce the hour of departure. It will be long before the tourists "forget that day in June" which took them into the sunshine of Lady Henry Somerset's comradely hospitality.

CONVENTION NOTES.

When prohibition comes the sharp point of the thistle shall prick the bubble of Scotch whisky. Every Shamrock shall be a four-leaved clover. The Indian corn in its waving wealth shall mean not beer but bread.—Frances E. Willard, at the Great World's Demonstration.

Many requests for membership are coming to the B. W. T. A. secretaries as the result of the pre-convention Sunday services. One hundred and sixty-six services were held through the efforts of Miss Gorham, whose admirable directions meet with commendation on all hands.

The Polyglot Petition will start on its round-the-world journey this summer in charge of the W. C. T. U. leaders, Norway being the first objective point.

Miss Morgan, superintendent of petitions in the W. W. C. T. U., writes that she has counted ninety thousand names to the Polyglot Petition, and all of these have been secured by British women within the last six weeks.

The total of British names is now well nigh half a million, as a large number had been sent previous to the work of Miss Morgan.

Mrs. Selmer, the Scandinavian organizer, brought ninety names from Belgium, a country that has as little sympathy with the prohibition of the liquor traffic as any that could be named.

An excursion to Winsdor Castle was arranged for Saturday, June 22.

One white-ribboner climbed the stairs to her room in the hotel for two days, having been told there was no elevator. At the end of that time she discovered the "lift" and then thought London not so far behind New York.

Madame Sterling made a telling point for the vegetarians when she said that she had lost forty-two pounds of overflesh in four months through adopting that régime.

The shaded lights and perfect ventilation of Royal Albert Hall made it a pleasure to sit within the walls with so many thousands in view. The many and strictly ordered rules for entrance and exit to the various parts of the hall were absolutely faultless in perfectness of arrangement.

The London newspapers, crowded as they were with many matters at the height of the season, gave considerable space to the convention proceedings, especially the Chronicle and Echo. All united in saying that Royal Albert Hall had never witnessed such a notable demonstration as that of Thursday evening.

The authorized capital of the White Ribbon Publishing Company is 10,000 shares at £1 each, of which 1,000 shares have already been taken. A call was made to members of the B. W. T. A. to subscribe for 2,000 shares at once as more capital is needed. The company published between three and four million pages of literature last year besides the weekly and monthly papers with an average circulation of 9,000.

"Among our members THE UNION SIGNAL is the favorite paper," said a B. W. T. A. delegate during the discussion of literature.

Mrs. Bamford Slack, in charge of political work of the B. W. T. A., has started a Direct Veto van, which has visited seventy-five villages with speakers. Meetings have been held, literature distributed and people visited in their homes.

The balloting room of the B. W. T. A. is a simple and convenient arrangement. Here members repair for the casting of ballots between certain hours.

Rev. Isitt, of New Zealand, claimed that he came from the most civilized country on the face of the earth, for it has removed the barbaric relic of woman's disfranchisement.

"Do Everything," the new manual of the W. W. C. T. U., written by our President, is complete, helpful and concise.

Not a foreign delegate will believe in face of the week's beautiful weather in the time-honored myth of "London fog and rain." Rain coats and umbrellas were wholly unnecessary.

Mrs. Josephine Butler's detention in Switzerland on account of ill-health, was deeply regretted by every one who knew of her great work.

Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew and Dr. Kate Bushnell did not attend the Convention, as they are resting in Switzerland preparatory to their work upon the continent. Their absence was keenly felt.

The names of those for whom the memorial service was held are to be entered in the Crusade Bible by vote of the Convention.

Miss Helen Hood and Mr. H. J. Osborn, effective and indefatigable workers, did more than any other individuals to contribute to the great success and smooth running of the complicated details in connection with these remarkable gatherings.

Lady Battersea and Lady Harcourt (the American wife of the Chancellor of the Exchequer) who were present on the night of the great demonstration, sent a note of appreciation of the remarkable manner in which Lady Somerset presided upon the platform.

"I understand this is the first woman's meeting ever held in Royal Albert Hall," said Mrs. Hoffman, "but there'll be another one."

Mrs. Rounds was certain that many of the delegates would never return to England because she was certain that many would not go home!

The beautiful, carved rocking chair presented to Lady Henry Somerset by the Massachusetts W. C. T. U. in 1892 was a familiar object in the Priory at Reigate.

The Y's held meetings between times, called by the Hon. Mrs. Russell and addressed by Miss Mahon and Miss Parrish, of Illinois, and Miss Kearney, of Mississippi.

A farewell meeting was held in Exeter Hall, Strand, on Sunday, June 23, with Miss Willard presiding.

The Woman's Signal published an excellent and prompt number, edited by Mrs. Mary B. Willard, which was highly commended by all who saw it.

Miss Agnes Weston, the motherly World's superintendent, has labored among the sailors for twenty-four years. "Some one asked me," said she, "if I put the blue jackets to bed. 'Yes, and tuck them in, too,'" I replied.

Norway sent a cable: "Greetings. God be with you."

A telegram from Dr. Norman Kerr, received with much regret, read: "Called away. Congratulations."

"Get you a white ribbon choir in all your countries," said Miss Willard. The singing of this choir was par excellence, and their costume of blue, with white ribbon decorations, was very appropriate and pleasing.

Miss Agnes Slack, the young, energetic and deep-voiced corresponding secretary of the W. W. C. T. U., just elected, was one of the first woman guardians in Darbyshire. She was born and has always resided at Ripley, one hundred miles from London, and has been a "teetotaler" all her life. Her brother is Mr. Bamford Slack, a London editor. Miss Slack has had in her two years of active public life many calls to lecture on temperance, politics and the woman question. She has also occupied pulpits, preaching upon these subjects. As a member of the executive committee of the Liberal Federation and the Central Suffrage Society, and as honorary secretary of the B. W. T. A. she brings many links to the tie that binds around the world.

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

I say unto you, Whatsoever ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them.—Mark 11:24.

Two more conditional pledges have been secured during the past week, one of $5,000 from Miss Helen Culver, Chicago, and $1,000 from Mr. Charles L. Hutchinson, Chicago. The subscription book now foots up $59,500. Besides this over $10,000 in outright gifts have been received up to July 1, which will all be credited on the $300,000. Our friends want to remember that every dollar sent to the Temple this year is credited on the above amount which we are trying to secure by January 1. Every little child that fills a Wheel is swelling the sum just so much. It is a fact worthy of note that with the exception of Mr. Marshall Field's subscription, women so far have been the most liberal subscribers.

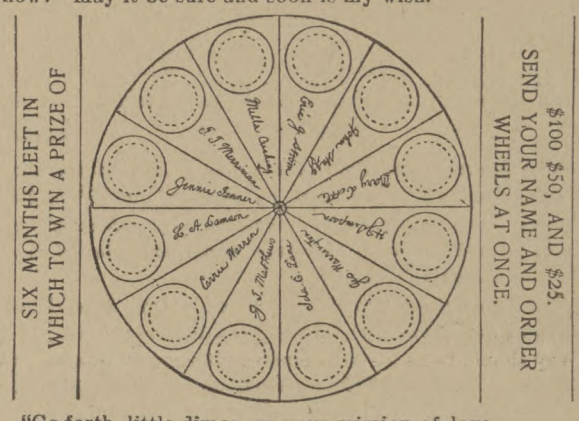
No truer friends of the Temple can be found than General John Bidwell and his noble wife. They have pledged $50,000 to the Temple if they can sell six or seven thousand acres of their beautiful ranch which is delightfully situated on the banks of the Sacramento river at Chico, Butte county, California. No richer, more productive land can be found anywhere. It will raise in abundance anything from potatoes to oranges and is bountifully supplied with water. The following extract from a letter received from General Bidwell last week, shows how deep is his interest in the House Beautiful. "My faith is unshaken that sometime and in some way, perhaps by one swoop, you are to free the Temple from debt. Oh, when? how? May it be sure and soon is my wish."



"Go forth, little dimes, on your mission of love,
We bid you Godspeed on your way,
To strengthen the hands and encourage the hearts,
By helping to speed the glad day
When our beautiful Temple from debt is made free,
Like a bright beacon light may it stand,
For mariners wrecked on the ocean of life,
Safely moored by the 'White Ribbon' band."

The above lines accompanied a filled Wheel received from the Deep River, Conn., W. C. T. U. The author of this pretty verse was too modest to give her name.

How we wish we could impress both old and young in regard to the ease with which a Temple Wheel can be filled when there is a will to do it. The following examples are given for the benefit of those who have not had the courage as yet to send for one. Mrs. Mary O. Dickey, Middleburg, N. H., sends a Wheel and says she celebrated her seventy-fourth birthday by getting it filled and enjoyed it greatly. Willie Gibson, East Ryegate, Vt., a seven year old boy, "started out this morning with his Wheel and returned at noon with it filled," writes his mother. A Wheel is sent from Adams, Ill., filled by Mrs. Read, who will be eighty-two years old in October. "She is so interested in the work," writes Mrs. H. L. Yandy, "she wants to fill another Wheel." Miss Carrie S. Buzby, Moorestown, N. J., sends a Wheel. She says it was filled by a little boy, Willard Shinn, who was full of enthusiasm and secured the desired amount in two hours, for which he received as a premium a handsome pocket knife. Miss Buzby further writes: "I am delighted with my return of eighty Wheels. I got fifteen Wheels taken at the county convention and have some to take to the school of methods at Ocean Grove." Oh, for ten thousand such women! Mrs. W. H. Woodman, Columbia, South Dakota, writes: "I received my Wheel a few days ago. My little boy filled it in two days, after school hours, as I was not able to attend to it." The new premium of a two-bladed pocket knife of the best steel, for boys, is taking well. Mrs. S. A. Packard, Hackettstown, N. J., says: "The knife reached me to-day; it is a beauty for the boys."

The following are additional names of donors of July coupons on Temple Trust Bonds: Mrs. H. B. Shaw, L. G. Russell, Mrs. Eliza M. Dale, Mrs. J. M. Abrams and the Misses Abrams, Miss Lucy C. Nichols, Anna Donaldson, Margaret A. Phelps, Carrie McDowell.

In a late number of THE UNION SIGNAL in crediting receipt of money from Mrs. H. M. H. Taylor, of Taunton, Mass., the name was spelled Wheeler by mistake.

All orders for Temple Wheels, mite-boxes, and Baby Band lists, and everything pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, The Temple, Chicago. Send two-cent stamp for either the Temple Wheel or mite-box. Money orders and checks should be made out in the name of Mr. G. B. Shaw, treasurer, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, Room 1111, The Temple, Chicago.

NATIONAL REFORM CONFERENCE.

[Reported by Kate Lunden.]

PROHIBITION PARK, STATEN ISLAND, N. Y., June 28 to July 3, 1895.

FIRST SESSION.

JUNE 28, 8 P. M.

Once more the friends of reform have reasoned together. Obedient to the call of the leaders, the chosen representatives of the various groups who labor for the betterment of humanity, assembled at the Mecca of prohibition, the evening of June 28, prepared for combat and if practicable, for union.

The committee of arrangements, probably thinking of a time-honored custom, had given precedence to women and the first swords of argument were crossed over woman suffrage; the affirmative, sharpened by long contact with prejudice and ignorance, wielded by Miss Harriette S. Keyser, the well-known suffragist; the negative, showing here and there the spots of ancient rust, chivalrously flourished by Wm. Everett Hicks, of New York, in behalf of that ideal condition, miraged in the dreams of tender-hearted men.

The session was opened by Mr. E. J. Wheeler, of the Voice, who, as a prelude, read the call to the Conference, and appointed Mr. A. M. Harris, of Prohibition Park, chairman for the evening.

Miss Keyser declared that woman suffrage is a part of the philosophy of liberty and justice, but there is nothing people are so cowardly about as justice.

An objection to woman suffrage is that women cannot bear arms. Who raised the money for the Christian commission? Who gave the soldiers to the war? Abraham Lincoln said that the war could not have been carried on without the women whether they gave their service to the country in the hospitals among the wounded and dying, or at the hearth-stones, sending their best and dearest to the battlefield.

Woman suffrage stands for political equality, social equality and industrial equality, and it is the first step towards industrial reform.

"Some have declared," concluded the champion of equal rights, "that the voice of the people is the voice of God. If so His voice has never been heard, for one-half of the people have never spoken. Give that half the freedom of speech if you want your homes protected, for no woman can preserve her home without the ballot."

To this Mr. Hicks, acknowledging that he was in a delicate position, made answer. Paying a high tribute to woman, whose sphere had no limit, he advanced the opinion that the majority of the silent sisterhood is against suffrage. If there were no other reasons why woman should not have the ballot, it would be a sufficient objection that enfranchisement would endanger maternity. It is because the men want to diminish the dangers of this sacred function that they oppose woman suffrage.

"Why should there be a woman wage-earner?" queried Mr. Hicks. The root of the question lies in the poverty. Fifty years ago very few women worked; they only presided over their homes. Does any rational man believe that poverty is not the cause of woman's appearance in the industrial world? Did not know of a single scheme put forward by the woman suffrage leaders that aims at the destruction of poverty.

Men believe, informed Mr. Hicks, that motherhood has not been reduced to a science. There is more to do for women than to cast a ballot.

Miss Keyser, allotted ten minutes for reply, was pleased to know that woman's sphere had no limit, as gallantly asserted by her opponent.

Maternity in danger? No. The population of Wyoming has increased instead of decreased under woman suffrage. Did not women have to work fifty years ago? Yes, harder than now because they did not have the appliances now in use which lessen labor. And the wage-earners of to-day were by no means confined to the sweat-shops. Look at the army of professional women.

"If woman has not reduced motherhood to a science," pertinently asked Miss Keyser, "pray who has?" In all the biographies of great men it is the mother who is credited with moulding their character; the father almost never.

During the general discussion that followed the audience was informed that in some places it took all day to vote. (Just think of it! Would not the universe get out of gear if a woman took a day off in three hundred sixty-five for the fulfillment of her duties as citizen?)

SECOND SESSION.

AFTERNOON, JUNE 29.

This session had for its subject one of the most discussed and most entangled questions of to-day, viz, "The Currency."

An able paper on "Government Notes," by Rev. James H. Ecob, D. D., of Albany, was first read by Mr. Wheeler. The trend of Dr. Ecob's arguments was shown by this quotation from Aristotle: "Money exists not by nature but by law." Money is not a value in itself but simply a medium for the exchange of real values, which are natural wealth and the product of labor. All that the people want to know is that the government is back of their currency and the fiat of the government decides the matter as to standard.

Dr. Boole, the veteran Prohibitionist, who gave as reason for speaking, that he knew nothing about the subject, repudiated the expression "fiat," arguing that it was the intrinsic value in gold that made it a standard of values. This opened a lively and interesting discussion, cut short by the time limit, and then Mr. Charles B. Spahr, of The Outlook, took the platform in defense of the "Double Standard."

One of the principles laid down by the speaker was that the value of money, as of everything else, depends upon the relative supply and demand. He believed in bimetallism because it gives a juster dollar and commends itself to the conscience. It is in the interest of general prosperity and in the interest of the classes who have been most wronged. The gold dollar is dishonest against common sense and against humanity.

Into the facts, tables and arguments of the bimetallist, the single standard advocate, Prof. George Gunton, of the school of social economics, New York, pitched headlong. He was distinctly in favor of bimetallism, but favored at the same time the single standard, which meant a single metal as a monetary unit by which values should be measured. The standard never circulated on the fiat; it did so because it was property, and the fiat, the stamp, does nothing but assure the public what it is. The proposition that the value of money depends upon supply and demand is mist and belongs to the middle ages.

Space forbids a report of the animated discussion following, which the closing of the session did not even end. One thing was apparent, the bimetallists were in the majority.

THIRD SESSION.

EVENING, JUNE 29.

Discussion:—"Free Coinage of Silver."
Affirmative:—Hon. John P. St. John, of Kansas.
Negative:—Everett P. Wheeler, of New York.
Chairman:—Dr. I. K. Funk.

Gold or silver cure, that is the question. Uncle Sam is suffering the tortures of financial fever, and the doctors fight over the remedies.

The negative side was presented first. Mr. Wheeler thought the right thing to do is to adhere to the present monetary system with some changes. But a dollar one way or another should have the same purchasing power.

What maintains the present condition of the currency? The confidence of the people that the government will redeem the circulating medium in gold. The free coinage of silver would be to bring us to a single silver standard, which would be the same as bankruptcy, making it necessary to pay debts with fifty cents on a dollar.

The great majority of the people are creditors,—a workingman is a creditor, the employer his debtor,—and it is of utmost importance that they be paid in money having fixed value. The whole matter depends upon the fixedness, the certainty of the dollar. We do not want the gold or silver for circulation; besides, all the gold and silver in the world would not suffice for our transactions. The whole object of money is to make a standard. Systems of credit and notes are preferred to the cumbersome metals.

The gray-haired apostle of Prohibition succeeded the Democratic defender of our present financial system. "Ex-governor St. John had chosen," said Dr. Funk in his introduction, "to be with the children of truth rather than with United States senators, and he avowed himself an advocate of honest money."

"An honest dollar is a dollar that is just as good as any other dollar," explained the speaker, "and such a dollar we have not had since the demonetization of silver."

The ex-governor reviewed briefly the history of American currency. The ratio between gold and silver had not varied in eighty-one years and there was no necessity for the striking down of silver. No greater act of robbery was ever committed than the law of 1873. A fifty cent dollar is a dishonest dollar; the dollar that made it fifty cents is a dishonest dollar; the law that made it fifty cents is a dishonest law, and the Congress that enacts it is a disgraceful Congress—sentiments applauded to the echo by the audience.

Mr. St. John agreed with Dr. Ecob and some of the previous speakers that it was the fiat of the government that made the money. We never had anything but fiat money. Gold and silver should both be demonetized if it were not for the fact that we have an enormous debt payable in coin.

A political party cannot be shown that has not declared for bimetallism and it is on account of broken pledges we have this free silver discussion.

What has been the result of the demonetization of silver? The population has increased twenty-five per cent, the national wealth fifty per cent, and the indebtedness one hundred and fifty-six per cent. Fifty-two families out of every one hundred are tenants to-day, in New York city no less than ninety-two on a hundred, and the state of New York has an indebtedness of one billion six hundred and eight million dollars.

"When we have found out what the enemy wants that is just what we do not want," closed the orator. "Let us make a monetary system for ourselves and if England does not like it let her help herself."

The negative side in closing accused Mr. St. John of wanting to take a man with an ounce of silver worth fifty cents to the mint and get it coined into a dollar. Mr. Wheeler agreed, however, with the affirmative that one dollar ought to be as good as another.

A general discussion followed and hot were the shots fired at the Belmonts, Rothschilds et al. who have during the last months practically made the country get down on its knees before them. "Their power must be fought and conquered," exclaimed a delegate from Pennsylvania and the audience agreed.

Mr. E. J. Wheeler, of the Voice, after getting the floor or rather a table, said that Mr. St. John had done exactly what he expected. He had delivered a magnificent speech and impaled himself on the horns of a dilemma.

Mr. Wheeler objected to the free coinage of silver because it is obscuring the real issue before the people, viz.: the question who shall control the volume of the currency or who shall coin the money, the bankers, the silver miners, the gold miners or the government.

The ex-governor in his reply owned his embarrassment at being thus impaled, but maintained the position that free coinage of silver means the same money for tenant and landlord.

Mindful of the principal object of the conference, level-headed Thaddeus B. Wakeman, of New York state executive committee of the People's party, now propounded the important question: "How shall we represent the sentiment of the large majority here in the next election?"

Mr. Wakeman proposed a nominating committee composed of representatives of all the reform parties, thus making an agreement on candidates possible, such a committee to be recommended by this conference. "If the reform element cannot get together at the polls it is no use to get together anywhere else," was the sensible reasoning of Mr. Wakeman.

[The fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth sessions were reported in full by our special representative, Miss Lunden, but owing to the pressure of the World's Convention report and other matters of special interest, we regret our inability to find space for them.—EDS.]

NINTH AND FINAL SESSION.

EVENING, JULY 3.

After the combat, the union; the Conference was not in vain.

This final and most important session was presided over by the well-known Trojan, Henry Clay Bascom. Dr. L. A. Banks, of Brooklyn, led in prayer, and, as an opening address, Mrs. Imogene C. Fales, of Brooklyn, gave her able answer to the question: "Is a union of reform forces desirable and feasible?"

There is nothing so dangerous as tame submission to evil, said Mrs. Fales. This Conference proves that the American spirit, long inert, has risen in its might. A crisis has been reached, not only in our country but throughout the whole world. The system that prevails in the brute creation prevails in the business world to-day: The struggle for existence. The growing power and accumulation of wealth is undermining our institutions. To-day capital controls the press and largely the pulpit.

The three parties, Populist, Prohibitionist and Socialist, have converged so close together that it is almost a crime against humanity for them to remain apart. Even if they remain as distinct parties let them unite on the candidates in all future elections. If such a union is possible, this Conference will stand in importance second only to the first sacred Conference of the colonies.

A paper by Hon. C. C. Bonney of Chicago, entitled "The Reform Platform of 1895," was next read by Mr. E. J. Wheeler. Judge Bonney constructed the platform of twelve solid planks. Space permits only an outline of what might be called a crystallized statement of the great questions at present agitating the minds of the reformers as follows:

1. Recovery of the political power from the great monopolies.
2. Restriction and control of all such monopolies.
3. Actual control by the people, through their public officers, of the means of transportation, the supply of water, light and the like necessaries.
4. The constant advocacy and promotion by every available means of the substitution of the divine principle of co-operation for the doctrine of relentless competition.
5. The enforcement of law and order in every part of the republic.
6. The transfer of tariff administration from the legislative to the executive department of the government and the creation of a permanent tariff commission.
7. A distinct and emphatic committee of all the forces of government—municipal, state and national—against the evils of the liquor traffic.
8. The thorough reform and reorganization of the entire system of the suffrage laws, in such a way as to base the right to vote upon suitable age, intelligence and character.
9. The largest practical use of both gold and silver as the money of the country.
10. Civil service reform and a civil service pension after a prescribed term of faithful service.
11. The thorough and radical reconstruction of the American systems of taxation and revenue.
12. The thorough reform of the executive and judicial administration.

The committee appointed at a previous session now announced that it was ready to report. Quincy L. Morrow of Maryland was chosen secretary and the following resolutions, framed and adopted by the committee, were then presented.

RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved, That we demand the direct legislation, through the Initiative and Referendum in national, state and local matters, the Imperative Mandate and proportional representation.

Resolved, That we demand, that when any branch of legitimate business becomes a monopoly in the hands of a few against the interests of the many, that industry should be taken possession of on just terms by the municipality, the state, or the nation, and administered by the people.

Resolved, That we demand the election of president, vice-president and United States senators by direct vote of the people, and also of all civil officers as far as practicable.

Resolved, That we demand equal suffrage without distinction of sex.

Resolved, That as the land is the rightful heritage of the people we demand that no tenure should hold without use and occupancy.

Resolved, That we demand the prohibition of the liquor traffic for beverage purposes and government control of the sale for medicinal, scientific and mechanical purposes.

Resolved, That we demand that all money, paper, gold and silver should be issued by the government only and made legal tender for all payments, public or private, on future contracts, and in amount adequate to the demands of business.

Resolved, That we demand the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the ratio of 16 to 1.

The resolutions were taken up and adopted first seriatim and afterwards as a whole. With the exception of the last resolution around which the municipal discussion centered, their adoption was almost unanimous, the loudest applause being bestowed upon the fourth and sixth, those touching woman suffrage and prohibition.

The committee also submitted the following additional report:

Moved, That our secretary be requested to communicate with the authoritative heads of the Populists, Prohibitionists, Socialists, Silver Party, Single Taxes and other reform elements, requesting them to call an instructed convention of these reform forces, to be held in Chicago or some other central city, sometime between October 1st and March 1st next, to consider the resolutions passed and the union of reform forces. Also that we request the heads of these reform parties to hold their conventions for nominating the president of the United States in 1896 at the same city and on the same day.

This report was approved and the committee re-appointed for the purpose of carrying into effect the suggestions embodied in the report.

This finished the business before the house and the National Reform Conference stood adjourned.

The Fourth of July celebration in Prohibition Park fittingly concluded the Reform Conference. John G. Woolley, Sam Small, Rollo Kirk Bryan, the Beveridges and a prohibition banquet after nine sessions of reform discussion!

While the rain fell in torrents "the prophet of a new dispensation" interpreted the "voices" of the closing age and his brother "fanatic" from the South hurled his anathemas at false reform. At the hotel the cold water "cranks" drank to the memory of departed leaders in aqua pura—could a more appropriate closing have been suggested?

The Lord gave the word; the women that publish the tidings are a great host.—Ps. 58:11.

DEVELOPMENT OF THE WORLD'S W. C. T. U.

The wise suggestion made by Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt, that dauntless explorer who laid the foundations of the World's W. C. T. U., has been followed out so far as possible. She said on her return to us in 1891 that the true method of introducing the society is to secure the services of good women living in the various countries and to keep them at work founding local organizations until sufficient strength is attained to combine these in a national society. This policy would have been carried out at once in every distant country if the money with which to pay the necessary salaries had been at the command of the leaders, but a president of the India W. C. T. U. was appointed as soon as they were able, Mrs. Jeannette Hauser, who had already lived fifteen years in that country, was familiar with its language and trusted by its people. Mrs. Hauser, at great personal sacrifice, traveled largely and laid sure foundations. On her return home in 1894, Mrs. Mary R. Phillips, of Calcutta, also a remarkably capable and well experienced missionary, was elected at Mrs. Hauser's suggestion in her place.

We have also secured the services of Miss Dunton, of Japan, who was with Miss West on that memorable visit to the Flowery Kingdom which crowned her lifelong devotion to the temperance cause, and as soon as the present belligerent attitude of the Chinese people is changed to one of peace she will enter zealously upon her labors.

Miss Alice Palmer who was sent out by us in 1892 has traveled and organized continuously in South Africa with most encouraging results, and will go from there to remain in, and "work up," some other country equally in need of systematic temperance endeavor.

Australia, under the energetic and skillful management of Miss Jessie Ackermann, has become one of our most powerful national auxiliaries, and in New Zealand it is the testimony of the chief officers of the British government that the W. C. T. U. held the foremost place in the successful work that has resulted in the enfranchisement of women.

Norway, led by Countess Ida Wedel-Jarlsberg and her vigilant lieutenant, Miss Esmarck, is rapidly becoming a W. C. T. U. country, and Mrs. Selmer, of Copenhagen, our vice-president in Denmark, will be answerable for securing organizations in her own country and throughout those portions of the Scandinavian peninsula that have thus far failed to respond to our earnest and oft repeated invitations to come with us "and we would do them good."

In Russia the daughter of Count Tolstoi has accepted the vice presidency, and the great author himself has formed a total abstinence society; but progress must be slow under these northern skies. The ploughshare that is breaking up the force of traditional habit is Count Tolstoi's own; wherever his books fall into the furrow as seeds, there springs up a harvest of spiritual life and co-operating brotherhood.

In Germany Mrs. Mary B. Willard is our base of operations and holds the fort in her American Home School for Girls, Berlin; but as we well know, Germany, France and Italy form the core of that great crystal of conservatism concerning total abstinence, which is centuries old and will yield last of all. So we are highly gratified that our third and fourth intrepid missionaries, Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew and Dr. Kate C. Bushnell, are soon to lay siege upon that uncultivated soil.

In Spain there is a point of light in the school for the higher education of women founded by Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Gulick in the famous watering place of San Sebastian, and in Paris the initials so dear to us are to be found on the window of Miss De Broen's headquarters, 205 Rue St. Honoré, where she keeps our publications and furnishes a rendezvous for white-ribboners visiting the gay capital of modern civilization and sin.

In Great Britain the white-ribbon movement is now at the forefront of the battle. The principality of Wales has been added within the last year to the enrolled and disciplined army; Scotland is marching on, and an initial effort was made in Dublin, in which the presidents of the World's and British societies co-operated, to introduce some knowledge of our methods and spirit to great and generous-hearted Irish audiences. This work is to be followed up by Miss Hood and other indefatigable spirits, and it is fully expected that at the B. W. T. A. Convention next year Ireland will be reported as an auxiliary.

The United States and Canada have held their own during the stress and turmoil of an unparalleled financial struggle. Specific efforts to secure prohibition in states have been postponed until a new alignment of political parties, reinforced by enfranchised manhood, should give us better promise of securing the laws we want and electing such officers as will enforce these laws. It is not that we have by one jot or tittle changed our purpose or lowered our flag, we are simply recruiting and consolidating our forces, only "getting a good ready," to use the homely old phrase, when we shall return to the conflict with renewed vigor and munitions of war sufficient to "pulverize the rum power."

HOW THE ENGLISH PULPITS WERE FILLED.

Nothing more significant of progress in public opinion has occurred since the beginning of the white ribbon movement than the opening for our delegates of nearly two hundred pulpits and halls where public religious services are held in London and the suburbs, or what is called the "metropolitan area." Even in go-ahead America we have never had more than sixty, and that was considered to be bordering on a miracle. Such a result secured at the world's capital marks the utmost advance of woman in capturing the citadels of ecclesiasticism in the name of gospel freedom.

If the women who conduct the white ribbon movement in England were not "pure womanly" this result would never have been reached, and it is no more than simple justice to make a note of the fact that Miss Mary Gorham, herself a member of the church of England and superintendent of the evangelistic department of the British Women's Temperance Association, has generaled this remarkable piece of Christian enterprise to a success. The result was not reached in a day. Miss Gorham has been working on this problem for four months in her usual systematic way.

She first called personally upon the leading pastors of known largeness of heart, securing their allegiance to the plan. With this leverage she was able to move on other excellent ministers of less progressive tendencies. Miss Gorham went as the representative of Lady Henry Somerset, and having called on these ministers in her name and secured their assent, a letter from Lady Henry was then sent out by the evangelistic department, giving the names of those who had already acceded to the society's request. The response to this included many of the best known names of English clergymen and ministers. When they had given their consent a circular was sent out asking the following questions:

Are you willing to have a poster on the bulletin board at the door of your church, advertising the World's and B. W. T. A. Conventions?

Are you willling to have notices of these meetings handed out to the people as they pass into the church?

Will you personally advertise the meetings from your pulpit the Sunday before they occur?

The last circular sent out by Miss Gorham is as follows:

NATIONAL BRITISH WOMEN'S TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

(INCORPORATED.)

FEDERATED TO THE W. W. C. T. U.

President.....LADY HENRY SOMERSET.

Metropolitan Sunday services, June 16, in connection with the great international W. W. C. T. U. Convention, and annual council B. W. T. A.

DEAR SIR:—We have much pleasure in sending you the name of the speaker for the B. W. temperance service you have so kindly consented to hold in your church, on Sunday evening, June 16.

We shall be very thankful if in advertising this service from your pulpit you will mention the forthcoming Convention and annual meetings and kindly speak a strong word for our National B. W. T. A., the chief aim of which is the rescue of our tempted and fallen sisters through the sin of drunkenness, and the promotion of temperance and purity of life,

Name of speaker.....

Present address.....
London address.....

The speaker will come to the door of your vestry just before the special service unless you desire otherwise, in which case will you kindly write to the address given, stating your wishes.

We are sending a large bill of our great forthcoming meetings which you were good enough to promise you would allow to be posted in some conspicuous place. We shall be glad if this may be done at once.

The small notices for distribution at the doors of your church are also being sent.

We shall be anxious to know, as far as possible, the result of this effort. You will very greatly oblige us and assist our work by answering the following questions after the service is over.

With many thanks for your valuable co-operation.

Yours faithfully, MARY C. GORHAM,
National Evangelistic Superintendent and National Treasurer.
Judde Place, Tonbridge.

(Miss) M. GORHAM,
Judde Place, Tonbridge,
National Evangelistic Superintendent and National Treasurer.

If question No. 3 requires more space to answer, please use the other side of the paper and also add anything further that may be of interest.

The specifications of this circular are so suggestive that we have reproduced them for the use of women in other large cities than the world's metropolis. Miss Gorham says that she could have got five hundred places just as easily if we had had speakers to fill them.

We greatly hope that from this time forth, taking example by this most systematic plan so successfully carried out, every convention, whether great or small, and wherever held by white-ribbon women, may be made an effort equally enterprising, with results not less satisfactory and helpful than Miss Gorham and the British Women's Temperance Association have attained.

DR. PARKHURST ON WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

It sometimes happens that a literary critic is required to write a review of a book which he has no time to examine. The compositor will not wait, and the full tale of lines must be produced. The reviewer knows next to nothing of the subject treated but he has learned that colossal ignorance, clothed in oracular and piquant verbiage, is sometimes as imposing as exact knowledge in plain dress. He begins with bold and general statements, but so hedged and qualified that only an expert can strike the balance between affirmative and negative, assertion and disclaimer. And he leaves ajar a dozen doors through which, if assailed, he can retire. He snatches a glance at the pages of the book. He discerns a bit of excellence. He praises warmly and dwells on the commendation. He detects a peccadillo. He condemns it with magisterial severity and lingers over the condemnation. He disavows prejudice, pays the author a personal compliment and—his column is full. And those readers who are no wiser than the critic admire his breadth of vision, his depth of insight and his candor of judgment.

Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst has in three columns of the Ladies' Home Journal for June disclosed his opinion of "Women without the ballot." He does not say that few women wish to vote, but these are his words: "Probably quite a small minority of our feminine population" desire the ballot. This is safe. A good part of this population consists of minors. Those whom he would thus at the outset make insignificant he next comprehensively and exhaustively divides in three classes.

The first comprises those who have "the mistaken notion that suffrage is a right inherent in personality." I have never met any of this class. Those who think that suffrage is a right which inheres, say, in an infantile, an imbecile, an angelic, or a demoniac personality, are a small tribe.

The second class "are suffragists not because they care anything for the ballot in itself considered," but they are "restless at seeing men do anything that they are not themselves allowed to do." They do not so much desire to vote as to know why they cannot vote. This class is also disposed of easily. The Doctor extinguishes them by telling them that if they were by law compelled to vote they would not be pleased. But may not this original ad feminam argument be used upon men? Forbid, for example, by statute the men of New York to vote and would they not soon wish to know why they could not do as others did? Dr. Parkhurst could of course rebuke and exorcise this spirit of jealousy, as he calls it, by admonishing these "restless" souls that if compelled to vote they would not like it.

The third class are those who are earnestly asking whether, with the ballot, women might not better help to correct certain evil conditions in society. He does not affirm that there are no facts which will enable candid men to answer this question, but this is what he does say: "Data do not seem to be sufficiently at command to make an opinion based on them of any particular value." This is safe from his standpoint. Let Doctor Parkhurst confess for himself. We are then left, he decides, to the guidance of intuition alone, and though he vows that he honors feminine intuition, yet in these matters "intuition counts for a good deal more when moderately mixed with statistics." He suggests that if women who wish the ballot will canvass the tenth and twenty-second wards of New York city, and carefully ascertain just what women would vote if they could, and just how they would vote if they did, they would be in a position to decide concerning the advantages of woman suffrage. He does not perceive his gross insult to the women of our country, when he makes the women of these wards of New York city their representatives, but he gives himself the opportunity to point out the disagreeableness of political work, and to suggest what martyrs men who are in politics must make of themselves.

But while women are gathering these indispensable and conclusive statistics, he brings to their attention a matter which he assures them is "not at all in the nature of theory." He relates that thirty or forty earnest women have banded themselves together, and "been laboring for several years in the effort to raise the tone of an equal number of families in one of the easterly districts of New York city." He lays much stress on the fact (?) that they have not striven to help individuals, but to create within the family, as a social unit, "the inspiration of a clearer vision and a larger hope." He certainly mixes his masculine intuition but "moderately with statistics." He doesn't know just how many these women are, how long they have labored, nor where their work has been wrought. He does not name a single tangible result, nor even inform us that there have been any fruits whatever! But he gravely reminds his readers that no constitutional amendment, no statutory provision is needed to open such doors of opportunity to them. He discloses the secret that it is the enforcement of law which is needed rather than additional legislation, and says that if women "will deal with the situation candidly" they will understand "that no ballot, even though cast by the white hand of an honorable woman, will make people better." We are left to infer that officers elected to enforce laws owe nothing to the ballot.

The reader might by this time suspect that Dr. Parkhurst does not favor woman suffrage, but he cuts off this budding suspicion by saying that he is "not antagonizing female suffrage, but the fact remains that women have now a great many more rights than they are using." He finally tosses into the lap of his fair reader a double handful of taffy as he takes his leave. The world is to be made better only by personal agency, he says, and for this ministry one woman is the equivalent of ten men.

There are other arguments which Dr. Parkhurst has overlooked as pertinent and more cogent. His can be matched and easily surpassed. University settlements have been fountains of blessing to some of the most wretched people in New York; therefore women cannot be trusted with the ballot. A woman in England once said to a dissolute tinker that he ought to be ashamed of himself, whereupon he reformed, and wrote the "Pilgrim's Progress" and the "Holy War," therefore, women ought never to use the ballot. Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes was once standing in a public place with his hat in his hand before him, when a kind person dropped a coin in his hat, thinking him a street beggar, therefore the ballot must be denied to woman. As is easily seen, our arguments are, like Dr. Parkhurst's, taken from the realm of philanthropy, and they have the merit of being quite as germane, and they are more conclusive, for we are able to cite definite and happy results. Dr. Parkhurst has missed being humorous by writing on so serious a subject, but he has succeeded in making himself amusing.

A NEW AND NOTABLE BOOK.

Hosts of our readers will be equally surprised and glad to learn that a memorial volume to Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge is now upon the press. So quietly has Mr. Woodbridge gone about the issuing of this volume, that few were aware that it was in progress. It has been his life quest since the sudden death of his devoted wife last October.

It is hard to accustom ourselves, even yet, to the absence of our dear comrade from our earthly ken. So unexpected was her heavenly flight and so natural was her beloved form, as it lay in majestic stillness, that for months we cherished a happy fancy that she had but gone on a short journey, and that we might again be reinforced by her helpful, joyous presence. We had never said good-bye, only good-night, as we had hundreds of times, and had received in return the warm hand clasp and radiant smile of one of the sweetest comradeships we had ever known. Then in a few hours she simply was "not, for God took her." Oh, the glorious release, and the glorious life that was hers! Through the funeral and memorial services we have heard much of the former, but no one but her husband and the author of this memorial volume could have portrayed the beautiful life which Mary A. Woodbridge lived. Even those at headquarters who knew her well and had a high appreciation of her work and worth, did not begin to realize the sanctity of her inner life—the deep cadences of her spiritual nature.

The reading of the advance pages has impressed us profoundly with the strength of her personal religion, upon which all her philanthropic work was founded. We can now see why she was never buffeted with the winds of cavil and criticism; why she was sweet and womanly, when others were bitter and uncivil; why she was poised and calm, when others were excited and full of wrath at the powers of evil. Mrs. Woodbridge was anchored; she had her seasons of wrestling—in prayer—and her times of depression, but they were always in her own "upper chamber," alone with her God. Some thought she strangely kept her own counsel; she did, so far as human friends were concerned, but she kept nothing from her Saviour. Through the pages of this new and notable book we are led into the very presence of her Mercy Seat, and there we find her trysting place, and her source of strength and sweetness. No book could bring more comfort to a Christian well in years, and none could more safely instruct and encourage a beginner in the religious life than "The Life and Labors of Mary A. Woodbridge," which is the formal title of the memorial volume.

Mrs. Woodbridge's marked culture and courtesy were natural to her refined nature, as were also her brightness, vivacity and wit, but her spiritual, as well as her intellectual life, she cultivated most assiduously. She never slackened her vigor in these directions, and never permitted her hours for devotion and study to be shortened because of her increasing duties in other directions. This book has a great mission in this respect for white-ribboners. May we all learn the lesson!

This is a W. C. T. U. record of necessity, for as Miss Willard says in her introduction to it, "Mrs. Woodbridge's lifework is like a golden thread running through the warp and woof of that rich fabric of events we call the Woman's Crusade."

The author, Rev. A. M. Hills, was Mrs. Woodbridge's pastor and spiritual adviser for twenty years, so it is no wonder that he has given us a volume which shows the beautiful undercurrent of her harmonious nature.

The chapter upon the great amendment campaign in Ohio, of which Mrs. Woodbridge was the inspired leader, and the author of one of the prominent aids, is especially fine and valuable, and we predict it will become more and more the accredited text book of the W. C. T. U. and Prohibition party as time goes by.

The book will be ready for sale on July 15, and may be obtained from the W. T. P. A., The Temple, Chicago, or from Mr. F. W. Woodbridge, Ravenna, O.

Backbiting, tattling and gossip are the small change of the currency of chaos, but it is so natural to observe and comment upon those round us that we have long believed there is but one remedy for this disease, and that is to form the habit of speaking frankly and kindly to those with whom we are most nearly associated concerning those good and bad qualities that we think we see in them. The mind then relieves itself and much good comes to the one who knows the actual estimate for good and evil in which he is held instead of moving forward in a fool's paradise, hearing only the favorable and never profiting by the unfavorable comments on his character. From the beginning we have urged this upon our white ribbon women, many of whom doubtless regard us as cranks on this subject, but we can only speak out what is given us and leave the subject to their consideration. It is to be remembered that when a man praises his friend, it is not always because he is his friend, but he has become his friend because he can praise him.

"Life's race well run,
Life's work well done,
Life's crown well won;
Now comes rest."

The above is pasted by an anonymous writer on the monument of Abraham Lincoln.

One of the most ignoble forms of criticism, and one universally manifest at the two extremes of society—the most uncultured and the cultured—is the free and heartless criticism of personal appearance. Cultivated people should teach their children that to indulge in this is an ignoble manifestation and unworthy of the truly refined. It is, of course, altogether contrary to the Golden Rule, for no one would enjoy hearing himself dissected in any wise and least of all in respect to what immediate impression which he makes by reason of his physique, the defects and attractions of which are largely beyond his control.

In London when Lady Somerset was feeding the children of the striking cab-drivers, one of them said to her: "Many people say we have their sympathy, but sympathy without help is like mustard without beef."

Why should not the phonograph gather up the songs of birds as well as of man-made instruments, and give them to us in place of our keeping birds shut up in cages?

Under the providence of God, the W. C. T. U. has been led into vaster work and broader fields than its founders dreamed. Not least of these is the work it has wrought for harmony among all sections of our common country. Men have been professedly trying for years to heal the breach left by a terrible Civil War. It remained for this army of women, "forgetting the things that were behind," to call for volunteers from every section of the land and wage united battle against a common foe. The white ribbon to-day is the pledge of mutual love and sympathy, it matters not from what opposite points of the compass its wearers may hail.

"Indian not lost! wigwam lost!" this was said by an Indian to a camp of hunters when they exclaimed as he entered from the prairie: "Why, here's a lost Indian!" Have we not here a striking figure of the soul's survival when "the house of this tabernacle" perishes?—

This "sliding scale" is not new, but it is, alas, as true as when first written:

Father—"Well, we must tax the saloons $50."
M.—"Husband, I believe John drinks."
F.—"We must put up that tax to $100."
M.—"My dear husband, our boy is being ruined."
F.—"Try 'em awhile at $200."
M.—"Oh, my God! my boy came home drunk."
F.—"Well, well, we must make it $300."
M.—"Just think, William, our boy is in jail."
F.—"I'll fix those saloons. Tax 'em $400."
M.—"My poor child is a confirmed drunkard."
F.—"Up with that tax and make it $500."
M.—"Our once noble boy is a wreck."
F.—"Now I'll stop 'em; make it $600."
M.—"We carried our poor boy to a drunkard's grave to-day."
F.—"Well, I declare, we must regulate this traffic; we ought to have made that tax $1,000."

On Duty.

MASSACHUSETTS.

GOD'S LOVELY DARK.

Your Massachusetts reporter is "far from the madding crowd" in what George Mac Donald calls, "God's lovely dark;" in the beauty and sublimity and awe of nature where it is at its best. Here are "books in the running brooks, sermons in stones, and good in everything."

Writing to you away up on the mountain side,—Iron mountain at that!—I seem to be alone in God's wonderful, lovely world.

"The infinite bliss of nature,
I feel in every vein."

It is June in the mountain world—a world which includes almost every great summit of New England, and far away to the north the Percy Peaks of Canada.

"On every height there lies repose," my companions, poet and philosopher, bird-lovers, are chasing the songsters up the mountain and getting better acquainted with them. Some of these songs will be reproduced by and by and be heard all over this great wide land of ours. The poet prefaced her outing by setting in motion one hundred Temple Wheels. One cannot forget that yonder on the plains and in the hearts of the great cities is an unlovely dark. Is it cowardly to long to hide away in the mountain fastnesses and reach out and up for the strength and communion of the hills the strength which is "His also?"

Before journeying northward, your reporter went the length of the south shore, rounding the Cape. This means to have touched Massachusetts at the beginning—to have come as the Pilgrims did within the arm of a new world. Provincetown may truly be called "the far East." It is the "land's end" and—the land's beginning!

Barnstable county comprises the whole of Cap Cod—an armful of land and people and fishes and sea. And, therefore, Barnstable county W. C. T. U. is composed of Cape Cod folks. A hearty, genuine, intelligent company they are. Right at the "beginning" of America is a Woman's Christian Temperance Union of sixty members. They hold the outpost of Pilgrim civilization, and Mrs. Alice H. Young is the leader and keeper at Provincetown. There are other lights that burn brightly in these seaport towns. Yarmouth furnishes the earnest, capable county president, and the county is favored in having a leader whose efforts are most heartily seconded and promoted by her husband, Rev. Mr. Marsh, of the Congregational church. This county held its May convention at Wellfleet, midway between the hand and the elbow of the arm of the Cape. It is enough to say of the convention that its make-up was representative. The women are women of destiny. They believe and work for the regeneration of Cape Cod. Their territory is so separated, so marked, they work as if all depended upon them, and at the same time take hold upon God with unlimited faith. Nothing in our work seems more promising than this valiant host at the very portals of the New World's civilization.

This experience and also a call at Rockport on the northern shore, revealed the fact that express wagons are the principal importers of liquors to these seaport towns. If only the base of supply might be cut off it would be easy to put out to sea these traveling saloons.

Rev. W. B. Toulmin, chaplain of Deer, Rainsford and Long Island in Boston harbor, has just described another effect of the Boston saloon. He said that at the House of Industry there are 1,500 inmates. Some of them have been there sixty times and expect to spend their lives there. They are provided with good homes, little work and frequent vacations. They come to Boston, visit the saloons, sell the clothes given to them by the city and return to be reclothed and comfortably provided for. "This is all the result of intemperance, and hell is too good a place for the saloons that send them there." Mr. Toulmin would have a four weeks' sentence imposed for the first offence of drunkenness and the penalty increased each time, and after the fourth offence he would have a man lose his franchise for ten years.

Massachusetts is fast going into summer quarters. The Fourth of July begins on June 17 in the celebration of the anniversary of the Battle of Bunker Hill. Nothing was lacking this year to indicate any waning of patriotic fervor in keeping Charlestown's great day. Some day the women of Boston will celebrate the Bunker Hill of the liquor traffic. God speed the time!

Boston will give the right of way to two great meetings this summer, the Christian Endeavor in July and later the Knights Templar, sixty thousand or more guests being expected at each. All Boston and suburbs, indeed, all New England, are busy getting ready for the Christian Endeavor crowd. Arrangements are making for a generous hospitality and for acquainting the friends from the West and the North and the South, and from over the sea, with the many places of historic interest. Even the birthplace of Christian Endeavor societies, at Portland, Me., is to be visited. Each state will have its chosen emblem, and the combination of bright colors, gay designs and unique arrangement will produce brilliant effects. Great choruses are drilling to lead the music; the church doors will be flung wide open, and with these, and the tents, and Mechanics Hall, the great convention will be sheltered. A meeting and parade of the Junior Christian Endeavorers will occur July 13. There are 8,087 of these societies in the United States, 221 in the British provinces and 203 in foreign lands; in all, a membership of 500,000. At this meeting Thomas Wainwright, of Chicago, will speak; also the roll of the nations will be called. Representatives will take part from Africa, Japan, South America, the Islands of the Sea, Mexico and Spain. The following is the message from the Turkish Juniors, "Yete zis gusirek in badvi rawnerauss bahetzeck—"If ye love me keep my commandments."—John 14:15. What will this great gathering mean for the temperance cause? We are looking to it hopefully. This special Christian Endeavor work will have its claims presented by such speakers as Emily McLaughlin, John G. Woolley, and others.

A special feature of the New England suffrage anniversary this year was a young people's meeting, Alice Stone Blackwell presiding. There were speakers from Cornell and Boston universities, from Wellesley and from Tufts college and a large attendance of young suffragists. The veterans were greatly encouraged by a meeting so full of prophecy and promise.

The Massachusetts legislature has passed a law signed by the governor, submitting to all qualified voters for school committees at the next state election the question, "Is it expedient that municipal suffrage be granted to women?" "A sham referendum," the editors of the Woman's Journal call it. It was intended by the mover as a blow but it may rebound against his own head. The agitation and talk and growing intelligence may so soften it as to help the cause in the end.

Dr. Miner has gone and the cause of reform is especially bereft. He has been uncompromising and fearless in his opposition to the liquor traffic. For twenty years he was president of the Massachusetts Temperance Alliance and was unceasing in his efforts for Prohibition. He retained to the last his interest and activity in positions of public trust, and fell in a moment as a shock of corn fully ripened.

WESTERN WASHINGTON.

STATE CONVENTION NEWS.

The state convention of Western Washington was held in our capital city, and right royally entertained. The delegates from the north boarded the steamer Montecillo at Seattle, Captain Hatch, commander, who gave us half fare rates, half price for meals and showed every kindness in his power. Arriving at Olympia we marched up the main street in a body, and what was our surprise and delight you can imagine when we found many of the business houses decorated with white and yellow mottoes greeting us,—"Welcome W. C. T. U.," "For God and Home and Native Land," in store windows spelled with spools of white thread on a yellow ground, also worked out with tapes, sewing silks and zephyrs and yellow and white bunting hangings. Long will this public greeting be held in grateful remembrance.

Olympia, like the United States capital, is a city of splendid distances fair to view. The convention was held in the Unity auditorium of the Unitarian church. State president, Dr. Ella J. Fifield of Tacoma, in the chair.

The auditorium was beautifully decorated for the occasion.

The convention called to order at two o'clock in the afternoon, held executive and trustee meetings. The principal business of this session was the revision of the state constitution.

Tuesday evening a full house greeted us. Devotions were led by Mrs. Mary Stubbs, of Tacoma. Mayor Manar gave an address of welcome in behalf of the city; Rev. C. L. Diven in behalf of the churches; Prof. B. W. Brintnall in behalf of the educational institutions; Emma E. Page, county president of Thurston county, in behalf of the W. C. T. U. Mrs. F. R. Clark, of Centralia, responded to these warm-hearted welcomes. Dr. Ella J. Fifield, state president, gave an address, entitled, "The Work of the W. C. T. U." No one who heard it can plead ignorance hereafter of what we as an organization are accomplishing along many lines of work, but the subject is too great to be fully presented in one evening's address. Mrs. Fifield is a pleasing, instructive speaker, earnestly impressing the audience with the greatness of the cause she represents. Collection, music and benediction closed the first evening.

Wednesday morning devotions, led by Mrs. Hamilton, of Whatcom. Mrs. Wilmot, president of King county, was called to the chair while Dr. Fifield delivered her annual address. She paid a feeling tribute to our departed members—reviewed the work done in the various counties, and concluded by recommending John G. Woolley for presidential candidate at the next election. The corresponding secretary being absent, Mrs. Mattie Graves of Centralia, read her report. Mrs. Fifield being organizer as well as president, reported the organization of new unions and the strengthening of the old. Noontide hour of prayer was observed as it always is in our conventions, both county and state. Dinner and supper were served in the church parlors to delegates and friends of the convention each day, the tables being served by a bevy of pretty girls.

The Wednesday afternoon exercises opened with music and song. Mrs. Hanson of Puyallup, led our devotions. Rev. A. J. Joslyn of the M. E. Church, of Olympia, was introduced, and complimented the convention on their business methods. Mr. Gibson of Chehalis, was introduced and made a few remarks. The committee on credentials reported and the convention seated by counties. Letters were read from absent members and the secretary instructed to respond to them. Mrs. Homer Hill, state treasurer, read her report and was congratulated on the systematic manner in which she presented it. Mrs. Bessie J. I. Savage, president of the state suffrage association, was introduced and made a short address on that living issue.

The auditor being absent, Mrs. Homer Hill read her report. Reports of county presidents were listened to and reports of heads of departments were taken up and discussed. After adjournment an executive meeting was held to nominate heads of departments for the ensuing year as far as the reports had been heard.

On Wednesday evening, all repaired to the opera house to listen to a grand gold medal contest by seven young ladies and one young man. We were greeted with an audience of between six and seven hundred. The banner of prohibition was held aloft and highly honored by these eloquent young contestants. The judges consisted of three members of the state board of education; Professor Bean, president of the board, announced the judges' decision with appropriate remarks. Mrs. Stork presented the medal after addressing the class. The contest was arranged by Miss Emma Page, state superintendent of contest work. She has done a noble work in this department and is a source of inspiration to the young who come within the pale of her influence. She gives herself fully to good works. No one envied the judges the task of deciding a contest where all did so nobly. The successful candidate was Miss Jennie Ingles, Seattle.

Thursday morning convention opened by singing, "Bringing in the Sheaves." We had a fine leader, Mrs. H. S. Rockwell, state superintendent of music. All our exercises were interspersed with hymns and occasionally a sweet solo by Mrs. Rockwell. Devotions were led by Mrs. Etta Jones, of Kent, who read the eighth chapter of Romans.

The books of the White Shield Home were audited and reported upon. Reports from heads of departments were resumed. Most of them had been faithfully conducted but our state work is greatly crippled for want of funds. Three to four hundred dollars is a pitiful sum to pass through our state treasury, and bills are left over every year unpaid to draw upon the fund the following year. It is not lack of method but the poverty of the membership, nearly all of whom are struggling with the problems of life in trying to make a home out of a wilderness, and it takes all their means and energies to solve this question.

The report of the White Shield Home stated that twenty-one babes were born there during the year; of these three died, seven remained with their mothers, eight were given away and four were sent to the "Sheltering Arms." Most of the mothers of these babes were under sixteen years of age. They go out from the home repentant and resolved to lead better lives. Kind hearts receive them and make it easy for them to do right.

The home came near closing its doors this hard year for lack of funds to meet expenses, but timely aid tided over the crisis. The enterprise lives by faith and prayer and contributions from the benevolent from day to day. Miss Jennie Steele is the efficient solicitor for the home and has held that position for almost six years.

The committee on courtesies now introduced Mrs. Byles, of the British Women's Temperance Association, who brought greeting from that body and also from Lady Henry Somerset.

Representative Bush, from Pacific county, was introduced. He told us that on one occasion he had reason to pass through the back room of a grocery store where stood an open barrel of liquor and a tin cup at hand. He said his nerves tingled to the finger tips, and his hair felt as if rising on end so sudden and strong was the temptation to indulge his suddenly aroused appetite, although he had never tasted intoxicating liquor. What could it be but inherited weakness? He fled the temptation—all honor to him.

Rev. Chaplain was then introduced. He is about to found a school, to be known as the Olympic University. It will be the second temperance school in the United States. He requested the convention to appoint a committee to provide a curriculum of study, and it was voted that the chair appoint such a committee. He wishes the school to be under the supervision of the state W. C. T. U. It is incorporated as a national university. It owns six hundred and fifty acres of ground on a sunny eastern slope, overlooking Puget Sound, lying just across the Sound, a short distance from the city of Olympia. All particulars will be furnished any one interested in the project by addressing J. R. Chaplain, Olympia.

More reports of interest to the convention were listened to. Mrs. Mattie Graves requested that we bear to the throne of grace the Wisconsin convention then in session, and that we send them a letter of greeting.

A memorial service was to be led by Mrs. Reese at this hour, but in her absence Mrs. Bowen of Sumas, led the service in memory of our Marys—Mary Woodbridge, Mary Lathrap and Mary Beavers, of our own state; also for our honoraries, Mr. Stewart of Chehalis, and Mr. Wilson, a young man just entering the ministry. His mother is our state superintendent of homes for the homeless, and has charge of the Crown Jewel Home, an orphanage started last year and supported by voluntary contributions from temperance and religious people.

The memorial service was solemn and impressive. An original poem was read that Mrs. Beavers wrote on the occasion of the death of a friend. As her young daughter was to be married in church at their home, Linden, this evening, a letter of greeting from the convention was sent her. The Thursday afternoon devotions were led by Mrs. Manning of Centralia. Mrs. L. A. Irons gave a forceful address. Rev. Dr. Wilding, Methodist Episcopal pastor of Vancouver, was presented and kept the audience in a fine humor with his witty remarks. Rev. Dr. Lamont, Presbyterian pastor of Olympia, also closely held the attention of the convention. The superintendent of franchise gave a lengthy report, showing that sentiment is advancing along that line. The revision of the constitution was resumed.

On Thursday evening the devotions were led by Rev. Hays, of Olympia, and participated in by Revs. Joslyn, Diven and McCallum, all of Olympia. A vocal quartette, composed of Mrs. Geo. Hopkins, Mrs. Willetts, Leland Henderson and Leonard Brown, sang several good selections for us Tuesday and Thursday evenings. The address of the evening was by Rev. Dr. Wilding, subject: "The License Craze." The truth was presented in a fascinating style, with Dr. Wilding's usual happy hits. Mrs. Hanson made a collection speech. Mrs. Rockwell closed with a beautiful solo.

A thankoffering service was led on Friday morning by Mrs. Jordan after which the officers for the ensuing year were elected, as follows: President, Miss Mary L. Page, Olympia; vice-president, Mrs. Dr. Fifield, Tacoma; corresponding secretary, Ella T. Stork, Olympia; recording secretary, Ellen K. Simison, Seattle; assistant recording secretary, Miss Clara Ansorge, Shelton; treasurer, Dr. Eva St. Clair Osborne, Tacoma; organizer, Mattie Graves, Centralia; delegate-at-large to National Convention, Mrs. M. L. T. Hidden, Vancouver; delegate of convention, Mrs. Bowen, of Sumas; alternates, Dr. Simond, of Vancouver and Etta Jones of Kent. The newly elected officers were presented and received with the Chautauqua salute.

On Friday afternoon the devotions were led by Mrs.

Nellie Whitham, after which was the election of trustees, appointing presidents of unorganized counties and electing heads of departments for the coming year and adopting resolutions. Thus closed a very successful convention, many pleasant features of which we have felt obliged to eliminate from the report on account of its length.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

SAVING THE CHILDREN.

Congress is adjourned, Mrs. Cleveland has retired to Gray Gables, "everybody" is out of the city, and although the season of receptions and entertainments is over and June with its brides and its roses has faded, the W. C. T. U. of the District of Columbia keeps open house and finds plenty of blessed work to do. The interest has scarcely flagged since the convocation (not convention) and Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt's series of meetings in the spring. Our Y's have furnished a pretty room with the proceeds of their "Merchant's Carnival," and have given a reception there. Our headquarters now occupies an entire flat in a business house on F street, 910. Here the weekly meetings and the weekly entertainments of the department of messenger boys are held. The indefatigable superintendent of this department gives her best efforts and most faithful labors to her department. Although she shrinks from publicity, she wrote a letter to the Washington Times when she found that they were entering into temptation, calling upon that journal to publish the facts in the case with a view to the protection of the morals of messenger boys.

There is in this city a region one-half mile square in which there are ninety houses of ill fame. During the war General Hooker's division of the army was quartered there and the name of the "Division" still clings to it. This is a suitable name as it is under a special police surveillance and its boundary is strictly maintained. It is like no other part of the city; no homes are there. The feet of little children never press its stony streets. Coffins are frequently required but no mourners follow the polluted remains of the slaves of sin to their untimely graves in the potter's field. Besides the ninety houses I have mentioned there are some cheap hotels, lodging houses, restaurants and saloons. Liquor is freely dispensed in all these places, yet but few of them pay a license fee. An annual tax used to be levied upon these houses for breaking the law and selling liquor without a license. But even that has fallen into "innocuous desuetude" by reason of the difficulties of collecting. I wonder if Prohibition could "work" any worse than this! One wealthy brewer supplies by contract most of the liquor thus sold and pays a wholesale dealer's license. Alas, for the capital city!

Mrs. Bradley was appalled to learn that some of "her boys" by their duties were obliged to enter with telegrams etc., not only the saloons but these houses, and to carry messages to the rooms and wait there while replies were written. She felt the shame and crime of subjecting innocent youth to the sights and language there indulged. The Times ventilated the matter to such an extent that the authorities were forced by public opinion to take action, even though in so doing they "recognized the status" of these places, a thing they were loath to do. How is it in other cities?

The demoralizing vice of cigarette smoking is being counteracted by the Anti-Cigarette League. Our department of narcotics has been very active this year in the public schools and has met with deserved encouragement and success. Mrs. Alice B. Chapman, the present superintendent, in an article in the Washington Times, says: "The first Anti-Cigarette League was formed in November, of 1893, in the city of New York, by Commissioner Hubbell. In a little over a year there were fifty thousand members in New York city alone, and in the United States an estimated membership of 250,000. Mr. B. T. Janney, of Georgetown, began the work in this district, and through his efforts the League grew to several hundred members. The work was taken up by the W. C. T. U. in February last. Our pledge prohibits the use of tobacco in any form. This season's efforts have added about six hundred members, making a total membership of from 1,200 to 1,500. It is the intention of the department of narcotics to enter into an active campaign with the new school year. It is confidently expected that with the experience of the last few months, and with the help of Almighty God to further the work, that every boy and girl, white and colored, in the public schools of this city who can be persuaded to accept and sign the pledge will by this time in 1896 be enrolled as members of the Anti-Cigarette League." These ringing words are like the dauntless spirit of our fair, young superintendent of the department of narcotics.

FLORIDA.

A SUMMER EXECUTIVE.

Now come the long summer days, the universally acceded "rest time" in Florida. Some of our workers are gone North in quest of cooler breezes, and we who remain naturally find our nerves relax, and we fain would lay down some of the wearying burdens imposed upon us. So it comes to pass that the gleaner finds only meager returns when she goes forth to glean news from the field. But the Florida workers are not all sleeping, or even resting, in proof of which I note a lively meeting of the executive committee at Lake Helen from the 12th to the 14th of this month.

Plans for more aggressive work were thoroughly and enthusiastically discussed. It was deemed of great importance that our cause should be fully represented at all Chautauquan assemblies, therefore a committee was appointed to secure the best day possible at the next meeting of the Florida Southern Chautauqua at Mount Dora.

The committee visited Somerset Park, carefully investigated financial status, and found all satisfactory.

A Florida song was adopted, words set to the music of "Suwanee River." This is to be sung during the next National Convention by request of National officers. The reading clubs originated by Mrs. Arnold were highly recommended by committee. After discussion it was determined that reports of all department work given at next state convention be limited to ten minutes.

Much miscellaneous business was dispatched during the day and on Thursday evening a public meeting was held in the new Baptist church, presided over by our newly-elected president, Mrs. Webb, of De Land. Short speeches relative to our work were made by Mrs. Hill, of Orange City, and Mrs. Brown, of Ft. Reid.

The zeal of the delegates was not one whit abated by the exceeding heat of the weather nor their faith lessened in the final and complete triumph of our "glorious cause." I was not present at this pleasant and helpful meeting, and have culled from the Florida Times Union the above report.

The annual convention reports are out in neat form, reflecting much credit upon those officers to whose care and efficiency we are indebted for their execution. Special news from unions is very limited.

Although the Ormond union is small the members are faithful in meeting once a month. Sometimes they have parlor meetings, selecting instructive topics, such as: Our round-the-world missionaries, scientific temperance, the Polyglot Petition. One week the latter subjects were discussed at an afternoon W. C. T. U. tea. A minister and his wife were there who heard it for the first time, although he had lived and preached near Boston for forty years. One of the first Crusaders of Ohio was at that meeting, too, adding much interest to the occasion.

I regret exceedingly that a letter from Lottie A. Wright, secretary of the Tangerine union (recently organized) was inadvertently overlooked when writing a previous letter to the SIGNAL. "Fourteen members, three honoraries and semi-monthly meetings well attended and interesting," is the encouraging word.

Tampa union have placed their memorial library, organ, and other possessions in the new reading room recently opened in the parlors of the First Congregational church. This reading room is kept open every evening and is well patronized by the young men and older ones, too, of the city. As its establishment is largely due to the faith and work of one of our members, Mrs. A. G. Herrick, we feel that we may claim a share in the good work through her. Our semi-monthly union meetings are held in these parlors and the young people's literary society furnishes entertainments for Thursday evenings each week.

Of the chief work of the Tampa union, the Rescue Home, I cannot write anything very encouraging, as yet. Failing to secure a matron thus far, we have rented the building for the summer months, hoping to open in the fall for its legitimate purpose. The founder of this home and our most excellent coadjutor in all efforts toward its success, Mrs. Ida M. Irwin, has gone north and will not return earlier than November. It is to her faithful visits and influence with the class we wish to benefit that we look for the family to be gathered into the home when it shall be reopened. Letters have been received from several ladies in different places, relative to the position of matron. It is a peculiarly hard place to fill, but we are believing that God, in His own time and way, will supply our need. And we will not cease to remember that "Without weariness there is no rest, and without battle there is no victory."

Florida W. C. T. U. have adopted a state paper, The Southern Chautauqua Journal, published at Tavares, Fla. One page has been purchased by unions and is conducted by Mrs. Alice C. Brown, the one chosen to fill the position of editor. Mrs. L. Eloise Sembler, president of Tavares union, is soliciting agent for the Journal. She has recently visited Tampa in this capacity, meeting with some success in gaining subscribers.

NORTH DAKOTA.

HER HOPEFUL OUTLOOK.

In May our president was invited to address the M. E. conference at Larimore, and while other speakers were limited as to length of time, full permission was granted her to speak as long as she wished.

Near the western boundary of our state in Morton county, a new union has been recently organized at Glen Ullin, by Miss Mary C. Johnson. Miss Johnson is a white-ribboner from Minnesota who came to our state some months ago to recuperate her health, and going to this particular part of our state, where no active work had yet been done, with her energetic nature and love for the work she could not remain indifferent to the "Macedonian cry." She has organized a union which meets twice a month. Miss Johnson as president, drives thirty miles across the prairie to attend these meetings, and now they have an L. T. L. and have gone to work in good earnest.

Willow city reports thirty-seven total abstinent pledges. La Moure gave a tea party at the home of one of their members. Six new members took the pledge and went home wearing the white ribbon. Hope has adopted the schools' savings bank. Pembina supplies barber shops and jails with literature. Elliott is about to lose their president, Mrs. Chamberlin, who goes to Buffalo, N. Y., to live, and Ransom county loses in her another valuable worker. Over a year ago an orphan boy was taken into the home of one of the members of the Reynolds union, in the name of the union, and has been loved and tenderly cared for since that time.

Fairmount reports a successful literary entertainment; Leonard union still faithful to their duty, though their ranks have been broken several times during the year by removals. Hunter has just given a Demorest medal contest. Ellendale, Casselton and Maza also are engaged in medal contest work, and the children are entering heartily into the work. Hunter, Thompson, Elliott and others report successful mothers' meetings. Bottineau raised a considerable amount for detective work. Tower City, St. Thomas, Maza, Elliott, Grand Forks, Wimbledom, Leonard and Park River sent donations to the home. Amenia, Hope, Absaeaka and Wimbledom sent liberal donations, both in provisions and money to Nebraska sufferers.

Wimbledom, though not strong in years or numbers, is doing good work, having for their president Mrs. Cox, who before her marriage was trained in the Uxbridge Y.

Courtney union, one of the recently organized unions, have for their leading officers young ladies who are teachers, and we know this means success. The last union reported by our president just organized is Langdon, and they have immediately taken up L. T. L. work. New L. T. L's are springing up all over the state, and one can almost imagine our beautiful prairies reverberating with the glad refrain sung by thousands of happy voices, "Saloons, saloons, saloons must go." Portland, Mayville, one of the latest, is one hundred strong, with Mrs. Charles McKissick as superintendent. On Decoration Day, under the management of their efficient superintendent, happy L. T. L-ers filled four hayracks, decorated with banners, and joined in the procession, then entering the hall where Lieutenant-Governor Werst was the speaker; they were called upon by Ex-Senator Robinson to give the rallying cry of the Legion.

Bowesmont, Reynolds, Fairmount, Nowesta, Buffalo, Minnewaukon, St. Thomas, Park River, Amenia, Pembina, Drayton Y's, Minto, Sanborn, Tower City, and others, all doing active work along this line. Tower City deserves especial mention as it is our pioneer Legion and all these years having one dear, faithful leader, Mrs. E. L. Bickford, whose white hair and sweet, patient face, places her in the ranks of our dear "Mothers in Israel." In 1880 there was organized a Band of Hope with thirty children, which increased in membership until there were eighty names enrolled. An entertainment was given in that year, and with the proceeds was purchased a circulating library for the children, still in use.

In 1889 they reorganized and became an L. T. L. In all these years there have been enrolled two hundred names. They have met every two weeks, and have contributed to the Temple, Hospital, Willard fountain, and are now at work with the Wheels. They have held regularly since 1880, monthly temperance meetings. The parents show their appreciation by attending the meetings, always contributing to the funds and in other ways. There is no town in our state where there is a stronger temperance sentiment or where the law is better enforced than in Tower City. Mrs. Bickford writes me that to her knowledge, not one of all these children have ever become drunkards—some there may be who have broken their pledge, but all who are now grown are respected and respectable citizens. Mrs. Bickford has been our county superintendent of L. T. L. work since our organization.

Barnes county held her annual convention at Valley City, May 23 and 24, and notwithstanding the last day was a rainy one, the convention was most successful and satisfactory.

Mrs. Ida G. Fox, our former recording secretary of state and a member of Valley City union, has recently parted with her only child, Marion, a bright, promising young lady, and all who knew her mourn with the bereaved mother. A beautiful and appropriate memorial exercise was conducted by Mrs. Russel of Valley City.

Our president is now on an extended trip in the northern part of the state. Interesting and enthusiastic meetings and conventions are reported, though no full report has yet reached me of the conventions.

Rev. E. O. Taylor has just finished a four months' engagement in the state, having been invited by the state convention at Wahpeton last September. Mr. Taylor came to our state from South Dakota where a similar tour was made. His lectures are wholly scientific and presented in a manner that is entertaining and instructive, and in language to be appreciated by the common people. He has visited forty-three places including nearly all the larger cities. We believe that such lectures greatly strengthen scientific temperance instruction. His discussions furnish the supreme argument for prohibition and enforcement, and we can recommend Mr. Taylor's lectures to every state.

Our county presidents and district presidents are alive to their duties, visiting and encouraging old unions, and organizing new ones.

Maza union reports a public meeting addressed by their district president, Mrs. Marks. A new union has just been organized in La Moure county by the president, Miss Margaret Sanderson, and Mrs. Mary White, corresponding secretary.

When we consider that many of our unions are out upon the prairies in sparsely settled districts, where the members must drive (or walk as they have been known to do in some instances) to attend the meetings, and are busy farmers' wives—doing the work, many of them, of two women, we are amazed at the courage, bravery and in some instances heroism of these noble women, who can endure privations, hardships and poverty for the sake of God and humanity.

OHIO.

OFF FOR THE WORLD'S MEETING.

Ten delegates to the great Convention have represented Ohio in London. Mother Stewart, that heroic woman to whom the organization of the British Women's Temperance Union is due, and who has crossed to Great Britain the third time in the interest of the work, though now in her eightieth year, is dean of our delegation. Great regret was felt that our beloved president and other state officers were unable to attend this meeting. Mrs. S. M. Perkins, Miss C. S. Burnett and other prominent workers "will do us proud."

Though the daily and Prohibition press have spread the news broadcast, Ohio W. C. T. U. must express the gratification we felt in having our own Rev. Henrietta G. Moore preside over the recent state Prohibition convention as its temporary chairman. As always, she did herself and womankind great credit.

Miss Carra H. Close, a white-ribboner, formerly member of the Xenia union, now superintendent of the Deaconess Home, Chattanooga, with all the cares of her busy life, still finds time to do many things directly in W. C. T. U. work. She is president of the Chattanooga Y's organized

LOOKING UPWARD.

BY ALEX. ROSS.

Let our aim be always lofty;
Let our hearts be always pure;
Let us strive with earnest purpose
For the crowns that shall endure!

Though our task be often humble,
Yet the humblest task well done,
Fits us for a station higher,
Gains for us a nobler one.

And there's One who watches o'er us
With a father's tender care;
He will all our burdens lighten,
He will every sorrow share.

Let us, then, look upward ever,
Let us keep our faces bright
With the light that, shining downward,
Guides us on to truth and right!

WHAT A LITTLE GIRL DID.

The city was putting water pipes through the street in front of a modern suburban home, and the little daughter of the house became very much interested in the process. The ground was torn up, and muddy coats and grimy shirts disfigured the trim fence. The gang on duty were a hard working, harder talking and an exceedingly thirsty lot of men.

A little girl, Hetta by name, watched them from the house with absorbing attention. It was cold autumn weather, and their voices were sharp upon the still air. One noon the child came to her mother in great distress.

"They are passing a black bottle around, and one man is talking very loud and saying wicked things."

"Perhaps they are drinking; you had better keep away," replied the cautious mother.

Hetta's face grew quite sad, and that night her mother noticed that she prayed for the "poor man who drank while laying the water-pipe." A little before noon the next day she approached her mother timidly.

"What do you wish, my dear?"

"Please, do you think I may make some coffee for the men, mother? I think they would like it."

Then the thought flashed through the lady's mind: "There are many to sell them beer, and none to sell them coffee."

"Why, there are nearly thirty of them," she said aloud. "I don't think I can afford to give all of them coffee."

"Oh, mother!" exclaimed the disappointed girl.

"Well, if you are disappointed, you have enough money in your bank," said the mother. "You can go to the grocery store and buy coffee, and sell it to the men at two cents a cup. If they want coffee at all, they would rather pay for it."

To the grocer's then the child flew. "It isn't any use," said the grocery man, promptly. "The men will have their beer. They wouldn't take coffee if you gave it to them."

"I shan't give it," said Hetta. "I'm going to sell it."

And sell it she did. At first the rough men were greatly surprised at the girl's steaming pail and her pretty, business-like manner; but soon they bought and drank, and smacked their lips. Some of them declared that hot coffee like this was "better than beer."

The girl-peddler soon had all she could do. She took another girl as a partner the next day, and was successful beyond her most sanguine hopes. The neighborhood was all alive with interest in the new venture; but the most surprising thing of all was that the oaths and rude language were now seldom heard upon that street. A new gentleman seemed to have been born in the spirit of these rough men. Their foreman declared that from the time the little miss came he never had a better gang of laborers under him. He, too, had found it possible not to swear at his men.

But, too soon, the men passed on up the street, and Hetta could no longer serve them; but the incident, which took place in an eastern town, recalls the fact that we, all of us, by thoughtfulness and attention, can find little ways of serving and benefiting others that will make both them and us happier and better. It is because of our indifference that it is not done.—Youth's Companion.

A POCKET MEASURE.

"Now, what is it all for? Here you have been working over that wonderful box every evening for a week. I believe you are a miser and that box is to hoard up your treasures in."

And pretty Eva Trumbull fixed her roguish eyes on Rufus, the farmer boy, and waited to see what he would say.

"Why, I'd just as soon tell you about this box," he said. "You'll laugh, of course; but I don't suppose that will hurt me."

"I won't laugh a bit unless it is something funny."

"Well, it's a money box."

"A money box! I told you you were going to be a miser."

"Well, I'm not," said Rufus laughing. "I am planning to spend it, not to keep it; but I like to be sort of systematic about things. You see I know just about what I am worth now-a-days. There's about six months in the year that I am earning money; and in one way and another I earn about sixty dollars besides my board. Now, it happens that there are ten things for which I need to spend that money, and as nearly as I can calculate, it might be equally divided between them; so thinking it over I concluded that the systematic way would be to have a box with ten compartments all labeled and drop the money in one dollar at a time, maybe, or ten cents at a time, just as it happens to be paid."

"That's a real nice idea," said Eva admiringly, "but I can't imagine how you can have ten different things for which you need to spend money regularly. Now I have a hundred different ways of spending money, but hardly any of them are regular." Here she gave one of her merriest laughs.

"Oh, well, it is different with me," explained Rufus. "You see, I don't know much about spending money for things I might happen to like to buy. I have to spend mine for the things that must be bought, anyway; and so it's easier to calculate."

"Still," persisted Eva, "I don't know how you make ten."

"Well, I'll tell you." There was a little flush on Rufus' face, but Eva looked so sober and so interested that he determined to trust her. "In the first place, there's mother; I shall paint her name on this first department, and one-tenth of everything I ever earn is to pop in there. Then there's clothes for me; they will take another tenth."

"A tenth for clothes! That will only be six dollars a year, Rufus Briggs. Do you mean to dress in birch bark that you think you can make six dollars a year do it?"

"Well," said Rufus in a determined tone, "when a fellow has to, you know, why, he has to; besides, that's only for general clothes; I've got a department here for boots and shoes, and another for shirts, and if I have to borrow from one of these departments for the other, why, it will do no harm."

But still Eva laughed. She knew that six, or twelve, or eighteen dollars a year were of no account, so far as clothes were concerned. Didn't she wear clothes? She knew what they cost.

"They can't cost more than you've got to buy them with," Rufus said, firmly, and went on with his plan. "There are Mamie and Fannie, my two little sisters; I've given them each a department. Of course mother will spend the money for them, but I like to put it in their own name. Then here's the corner for books; I need school books and paper and pens, and all such things, you know, but they must all come out of this general fund. Then here's the housekeeping; I have a corner for that, because mother must be helped, you know; that place where her name is means for her own private use; and here's the rent corner; mother has hard times bringing that in every month. Now, you see, I've got nine, and I haven't looked out for sickness at all; that troubled me at first, but then I concluded that if any of us were sick we shouldn't need so many clothes or books, and that would even itself out. So here's my last corner." And very carefully Rufus printed the word "Benevolence" over this compartment.

"Be-nev-o-lence," spelled out Eva, and now she was too much astonished to laugh. "Why, Rufus Briggs! Just as though you could afford to give six dollars a year to benevolence."

"Why, it's only a tenth," said Rufus, stoutly, "and it's to be divided up more than any of the others, there are so many things to give for."

"The idea!" said Eva.

Just then her aunt called her, and she went away thinking of the wonderful box with its many compartments, and only sixty dollars to put into them all. "And six of them to give away," she said again, and she thought of the $1.50 a week that her father gave her for "pin money," out of which she had never given a cent for benevolence in her life.

Who are you going to try to be like, Rufus or Eva?—The Pansy.

WHAT I HAVE LEARNED ABOUT THE WORLD'S PETITION.

BY CLARA E. RAMSEY.

[ESSAY NO. 7.]

The Polyglot Petition is woman's work for the great cause of home protection under the banner of that great army of peace, "for God and Home and Native Land"—the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Men band together for the protection of our industries and our mothers and sisters have banded together for the protection of our homes and the boys and girls. This great Petition is their plea to all nations of the world for the abolishing of the liquor and opium traffic.

This Petition is to be presented to all civilized governments as a popular testimonial against the enemies of the home. It has already been presented to our own government at the great meeting at Washington.

This great Petition was written by Miss Willard many years ago, and first circulated by our own white-ribboners, and it has received the greatest number of names, indorsements and attestations in our own country. It has been carried around the world for the purpose of getting signatures by our round-the-world missionaries, Mrs. Leavitt, Miss Jessie Ackermann, Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew, and Miss Mary Allen West, who died soon after entering upon this work in foreign lands.

The work of securing names in England and our own country has been carried on by the women of our own societies. The round-the-world missionaries were helped by the church missionaries in circulating this Petition.

The work of preparing blanks, sending them out, and preparing the Petition was all done by our own women of America, and these names were all pasted on muslin by Mrs. Shuman, of Evanston, Ill. The time she spent on this part of the work amounted to almost two years.

The names on the Petition are in fifty different languages and represent every civilized state on the globe, and people of all languages and beliefs.

a year ago. They have given two Demorest contests, the first held in that city. They also observed flower mission day last year and this, the only times it has ever been observed in that city. She is superintendent of railroad work in the W union and has organized a Loyal Temperance Legion among the poor with whom she works.

A gentleman made and gave her some substantial wooden boxes which have been put up in the depots, in which are placed temperance and religious literature for free distribution; they are also preparing for a Demorest contest in the Epworth League connected with the church, for which she is working. Miss Close has a Sunday-school class of boys, whose ages vary from fifteen to twenty-one, which she has gathered in. She has them come to her home every Saturday evening, where she gives them helpful lessons for which there is not time during the Sunday-school hour. All this in addition to her work among the poor, the sick, the strangers, and others that need Christian help and sympathy, proves the sort of metal that Ohio white ribbon deaconesses are made of.

As there is not a single public drinking fountain in the city of Nashville, Miss Close is very much interested in establishing some ice water drinking fountains.

Writing of fountains, it gives me great pleasure to tell you that the Y's of Athens dedicated a handsome fountain in that city, May 30. It is located on the public square. We wrote their president, Mrs. Boughton, asking for an account of the services for THE UNION SIGNAL, but as she is one of Ohio's delegates attending the World's convention, and sailed from Philadelphia, June 1, we have failed to receive the desired information.

Dayton Central union has held its meetings semi-monthly the past year, with an average attendance of eighteen and an average penny collection of seventeen cents. It has increased in interest and members, both active and honorary. A committee on finance to plan ways and means of keeping the treasury supplied; there are also a visiting committee, and ten superintendents of departments. Three mothers' meetings full of interest have been held, and three parlor meetings. One of these was at the "Widows' Home," and one hundred and eleven persons were served to a nice dinner. Quite a quantity of provisions was left also for the Home. The program of each meeting is prepared with great care.

A great deal of work is being done in the flower mission, and in the literature department an average of four thousand pages each month has been distributed. Twelve boxes in the depots and some in the various engine houses are regularly supplied. Some press work has been done through the daily papers. The superintendent of unfermented wine has visited many churches in this interest and hopes to visit them all before the year closes. A Loyal Temperance Legion has been conducted. In the evangelistic department, for the first half year, meetings were held four times a week, and for the last half on the Sabbath only. Many persons have asked for prayers and a number been converted in these meetings. During the year this union has donated five dollars to the Temple at Windom, Minn., a brussels carpet to the W. C. A., lace curtains and pictures to the Widows' Home, and water coolers, decorated with a bow of white ribbon and the name of the union painted on the side, to the Deaconess Hospital, at a cost of forty dollars; to Nebraska sufferers five dollars; and coal, provisions and clothing to the poor of their own city. It has held, this year, fourteen gospel temperance meetings on Sabbath evenings, in different churches, with marked success. At these the work that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is doing all over the world has been brought to the attention of the people. So these busy women keep awakening, agitating and recruiting their ranks. Their membership is ninety-six. Dayton has also four other unions.

CONVENTIONS.

Huron county's semi-annual convention was held in the Universalist church at Peru, June 19. Earnest devotional exercises were followed by the roll-call, to which five unions responded with their full quota of delegates. Reports from local unions were listened to with great interest, especially that of Bellevue. This union is but one year old, with forty-four active, earnest members. Five departments are vigorously pushed, and they are preparing to erect a water tank where weary man may quench his thirst.

Norwalk union reported part of their "Farr booklet fund" used in starting a library at the jail, that the good work its donor was so actively interested in, may be promoted by it.

Mrs. H. E. Hammond, state superintendent of organization, and editor of the Ohio Messenger, was presented. Miss S. J. Bebout, M. D., addressed the convention on social purity. Interesting reports of the work in various departments were given, those relating to prison work being especially so. Mrs. Hammond led in the noontide prayer. The afternoon meeting opened with devotional exercises led by Rev. Abby E. Danforth. Mrs. Atherton, of Peru, welcomed the convention cordially, and Mrs. McEl Hinney, of New London, responded. Temperance in the Sunday-school was presented by Mrs. Buck, of Norwalk: "All thy children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of thy children." Mrs. Hershiser, county president, presented a valuable paper in two parts: "Practical Hints" and "Good Citizenship." The latter was requested published. A symposium by four local presidents, on "What interests our unions most," was given. Excellent resolutions were adopted. Mrs. McEl Hinney was elected county president, as Mrs. Hershiser has been promoted to district president. Mrs. H. E. Hammond gave an excellent and earnest address in the evening.

Geauga county held a convention in the Congregational church, Claridon, May 28. All the officers were present. Mrs. Ensign voiced the cordial welcome. Rev. Mary Wiseman responded. The local unions gave good reports. One new one has been added. Mrs. Hattie Carlton made an eloquent appeal for the Temple and a collection was taken to complete the county's gift of one hundred dollars, and secure the carving of its name on one of the tablets in Willard Hall.

"The W. C. T. U.," "Sabbath Observance," "Franchise," "Narcotics," "Temperance," "Temperance and the Home," were subjects of papers read. Three recitations, a solo and a duet were given by young ladies. After the noontide prayer a memorial service for departed sisters was conducted by Mrs. Louisa Town. Four have left the ranks the past six months, responding to the Master's call.

Rev. Mary L. Wiseman, district superintendent of evangelistic work, gave a fine address on that department, urging more directly spiritual work.

The resolutions passed were practical and will be carried out. The evening meeting was addressed by the county president, subject, "Progress," and by Miss Jeannette Fuller of Austinburg, on "Scientific Temperance Instruction."

The choir furnished excellent music. One of the most interesting features of the convention was the number of young women present, showing their interest in temperance and reform work.

Clinton county union held an inspiring convention at Dover "Friends' meeting house," May 25. It is here that our county Prohibition clans gather for their great mass picnic annually, having a speech each year from one of the most noted stalwart Prohibitionists of the nation. Consequently nearly the entire neighborhood is in heartiest working sympathy with the cause and the utmost liberty is felt to speak the truth as God reveals it to us. Before the hour for opening the church was filled with interested men and women. In the afternoon the aisles were supplied with extra seats. Fervent devotional exercises were followed by a memorial service for our departed leaders, Miss Henrietta B. Monroe, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge and Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, also our faithful county workers, Mrs. Coate and Mrs. Eliza Osborn. A bountiful dinner was served to more than two hundred people.

The afternoon meeting was made memorable by an exercise from the local Loyal Temperance Legion, which would have done honor to a National Convention. More than thirty bright-faced boys and girls had part and their songs and recitations were admirably selected and rendered. It was a sight to inspire courage in all who have at heart the future interests of the principles of total abstinence and prohibition. God bless the children! A symposium on "What I Have Seen of Woman Suffrage" was participated in by a large number of women. This day will long be remembered.

TWENTY-THIRD DISTRICT.

The counties of Ross, Highland, Fayette and Clinton met in district convention at Greenfield, June 5 and 6. All district officers, each county president and many delegates were present. Fervent devotional exercises, routine business, cordial address of welcome and appreciative response were followed by a carefully prepared address by the president, giving her ideas of the things that hinder the work and the features that should be taken up with energy. Mrs. Anna Reed, president of Chillicothe colored union, read a thoughtful paper on "Temperance Work among Colored People." Mrs. Mollie L. Jones, of Washington Court House, read a beautiful and practical paper on "Mothers' Meetings." A general discussion followed, led by Mrs. Abigail J. Hadley. The address of the evening was given by Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson, National corresponding secretary, who also conducted a question-box at the morning meeting. The reports of the officers and county presidents all showed progress in the work. The officers of the past year were reëlected, and Mrs. Lizzie Harsha, of Hillsboro, was elected delegate to the National Convention. Mrs. Harriet F. G. Peelle read a fine paper on "Open Doors"; Miss May Huff on "The Temple"; Miss Ruth Barrett on "Dress Reform." Committees on resolutions and plan of work made good reports.

TWENTIETH DISTRICT.

Green, Montgomery and Clark counties held their annual district meeting in Dayton. The convention was delightful throughout, the attendance full, weather fine, addresses excellent. Mrs. Monroe, state president, and Mrs. Trego, state evangelist, were present throughout, giving valuable help in a multitude of directions. Scientific temperance instruction received special attention. Mrs. Trego's lessons were a rare treat, and left her hearers longing for more of such instruction; she is certainly filled with the Holy Spirit. The old officers of the district were all reëlected.

MCKEAN COUNTY.

This county reports good work done in all of the unions. Mrs. Louise S. Rounds gave lectures at Port Allegheny, Bradford and Kane. Her lectures were highly appreciated and the cause of the W. C. T. U. strengthened by them. Mrs. A. S. Benjamin gave parliamentary drills as well as lectures and was well received at each appointment. Bradford union is raising one hundred dollars for the Temple. Mothers' meetings are held monthly in connection with the purity department and much interest is shown. The general officers have petitioned our senator and representatives, who in reply, intimated they would support all the measures in which the W. C. T. U. are interested. Special mention was made of the admirable talk to the children at the convention, by Miss McBurny of Bradford, as also the paper on "Kindergarten Work," by Miss Belle Blakeslee, and "Difficulties and how to meet them," by Dr. Elizabeth Kane. Farmers' Valley, a small rural union, is doing a grand work with the Temple wheels. Smethport Y. W. C. T. U. gave a pie social, which was very enjoyable.

WARREN COUNTY.

This county sends in a most excellent report of work done. Warren union has held a series of evangelistic meetings conducted by Mrs. Weaver. Tidioute union secured Mrs. Weaver for a nine days' series of meetings and at each place the results were good. Corydon and Warren unions had Mrs. Ellen D. Blair, National organizer, for two of her delightful talks. Sugar Grove union held two large public meetings which were addressed by the Presbyterian and Baptist ministers of Warren and thirty new members were secured. Garland union reports a musical and literary entertainment given by the Loyal Temperance Legion which was well attended and pronounced the best entertainment ever given there. The Glade Run Varnum Y's gave an ice cream festival which netted them twelve dollars. These enterprising Y's always succeed in their undertakings. Warren union has just held their twenty-first anniversary meeting. The anniversary exercises were held on Saturday afternoon. A temperance mass-meeting was held on Sunday evening which was addressed by Volney B. Cushing. The meeting was presided over by Mrs. Ellen H. Lacy, and was the largest and most enthusiastic temperance meeting ever held in the county. The music was furnished by a choir of one hundred voices from Epworth League and Christian Endeavor Circles, Y. M. C. A's and church choirs, led by the secretary of the Y. S. M. C. A. and was especially fine. Warren union is justly proud of the fact that their union was the second one organized in the state. Mrs. Lacy, the earnest and untiring county president, has just organized one new union in the county and expects to organize several others in the near future. A white-ribbon Sunday-school has been organized and carried on by the Roger's union, a small but earnest band of women, who hold the offices, teach the children and support the school. This county has thirty-nine unions to which ninety-two new members have been added this year. The Warren Y's support a bed in the Temperance Hospital at an annual cost of twenty-five dollars per year. Six members of the Glade Run Loyal Legion graduated in June.

ERIE COUNTY.

Erie county W. C. T. U. is still hard at work. The annual county convention was held at Corry, May 28-30, and was a very successful one; forty delegates were present. Addresses of welcome were made by Miss Darrow and Mrs. Colegrove, and response by Mrs. Thomas, a fine address by W. D. Fellows, general secretary of the Erie Y. M. C. A., were given the first evening. The second evening the Y's gave an excellent entertainment and on Thursday afternoon and evening Major Hilton was the speaker. His afternoon lecture to women entitled, "Thieves in the Temple," was a revelation to some of the mothers of the dangers and temptations surrounding their children. Erie county is working to complete a pledge of one hundred dollars for the Temple. Union city held a very profitable medal contest in the interest of this pledge, the receipts of which amounted to twenty-one dollars. McLallen's Corners union is filling Temple Wheels. One new union has been organized at West Greenfield. Petitions asking for the closing of saloons on memorial day were circulated by five of the unions and four hundred signatures obtained. Edinboro and Fairview unions remonstrated against hotel licenses, Edinboro being successful. A Junior League has been organized of seventy members in Erie, which is pledged to abstain from the use of alcohol and tobacco. The Anti-cigarette League was discussed at convention and a superintendent of narcotics appointed with this as her special line of work for the year. Major Hilton secured nineteen new members for the Corry union. All the unions are working for the "honor roll." Mrs. Alice Trow, the former efficient president, felt unable to serve the county for another year, consequently Mrs. B. S. Hall, of Northeast, was elected president for the ensuing year.

COLUMBIA COUNTY.

Mrs. Ellen D. Blair spent a week in this county speaking for the following unions: Orangeville, Light Street, Bloomsburg, and at the W. C. T. U. mission, June 6, at which four new and five honorary members were added. The explanation of the "House we live in," by Mrs. Blair was very instructive.

LYCOMING COUNTY.

The midyear convention was held in Williamsport, May 9, with good results. Mrs. J. H. McMinn gave an interesting history of the county and of Queen Margaret, who was the first woman to prohibit the sale of liquor to her husband. Mrs. Gage, state superintendent of purity, gave an interesting talk on "Purity in art and literature," which was followed by a strong address on "Purity" by Mrs. Wilson. Miss Susan Saul gave a forcible talk on "Scientific Temperance Instruction." Mrs. A. S. Benjamin gave one of the best parliamentary drills ever given in the city, and in the evening a most admirable lecture. This county also had Mrs. Ellen D. Blair to lecture, May 31.

GREENE COUNTY.

The Carmichael union held a Demorest contest. The Waynesburg unions are working hard to secure the adoption of the endorsed physiologies in the public schools, and the same unions have provided for the payment of their Temple pledge of $100 by August 1st. A health meeting was held in the Y parlors at Waynesburg.

SNYDER COUNTY.

Mrs. Mary E. Gearhart has been doing good work in this county, having made addresses before the Sabbath-school and in two churches at Selin's Grove, has secured the names of nineteen and one honorary member. Rev. Mr. Futzing, pastor of the Lutheran church in Selin's Grove, has been most helpful, and Mrs. Gearhart expects to organize a W. C. T. U.

BUCKS COUNTY.

Downington Loyal Legion gave a delightful entertainment in charge of their efficient superintendent, Mrs. L. H. McGary, the occasion being the graduation of the first class of the Legion. The hall was beautifully decorated. Thirteen students pursued the course and all passed. The exercises consisted of music, recitations, essays, and presentation of diplomas. The Dowington L. T. L. issued cards of invitation tied with a blue ribbon on Children's Day.

LAWRENCE COUNTY

held its semi-annual convention at Edinburg. Unions were well represented and encouraging reports were given. Mrs. Leavens, of Chicago, presented the subject of physical culture in a well-prepared talk. Mrs. Martha Roberts, superintendent of franchise, gave a lively resumé of her department, which she has well in hand. The purity department occupied the attention of the convention for some time. Pulaski union held a parlor and lunch social to which the Middlesex union of Mercer county were invited. New Bedford union held a franchise contest on the 21st.

MERCER COUNTY.

Mercer county has been holding schools of methods at Balm, Mercer, Jamestown and Sharpsville with Miss Crawford as lecturer and conductor. These meetings have been quite successful, a Loyal Temperance Legion being organized at Sharpsville. Miss Crawford gained nine new members for the Grove City Y's and three for the W's. Mrs. Beyer, state superintendent of unfermented wine, has recently moved to Grove City. Mrs. Stevenson, of Leech's Corners, read an able paper on "Purity at Jamestown,"; Mrs. Gillfillan, of North Liberty, at Balm, on woman's work, and Mrs. Larp on "Unite the Forces."

NOTES.

The second state L. T. L. convention was held at Butler, June 19, 20. Hope to give fuller account in next letter.

Miss Jessie Bracku, assistant secretary of the Y's, has recently lost her father by death. Miss Bracku has the warmest sympathy of all her Y friends as well as W's in this her hour of trial.

Allegheny county unions held a picnic. Fayette county has had Mrs. Rice to lecture for their unions. She gave excellent satisfaction and added new members. Uniontown Y's are meeting with success, new members being added at each meeting. Mrs. Rice organized a new union with twenty-eight members with Mrs. Rylain as president.

Notes on Y work have been received, but this letter is much too lengthy to admit of their publication, so will wait until next time when all the Y's are invited to send items and have a Y's letter. Mrs. Hattie Brown Moore is the new president of Crawford county.

VIRGINIA.

FAITHFUL SEED SOWING.

The summer's heat is upon us, and with it that feeling of languor, which in connection with the many home duties of our busy women, make the reports come in somewhat slowly. Still I am sure work is being done in the "Old Dominion" that will tell for eternity. The work in Loudoun county was much helped by Miss Ensign's two weeks' visit early in May. Both the Round Hill union and the Lovettsville Y are starting off with unusual promise.

Lovettsville Y entertained the Loudoun county quarterly meeting, June 21. Encouraging reports of work were given from the five unions and four Y's of the county. Addresses were given by Rev. J. E. Allender, of Lovettsville, and the president of Lincoln union.

Lincoln and North Fork Y's continue their popular and successful parlor meetings. Lincoln W. C. T. U. held a Demorest gold medal contest, May 31, and as usual all were delighted with the efforts of the contestants. This union sent a delegation with flowers, cakes, etc., to the almshouse on June 2, where special gospel service was held.

On June 9 the Lincoln L. T. L. held a flower meeting, using the program sent out in the Young Crusader supplement, with which all present were pleased.

Centralia and Atlanta City unions and Richmond Y have recently held medal contests, the writer still holds to the opinion that in no other way can more good for the temperance cause be accomplished. With permission to vary the rules by the payment of one dollar for the medal, there is no reason why we might not go on with this work much more rapidly.

The Frances Barnes Y of Norfolk, gave the Old Maids' Convention, for the benefit of the retreat for the sick and the Norfolk Protestant Hospital and realized the sum of $110. It was afterwards repeated for the Girls' Home and W. C. T. U. and then in Berkeley for the Armstrong Memorial church.

The regular quarterly meeting of the Richmond unions was held May 28. On motion the quarterly meeting was resolved into a district union and Mrs. J. Tyler Jobson, the efficient president of the Richmond Y, was elected president. This district ow contains four unions and one Y

Mrs. Newton, state organizer, was present and has been doing what she can to work up this district.

"Despair not, it is written; though the eye
Red with its watching can no future scan;
The glow of triumph yet shall flush the sky,
And God redeem the ruin made by man."

News in a Nutshell.

DELAWARE county, N. Y., W. C. T. U. sends cheering words from its tenth annual convention held at Hobart, May 28 and 29. One hundred twenty-five dollars to the Temple, new unions organized, boys and girls marshaled into line, and farmers' wives pledged to wear the white ribbon and pay county, state and National dues—all testify to loyal hearts and strong hands laid to the plow.

KERN county W. C. T. U., California, has been refreshed by the inspiration of its fourth annual convention. The county seat, Bakersfield, entertained the convention. The workers in this district are scattered far and wide and every conference is a precious season of mutual cheer and strengthening. The faithful distribution of temperance literature and sending boxes of clothing to needy points are some of the special efforts of Kern county white-ribboners. Department work is carried on as faithfully as "magnificent distances" will allow.

RIVERSIDE PARK, Havana, Ill., is the location of a Chautauqua assembly which will convene July 26 and extend to August 5. The program offers many attractions. Dr. Talmage will deliver a popular address on "Big Blunders," Dr. Carlos Martyn will give three lectures, Mrs. Carrie L. Grout will speak, conduct school of methods, mothers' meetings, etc., and Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt will contribute from her rich store of wisdom and experience. Monday, July 29, is "Woman's Day," filled by excellent speakers on appropriate topics. For further information address Rev. M. P. Wilkin, president.

THE SECRET OF CHARACTER BUILDING

BY JOHN B. DE MOTTE A. M., Ph.D.

Cloth, Finely Illustrated, $1

"Dr. De Motte's volume ought to be put into the hands of such persons as are inclined to trust to luck or inspiration in character formation. The author wisely and clearly forces upon our attention the fact of the physical basis of character, and the necessity of forming right habits of nerve reaction. The little book is calculated to make a good many people think. It will be of special service to young people inclined to sentimental views of goodness."—Review of Reviews, New York.

"In suggestiveness and high moral impulse this little monograph is worth a dozen volumes of ethical philosophy to most men. We trust it may be widely read and studiously pondered."—Church Standard, Philadelphia.

Cor. Secy's Notes.

Will state corresponding secretaries please take notice that report blanks will be sent out early in August, and that they should be returned by September 15 if possible—certainly not later than October 1? Remember that the Baltimore Convention begins OCTOBER 18, and that we must each be more than ever alert if we are to round up the year in a satisfactory manner.

The program for Mt. Lake Park meetings appears in another column. I hope you will notice especially Mr. Woolley's addresses, Miss Shontz's recital; Mr. Rutnam's (who, by the way, is a native Hindu) and Miss Palmer's missionary talks; Mrs. Benjamin's drills—but the program speaks for itself, and promises a "feast of fat things." Mountain Lake Park is said to be an earthly Paradise. Come and let us enjoy it together.

The W. C. T. U. room at Chautauqua is in charge of Miss Rhena A. Mosher, of Westfield, N. Y., who is a Y of great promise. Literature will be there for distribution, also pledges and a membership roll, while the noontide hour of prayer will be observed. The work is under the general supervision of Mrs. Caroline A. Leech, of Louisville, Ky., and Mrs. Emilie D. Martin, of New York. I shall be there to have charge of the temperance conferences August 14 to 19, fuller notice of which will appear hereafter.

There has been so great a demand for the annual leaflet, that the large edition printed is well-nigh exhausted. As it is so near the rounding up of the year's work, and as so many changes are likely to occur in official lists, it is thought best not to republish before the next convention. The Definition of Principle and W. C. T. U. Catechism are, however, plated, and these we will reprint for distribution at our summer meetings, and as a means for disseminating a knowledge of our work. Please bear this in mind, and note that the few hundred Annual Leaflets still in stock will be sent out to workers only.

Rev. Frances E. Townsley, one of our most earnest and successful National evangelists, has changed her place of residence from Illinois to Howell, Michigan. She would be very glad to better know and become known to the white-ribboners of that state and is open to calls for addresses or for a series of meetings. Those who attended the Cleveland convention will have very pleasant memories of Miss Townsley there, and I am sure her labors will not fail to result in great spiritual uplift.

Good news comes to me from Miss Kate Lunden, Mrs. Grubb's able coadjutor in work among foreigners, of work in organizing Scandinavian unions. She has already organized four: One in New York, with a membership of eighty; Brooklyn, sixty; Boston, sixty-five; Worcester, Mass., sixty-four. Will not those of you who live in towns or cities where there is a large Scandinavian population, write at once to Miss Lunden, asking for advice in the matter of organization.

Several of our workers from the far West are intending to work their way eastward in time for the Baltimore convention, and would like to make engagements en route. Mrs. Ada Wallace Unruh, one of the National organizers, and a specialist in L. T. L. work, is one of the number. She is doing grand work in the West, and I am sure those who secure her services will have every reason to congratulate themselves that they have done so. Those of you who think there is a possibility of opening a way for Mrs. Unruh will please write to me as soon as possible, that I may communicate with her. Mrs. M. S. P. Hidden is also a delegate-at-large from West Washington to the Convention, and she is very desirous of making engagements, especially in New England, and, as Vermont is her old home, her thoughts naturally turn first to the Green Mountain State. Please bear this in mind, and write directly to Mrs. Hidden at Vancouver, Washington, or to me at The Temple.

It is quite like rethreshing old straw to speak of Miss Willard's connection with the Woman's Bible, nevertheless, as the press, both religious and secular, is unwilling to let the matter die, and as some of our own women are greatly disturbed by the misleading statements, it may be well to restate the case:

Miss Willard has never seen a line of the "Woman's Bible," extracts of which are going the rounds. It seems that on the eve of their departure for England early in March, Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Willard called on Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, as the former had never met this distinguished champion of women's cause, and while they were with her Mrs. Stanton asked the two ladies to join the committee of women who were to bring out an exegesis of all those parts in the Bible that relate to the position of woman. This they did with the understanding that such women as Miss Elizabeth Greenwood, Mrs. J. F. Willing, Mrs. Henry and other leading women evangelists should be invited to allow their names to be placed on the committee. As a matter of course Lady Henry Somerset, who is a member of the Church of England, and Miss Willard, who has been a lifelong Methodist, would not think of indorsing an exegesis that took a non-evangelical view of the Bible.

In making this explanation they do not in the least blame Mrs. Stanton, who doubtless mentioned in good faith that they had agreed to help in the exegesis and did not await the responses of the various evangelical names that Miss Willard gave to Mrs. Stanton's daughter during the interview. If these ladies last mentioned should decline to be associated with the committee, Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Willard feel that their names must not remain on the list, as it would not then fairly represent the women of the churches who have always been the co-workers of these two white ribbon leaders.

Since THE UNION SIGNAL is to take a well-earned vacation of two weeks, this will be the last time I shall have an opportunity of talking with you all until the issue of August 1st. The realization of this fact has made me wonder if we of the W. C. T. U. really appreciate what our official organ is to us as a method of communication and a medium for the interchange of thoughts and plans. How else could I so easily reach so large a majority of our constituency? How else could superintendents keep in touch with their workers? How else could we exploit our plans and carry out our purposes? Blessings on THE UNION SIGNAL! It is the sine qua non of each intelligent white-ribboner, and should be her vade mecum. Let us not forget the paper in our vacation days, but let us each try to secure at least one new subscriber. And remember the other W. T. P. A. publications as well. Have you seen a copy of the new "Thumb Nail Sketches"? It is a credit both to the publishing house and to the editor of books and leaflets. Send for a copy.

HAIR GOODS.

B. C. Strehl & Co., who are regularly advertising in these columns, are one of the largest importers, dealers and manufacturers of hair goods in the West. A LITTLE girl in saying her prayers the other night was told to pray for her father and mother, who were both very ill, and for one of the servants, who had lost her husband. ### IMPORTANT TO CHURCHES IN NEED OF AN ORGAN.

Small and medium-sized churches will be interested in knowing that Lyon & Healy, Chicago, have reduced the cost of Church Organs nearly 50 per cent from the prices of a few years ago. Moreover they build an organ of pure and powerful tone, and one that will not readily get out of order. They sell on easy payments when desired, and gladly submit estimates. Write to them for particulars, and mention this paper. A postal card will bring you a most complete catalogue.

MARK LEMON once wrote a book in which he told of a chubby-faced little urchin who passed his instructor upon the street without bowing. The schoolmaster stopped and frowned. "What has become of your manners, sir?" he roared. "It seems to me that you are better fed than taught." "Yes, sir," replied the little boy; "I feeds myself, sir."

A SILVER QUESTION.

The Holmes & Edwards Silver Co. wish to announce to the many people who are using their silver plated ware, the following:

The silver inlaid in the back of the bowls and handles of spoons and forks is 925–1000 fine, as indicating the standard of Sterling Silver. The trade-mark stamped on the Sterling Silver Inlaid goods is "E STERLING INLAID HE." The silver used in electro silver plating on all of Holmes & Edwards' goods is pure silver of the United States Government assay. People buying Holmes & Edwards Sterling Silver Inlaid or silver plated ware are assured of the quality of the silver used, and no questions will ever arise in regard to quality where the name or trade-mark of Holmes & Edwards appears.

"DOES his Celestial Majesty want something written about the settlement of the war with Japan?" said the Chinese poet laureate.

News in a Nutshell.

MRS. E. N. LAW, National organizer, has just closed a week of excellent work in Detroit, Mich. Recently she addressed a great Sunday audience in Plymouth Tabernacle, winning unstinted praise. After the early autumn Detroit will be her home.

MRS. E. M. HOUGHTON has left the Texas field, where for eight years she has labored faithfully in white ribbon evangelism. Her husband has accepted the position of physician-in-charge of Glen Miller Medical and Surgical Sanitarium, Richmond, Ind. Mrs. Houghton will continue her evangelistic work as above.

THE workers of Skagit county, West Washington, have recently organized a county union with the following corps of officers: President, Mrs. Mary McDowell; vice-president-at-large, Mrs. F. O. Elliot; corresponding secretary, Mrs. L. J. Flagg; recording secretary, Mrs. D. B. Davis; treasurer, Mrs. S. M. Hardy.

RICHMOND, Ind., white-ribboners observed flower mission day in a typical way. Gospel services were held at the jail, after which little children handed flowers to the inmates. The inmates of the Old Ladies' Home, Home of the Friendless and the Orphans' Home were also cheered by gifts of flowers with Scripture texts attached.

THE W. C. T. U., of Appleton, Wis., gave a reception to the lady school teachers of the city, about two hundred mothers and teachers being present. The gathering was in the hands of the department of mothers' meetings and was successful in making a closer bond between those who are daily molding child-life and those who are striving for God and the homes of our country.

A "CERTIFIED list" of the Ohio delegation to the World's Convention has come in the welcome budgets of letters written on board the Berlin. Mother Stewart is titled, "president of the delegation." Mrs. S. M. Perkins of Toledo, vice-president. The "constituency" from the Crusade state is as follows: Mrs. H. E. Bashare, Toledo; Mrs. M. A. Boughton, Athens; Miss C. S. Burnett, Warren; Miss May Campbell, Springfield; Mrs. A. Crowl, Canton; Mrs. E. Graham, Newark; Mrs. M. J. Hunt, Cleveland; Mrs. S. L. B. McCrosky, East Cleveland. The last named member of the party is secretary of the company and from her pen comes the word, "a most delightful voyage and the best of company."

THE university town of Athens, Ohio, has heard from the Y's located there in the shape of a thousand dollar drinking fountain presented to the city. With a beginning of ninety dollars in the treasury in 1894, these plucky young women never rested until the handsome gift was in its place, giving refreshment to all who would partake thereof. Mayor Wilson said in his acceptance,— "For many years the old pump that stood where this fountain now stands, has been a nuisance. We did not know whether the water was pure or poisonous. We can now drink from this fountain with the positive knowledge that the water is pure. The fountain was bought by ladies, erected by ladies, paid for by ladies and presented to the town by ladies. A residence of twenty-seven years in this town has convinced me that when the ladies undertake any enterprise in earnest they are bound to succeed." Perhaps the most convincing proof of the success of this fountain enterprise lies in the fact that there is no remaining encumbrance of debt,—this happy condition is due to the combined untiring zeal of the Y's and the generous aid of the citizens of Athens.

Diffuse Help!

In this way. When you see how Pearline has helped you, tell others and let it help them. Where a woman is trying to do housework in the old, hard-working, rubbing way, it's actual charity to tell her about Pearline. Perhaps she uses it for scrubbing, washing dishes, etc., but can't believe that in washing clothes it can save so much work and wear without doing harm.

Your personal experience might convince her. That would help Pearline, to be sure—but think how much more it would help her, by saving time and strength and real money. 446 JAMES PYLE, N.Y.

More than ordinary care is exercised in accepting advertisements for The Union Signal.

Publisher's Notes

This being our last issue for July we wish to remind our readers that the special offer regarding the "Bicycle Book," is for this month only. We will send THE UNION SIGNAL for one year and a copy of Miss Willard's popular and helpful "A Wheel within a Wheel," for $1.35, providing the order reaches us before August 1. We also call attention once more to the coupon offer, good until September 1,—to be found on page 1. That our women appreciate this offer is evidenced by the fact that in response to it, we are receiving many orders for literature.

The subject for the August Bible Reading is "Bible Christianity," and it is written by Miss Cassie L. Smith, National evangelist. Referring to the fact that the white ribbon organization is said by its friends to represent applied Christianity, she deals with the Bible ideal of Christianity, pertinently pointing out that to "remember them that are in bonds as bound with them" means something exceedingly practical with regard to the Christian's attitude toward the liquor traffic and its victims; it means, in fact, the "do-everything policy."

Mrs. Mary D. Tomlinson, National superintendent of Parlor Meetings, writes the monthly Responsive Reading for August in the interests of her department. She gives valuable suggestions concerning parlor meetings and methods of conducting them. This is a department which should be thoroughly "worked" by every local union, and we hope the August reading will be extensively used. Mrs. Tomlinson especially desires us to ask superintendents and unions to send orders to the W. T. P. A. and not to her.

We would urge upon our unions the importance of being regular subscribers to our Monthly Readings. Both Bible and Responsive Readings are practical helps to W. C. T. U. workers. The former aim to give the spiritual touch which is the foundation of all Christian temperance effort; the latter, furnishing as they do, information along the lines of the various departments, are very helpful in showing reasons for the existence of the many branches of our work and the harmony with which they fit into and strengthen each other. Every W. C. T. U. woman should be able to tell what relation each of our forty-two departments bears to the temperance cause, what its part in the great conflict with the liquor traffic, for it is the many-sidedness of the white ribbon organization which calls out the most criticism from its friends. A study of the Responsive Readings will do much toward throwing light upon this subject.

Send for a package of Busy Day leaflet No. 11, "How a Smoker Got a Home," and give one to each of your tobacco-using friends. It gives the experience of a smoker who "quit" and with the money saved purchased a home. A very timely tract for distribution in these days when the financial question looms up so largely.

"The Press for Christian Temperance," is a department leaflet by Frances E. Willard, recently issued. It goes without saying that all W. C. T. U. press workers throughout the country will want this "help." Send for it.

And with all your sending don't forget to send a two-cent stamp for a catalogue so that you may know what the W. T. P. A. publishes in the way of books and leaflets and papers and the prices thereof.

Home Hints.

This is not just the season for boiled eggs, especially in the city, but the favored few who can get the fresh article will gladly learn, if they know it not already, that the old-fashioned way of boiling an egg hard for three or four minutes is not the best. Put the eggs into cold water and let it just reach the boiling point, when they should be quickly removed. Their taste is much more delicate when cooked in this way.

With many housekeepers and laundresses clear starching is a lost art, which in these days of flaring dress skirts must be revived. A stiff, rattling underskirt is very undesirable, and the choice of goods is the first thing to consider. A cheap grade of Victoria lawn is a material which will take and hold fine starch, but glue starches are more successful than any other in giving stiffness without rattle to almost any summer goods. A tablespoonful of common white glue dissolved in boiling water and gradually thinned by adding half a gallon of water is a general rule for making glue starch, and a few experiments will teach the proper consistency.

Dr. Cyrus Edson is quoted as saying: "Most of the ills we are heir to, come from habitual eating of too much beef. If the present era of high prices of beef will only compel people to choose other foods, such as fish or a greater variety of vegetables, the 'beef combine' will have been the unconscious instrument of doing a vast amount of good."

---

A fruit salad:—Beat the yolks of four eggs until very light, add and beat in, until thoroughly dissolved, one cup of powdered sugar, a half level teaspoonful of salt and the juice of two lemons. Peal six bananas and four oranges. Slice into a deep glass dish a layer of banana, put over this a covering of the egg dressing, then a layer of orange sliced very thin across the sections, again a layer of each with the banana on top and the rest of the dressing poured over the whole. Serve ice cold.

---

Bent whalebones can be straightened by soaking in cold water for a few hours. Another way is to press them with a moderately hot flatiron.

---

Grape fruit is an excellent tonic, being "one of the best things to set the digestive organs in order for the day." It is a most appetizing fruit for either breakfast or luncheon. For the first meal it is best eaten in the same manner as an orange; cut in halves across the sections, the pulp being eaten out with the long pointed orange spoon. A little sugar may improve it for some. For lunch scrape out the contents of both halves, remove the thick dividing skin. Replace the pulp of the whole fruit in one-half the skin, which it will just about fill, add a tablespoonful of sugar.

---

To tighten the sagging bottoms of cane-seated chairs wash them with hot soapsuds and let dry in the open air.

---

Keep a handful of table salt on heavy paper, open on your ironing table. There is no better way to clean a flatiron which has gathered starch or rust than to rub it a few times over the salt.

---

Hard soap is better than oil to use on resisting doors and bureau drawers. Rub a little on wherever the wood is rough, or overcrowded, and they will move smoothly. For creaking doors or chairs a bit of oil applied with a feather or small brush to the hinges or springs will overcome that nerve-wearing annoyance.

---

To clean oilcloth use sweet milk.

---

The white spots on varnished furniture will disappear if a hot flatiron is held above them for a second. Don't touch the iron to the surface or you will have more of the objectionable spots.

---

We cannot vouch for the efficiency of the following, but it is so inexpensive and simple it is worthy a thorough trial by those who do not succeed in keeping flies out of the house by use of screens. Mix a small quantity of oil of lavender, say five cents worth, with the same measure of water. Place in a common glass atomizer and spray the room wherever the flies gather. The odor is very disagreeable to insects and very pleasant to most people, so the flies are driven out and the rooms are made as sweet as the linen closets of our grandmothers.

Signal Notes.

IT is stated that the cigarette is responsible for nearly two-thirds of the rejected applicants at West Point and Annapolis.

A STUDY of the subject made by Vassar college, finds the average wage paid in domestic service to men to be $7.18, to women $3.23 per week.

SIR W. T. CHARLEY says statistics prove that twenty per cent of the insane people in England come to this condition from that of habitual drunkenness.

AT San Francisco a young woman has been appointed deputy sheriff. Her special duty is to escort women who have been adjudged insane, to their asylums. By her combined firmness and kindness she is very successful in dealing with them.

MISS MARY PHILBROOK is the first woman in the state of New Jersey to take the examination for admission to the bar. She was obliged to fight every step of her way, being opposed by the supreme court and the justices of the court in getting the required permission to take the examination.

MISS FLORA C. STEVENSON, of Scotland, is the first and only woman on whom the Scottish Educational Institute has conferred the distinction of election as an Honorary Fellow. As a member of the Edinburg Association of the University Education of Women, she has had great influence in securing the admission of women to the university classes.

AT the New England Methodist Episcopal conference held this spring, the tobacco question as propounded to candidates for the admission to the ministry was again discussed. No decisive action can be taken until the General Conference in 1897, when the question will either be continued or the Methodists take a step backward in their requirements of a pure ministry.

MASSACHUSETTS is about to follow the example of Germany in establishing a tramp colony. Two thousand acres of cheap land have been purchased, which by hard work can be transformed into good farm property. It is proposed that every man convicted of vagrancy be sent to work on this farm for two years. The men will, of course, be comfortably clothed and fed during this time.

CANON MACCOLL in his "England's Responsibility toward Armenia" gives us a very sad picture of daily oppression of the poor Armenians: "Every Christian householder who is a subject of the Sultan is bound by law to provide three days gratuitous hospitality to every Mohammedan official or traveller who may ask it, from the Pasha to the beggar. The wretched Christian is thus hardly ever free from these unwelcome guests, who invariably choose the best rooms and food in the house, treating the householder and his family as their slaves."

OF the fifty-two clauses of "The Factory Bill," affecting women operatives in England, thirteen have so far been discussed. These include the investigation of the sanitary condition of the sweat shops into which work is taken, making the employer responsible for the prompt correction of certain evils. Another clause prohibits boys and girls between fourteen and eighteen years of age cleaning dangerous machinery when in motion, an effort to include women in this provision failed. The bill prohibits over time for young persons, but here again the attempt to include women failed. The "dangerous or unhealthy trades," and laundries are questions still to be discussed.

ACCORDING to the annual statement of Sir William Harcourt, Chancellor of the Exchequer, England, the consumption of rum is greatly increased during epidemic la grippe. For the first three quarters of the year ending December 31, 1894, there was no increase in the revenue from imported spirits, notwithstanding an extra tax of sixpence; but in February, the month of influenza and severe frost, the receipts from the sale of rum alone rose to £100,000. From the same reliable source comes the report that brandy is falling into disfavor. In fifteen years the quantity used has fallen off 1,000,000 gallons, or twenty-one per cent, though the population has increased thirteen per cent in the same time.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Queen Victoria is threatened with paralysis.

The excise law was thoroughly enforced in New York city last Sunday.

The Pan-American Congress closed its eight day session in Toronto, July 23, amid great enthusiasm.

United States' troops have been sent to Wyoming to quell the uprising of the Bannock Indians.

Miss Susan B. Anthony was overcome by the heat at Lakeside, O., July 26, but quickly recovered.

Sir Wilfred Lawson, president of the United Kingdom Temperance Alliance, has been reëlected to Parliament.

Dr. Edward Beecher, brother of Henry Ward Beecher, died at his home in Brooklyn, N. Y., aged ninety-two years.

One hundred and forty-eight persons were drowned in the collision of two Italian boats in Genoa Bay, July 21.

The great Horr-Harvey debate, on the financial question, which began in Chicago, July 16, closed July 27. The decision of the judges is not yet announced.

Mrs. Charlotte Perkins Stetson, one of the most gifted women and reform advocates of California, has decided to become a resident of the Hull House, Chicago.

The Newspaper Sermon Association was last week incorporated in Boston for the purpose of disseminating non-sectarian religious truths through the Sunday newspapers.

WE greet our readers this week with renewed courage and strength after our two weeks' vacation, and thank them for their generous approval of our fortnight's discontinuance. We notice that the religious press are commending our action, and would not be surprised if our example were followed by other weeklies next summer.

Do not forget the prizes of ten and five dollars in gold to be awarded by the department of mercy this year for essays. Notices appeared in THE UNION SIGNAL of February 28 and April 18. The limit of time is August 15. Essays for ten dollar prize are to be returned to Mrs. Frances J. Barnes, 146 West 103d St., New York city; those for five dollar prize are to be returned to Mrs. Lou E. Ball, 61 South Jefferson St., Huntington, Ind.

ONE of the most important features of the World's W. C. T. U. Convention was the appointment of Miss Mary F. Denton, of Kioto, Japan, our resident missionary, at a salary of six hundred dollars a year. Miss Denton is from California, and held an excellent position as a high school teacher in that state. She is in her prime, has splendid health, understands the Japanese language and is a devoted white-ribboner.

MISS BELLE KEARNEY, recently elected president of the Mississippi W. C. T. U., was chosen a round-the-world missionary by the executive committee in London, but on conferring with her it was found that her health was not strong enough for such an undertaking, and that she would need some one to accompany her. A suitable companion was not found, and Miss Kearney felt that she would prefer to work in her own country, from which so many good workers have been taken away in these recent years by distance and by death.

MRS. LEAVITT, Miss Ackermann, Mrs. Andrew and Dr. Kate Bushnell and Miss Alice Palmer were reappointed round-the-world missionaries, and the welcome news was announced from Mrs. Barney, who has long been under appointment to go round the world, that she hopes to return to England in the autumn to begin the organization of Ireland, and to go thence to Australia in the spring. It would be impossible for our officers to send out a better woman to any country than Mrs. Barney, of Rhode Island. Mrs. Leavitt and Miss Palmer are in this country; Mrs. Andrew and Dr. Bushnell are recuperating in Switzerland; Miss Ackermann, accompanied by Miss Shaffner, goes to Iceland in July to help spread the work already introduced through the influence of our workers in Christiania.

MOTHER STEWART, Mrs. Hoffman, Mrs. Barker, Mrs. Rounds and Mrs. Burt—indeed, all our American speakers, have evidently "struck twelve" with the British public. Not an adverse criticism has appeared so far as the clippings bureau has revealed. We have every cause to be proud of each and every one of our countrywomen who "went over," and their welcome has been warm and earnest. But the eloquent speaker was the Polyglot Petition. No document has been received with more universal good-will from all good people, and the energy and enthusiasm that has carried that Magna Charta of the home forward to its present position, is even less admired than the sustained effort on the part of so many women in lands so widely severed. Home Protection has become a key-note in Great Britain, and we believe that our brothers in the United States will make a great mistake if they do not adopt those significant words as the name of the party whose central purpose it is to protect the home.

THE majority of the white-ribbon "pilgrims" have returned to their native lands. Our American contingency, one hundred and fifty in number, are once more "in the bosom of their families," greatly refreshed and enriched by the delightful seven weeks' tour. Mrs. Barker was the first to arrive at the Temple. So quickly has the time flown in our busy lives that the echo of her good-bye seemed to linger still in the corridors when her cheery greeting was heard last Friday morning. Mrs. Grow arrived later the same day, and both ladies tell by their shining, sunburnt faces as well as by their lips that the outing and the great Convention were in every way a complete success. The return voyage, which was ended July 20, was almost totally free from seasickness for the entire party. Mrs. Hoffman has remained to lecture in Great Britain, and Mrs. E. B. Ingalls is with her, Mother Prindle and Mrs. Edholm have tarried to establish a Florence Crittendon home in London, and Miss Stewart is resting from her arduous correspondence with her relatives in Scotland.

PERHAPS the most active temperance society of Bulgarians is in Macedonia, which is still under Turkish rule. One of their teachers, visiting Philippopolis not long since, looked longingly at copies of THE UNION SIGNAL and Young Crusader, but dared not try to take one home with her. All persons passing the frontier from Bulgaria into Macedonia are searched and all papers taken away from them,—sometimes the possession of papers as harmless as the Sunday School Times causing great annoyance and detention for days. But the stupid Turk fails to comprehend that the same papers may come through the mail, so allows those from America to be received in that way.

DR. JOSEPH COOK, of Boston, has started on his second lecture trip around the world. It is twenty years since he began his noon-tide lectures in Tremont Temple in that city, and the work that he has done since is worthy of the high encomium pronounced upon it by Rev. Dr. Barrows, president of the Parliament of Religions, who said: "I have always regarded Dr. Cook as a prophet of the better American which is to be as a prince among speakers, and a worthy successor of Sumner and Phillips, Henry Ward Beecher and John B. Gough, who made the great anti-slavery and reformatory epoch of American history. May his great bow abide in strength another score of years." THE UNION SIGNAL says Amen and Amen. Dr. Cook has from the first been with us in every good word and work and his noble wife is one of our ablest white-ribbon comrades.

IN our last issue we published the resolutions adopted by the National Reform Conference as a basis of union for the reform forces. These resolutions have been quite generally approved by leaders in the various reform movements, not, of course, without some criticism and an occasional entirely dissenting voice. We do not suppose that a single one of our leaders approves of every one of these resolutions, but there are certain things that should be kept carefully in mind when considering them. In the first place, the advocates of the various measures expressed in the resolutions constitute the reform forces of the country, the honest people who are honestly, however mistakenly, trying to right real wrongs. In the second place, whatever we may think of the remedy proposed, each resolution is directed against a real and threatening evil, and thirdly, reform forces must unite if they ever succeed. It is utterly useless for these forces to continue to fight each its separate battle, the victories of the one only serving to divide the strength of another, while the common enemy presents an undivided front.

IT is absurd to expect a platform which will exactly suit the views of all who are to stand upon it. The adherents of the two old parties make no such demands, the liquor dealers are not so mad; but thus far reformers, those who have the real welfare of the country most at heart, who perceive the dangers of the situation and are honestly seeking a solution of the problems which confront us, have made the fatal mistake of refusing to unite their forces until a platform should be framed which expressed the views of each upon every subject. Never, until all the questions at issue are settled, will they be able to frame such a platform. There are, of course, many single tax and free silver men who do not believe in prohibition of the liquor traffic as the remedy for the liquor evil. But all of them desire the best remedy to be had for that evil; most, if not all of them, desire the destruction, by some means, of the traffic. They can well afford to let us try our remedy, assured that Prohibition cannot make the drink evil worse than it already is. On the other hand, very many of us do not accept the theories of the single tax or free silver, but, if it should come to the test, we have no great reason to fear that a trial of either or both could plunge us into worse financial troubles than we periodically experience under present conditions.

OPTIMISM---PESSIMISM.

BY JOEL SWARTZ, D. D.

Two Teutons one day were taking a ride,
They met and they halted upon the road side,
Just where some tall cedars their acres divide.
Now, Hans had a face as round as the moon,
He always was humming or whistling some tune,
And merry was he as a jaybird in June.

But Fritz was demure, had little to say,
His visage was thin, his whiskers were gray,
And sadder than ever he seemed on that day.

Good morning, friend Fritz, a very bright morn
I never have seen, since the day I was born,
A prospect so bright for barley and corn.

Ah, yes, neighbor Hans, but nobody knows
What blights, frosts, mildews, ere summer shall close,
May ruin the finest and fairest that grows.
This morning I found, what greatly I fear,
Will ruin the crop, though fine it appear,
An ugly cut-worm on the point of an ear.

But, why, neighbor Fritz, be sad and forlorn?
I opened twelve ears for dinner this morn,
And found them all filled with the sweetest of corn.

I think, neighbor Hans, we never have had Such times as these now, so gloomy and bad,
The people, it seems, are going stark mad.
How labor and capital constantly clash,
We plow and we sow, we reap and we thrash,
And yet for it all how light is our cash!

But, still, neighbor Fritz, 'tis well understood,
The money we get is perfectly good,
And our tables are filled with the choicest of food.

The old times were better, friend Hans, I am sure,
Their manners were simpler, their morals more pure,
And honor and virtue made all things secure.

The papers all show us that these are bad times,
Their columns are burdened with horrors and crimes,
Pervading alike all peoples and climes;
That honor and truth are bartered for gold,
That preachers are venal and churches are cold,
And scoffers are many and blatant and bold.

But, heaven, friend Fritz, still lovingly rules,
Our troubles and pains are often the tools
With which are corrected the follies of fools.

The good and the right are triumphing still,
The angels' glad song of "Peace and good will"
The heavens and earth with gladness shall fill.
The churches and schools are girdling the earth,
The groan of its travail shall break into mirth,
And the "stars of the morning" sing at its birth.

AUNT HANNAH.

In Two Chapters.

BY E. H. CHASE.

CHAPTER I.

Miss Patience did not mingle with the others who had come down to meet the train, nor could she talk and laugh on this day of all days. They could do it if they wished to; she did not know that she blamed them. They had not known Aunt Hannah as she had known her, and, beside, 'Lizy had John and the boys; Aunt Hannah had only been John's aunt and not 'Lizy's. But even 'Lizy would have said she set a store by Aunt Hannah, "but it stood to reason" that, being blessed with a family of her own, she couldn't set quite so much by anybody else. There was Ruth Ann, too, and 'Bijah, and James, and the young folks. It couldn't make much difference to them that one old woman whom they had not seen for ten years or more had gone, but to her, Patience Foster, who was all alone, and who wa'n't given to mixing up even with her own flesh and blood relation, to her it did make a difference, an' she was sure the day was grayer, and the wind, as it swept down the river keener than it usually was.

"I see the train comin' in now, down there back o' Twombley's," said 'Bijah, shading his eyes with his hand.

"I wonder how many on 'em's comin'," said James, placing his fat, round body by the side of the tall, loose-jointed 'Bijah, and looking away down the track.

"I'm kinder 'fraid she won't look nateral," said 'Lizy to Miss Patience, who had advanced a step or two toward the side of the platform. "I can't never think of Hannah 'thout thinkin' of her 's round 's an apple, an' two great dimples in her cheeks. Larst time I see 'er she was sixty, ef she was a day, an' her face was soft an' fat as a baby's. She was a good woman, Hannah was."

The train pulled into the little station. The few who had come with Aunt Hannah on her last journey got out and stood clustered together on the narrow platform. 'Lizy, Ruth Ann, 'Bijah and James went awkwardly up to them and there was a shaking of hands and snatches of conversation in a low tone. The young people stood back and whispered and wondered over the plain attire of the "city folks."

The carriages, the only two carriages in the town, came up and the son and daughter of the dead woman were helped into the first one and a step-daughter and her husband into the other. Then wagons and spring carts were brought and the remaining strangers, with a few of the town people, were helped into them and the little procession moved on toward the village.

Miss Patience had stood back and waited in prim silence while the rest were preparing to escort the old friend and neighbor to her final resting place among them. She did not know these strangers and she felt very much alone. A few of the Blooming Prairie people had started to walk across lots to the place of burial. When the procession had moved along the white country road a little way the idlers began to scatter, and Miss Patience saw a slender, black robed woman (to Miss Patience's eyes young) who, she was sure, had come in on the train, but who had, by some oversight been left. At the same time the woman, catching a glimpse of Miss Patience, came over to her.

"I seem to have got left," she said in a low, soft voice. "Is it far to the cemetery?"

"No, 'tain't fur," answered Miss Patience. "I'm goin' to walk. I couldn't bear to go along 'th all that gang."

"I think I will walk with you, then, if you do not object."

"I don't object, I'm sure," said Miss Patience. "The road's free for you as 'tis for me." And the two started away together.

Miss Patience walked carefully in the worn path by the side of the grass-grown road as if fearful of dusting her low shoes.

"Did you know Mrs. Morrill?" the stranger asked, as she walked closely behind her guide.

"Did I know Aunt Hannah Morrill!" Miss Patience repeated, turning around and looking at the woman. She spoke sharply, but as she met the clear, gray eyes of the stranger something a long time forgotten seemed to rise in her heart and a faint pink tinged her sallow cheek. She reached out a hand that trembled a little and pulled a spear of herd's grass that grew by the side of the path.

"It seems to me now," she said slowly, twisting the long wiry stem about her finger, "it seems to me now that Aunt Hannah was all I had in the world." And then Miss Patience turned, with a characteristic little toss of her head, and walked on even more primly than before, and forgot that another woman was walking behind her until the low voice said musingly:

"That is rather strange, but it is my own feeling exactly. It seems to me that Aunt Hannah was all I had in the world."

Miss Patience stopped and turned around again. "Who be ye?" she asked shortly.

The clear eyes rested on her wistfully, and again the faint pink came to Miss Patience's cheek. "I am Amy Crosby. I lived a neighbor to Mrs. Morrill, and there was just my mother and I. When my mother lay sick so long I do not know what I should have done had not Aunt Hannah been a friend to me. She helped me and taught me how to make my mother comfortable. She had many cares and sorrows of her own, but she always seemed to put them all away for us, and she never came in but that we felt the better able to go on. She did not say much about religion, but my mother said she reminded her of the text which says: 'The kingdom of heaven is within you.'"

"I know it, I know it!" said Miss Patience looking far off across the prairie, but apparently seeing nothing but the boundlessness of her own loneliness.

There were pink and white crowsfoot blooms among the purple heads of timothy, and a little away from the path a rank yellow daisy nodded its golden and brown head. There was a faint murmur of bees and the shrill voice of a locust. They had trodden upon a bit of mint that lay across the path and the perfume enwrapped them. To the south, along the dusty prairie road the little procession slowly wended its way along. It was all a part of the June day to this younger woman which, in after years, the odor of crushed mint or the song of the locust always recalled.

"Did your mother die?" asked Miss Patience coming back to the conversation, and speaking as one awakened from a dream.

"Yes, she died," went on the pathetic voice, "and I was all alone. Oh, so much alone! Aunt Hannah Morrill took me in her arms and was a mother to me. After that I had a room in her house. What I wanted most was love, and Aunt Hannah gave me that."

The face of Miss Patience had all at once been broken up into lines she could not control. She turned quickly, "We sha'n't hear the prayer," she said, walking on.

"I'm a fool!" she muttered, with an impatient gesture as though she threw something from her, "Lewis Crosby's been dead this twenty year and more."

The wagons had come by the longer way, and the two women came to the cemetery at the same time with them. A man opened the gate and the little cortege passed through. Miss Patience and the stranger stood a little apart from the others, near a cluster of wild rose bushes that had pushed through the tangle of prairie grass and daisies.

There was a group of men and women about the new-made grave, and a weather-stained headstone stood among them as if it knew that its lone watch was ended, and that it would never more be so solitary in its guard of the husband, but now that the wife was to lie here too, there would be another stone to hold watch through storm and cold and darkness.

Even the bees seemed to hush at the words of the prayer, and the hymn sounded wierd and strange, and fell like fresh notes of pain on the hearts of those who stood under the sheltering oak, and to mingle with the lights and shades, and with the odors of trodden rose leaves.

When the last rites had been said the people went back to the village, the town folks taking the others to their homes to wait for the returning train.

ETCHINGS.

No. 3.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

Madame Antoinette Sterling.

"I am not a singer, I am a minstrel—I am God's minstrel," and with these words she showed me the place in the Bible where it says: "And the hand of the Lord was laid on the minstrel." Thus spoke the most popular contralto singer in London as we sat together on the platform of Queen's Hall, London, on the night of the good-by meeting at which my British friends gave me testimonials of their good-will just before I sailed for America last June. It was Madame Antoinette Sterling, a woman of New England ancestry, New York birth and New York and European training as a vocalist. She is a woman of noble presence and bearing, with a heart that beats with motherly rhythm for all humanity. Her remarkable voice led to her being early trained in music, and her first fame was earned in Dr. Adam's church of New York city, and afterwards she sang in Henry Ward Beecher's church, Brooklyn. But Madame Sterling has now lived in London twenty years. A happy home with a husband, a daughter and two sons early fell to her lot. She has sung in all the great concert halls of London and of the provincial cities of the realm and always captures the eyes, ears and hearts of her audience. She sometimes dresses in pure white and never in any but the simplest and most womanly way, without any of those "exhibitions" that characterize the operatic stage. She stands before her audience with a little silver book in her hand containing the words of her favorite songs. Sometimes she precedes or follows her singing by a brief, simple-hearted address, in which she urges some great shining virtue like temperance, purity, patriotism, but most of all the love that not only forgives but blesses those to whom it comes.

Madame Sterling is a great friend of Mrs. Hannah Whitall Smith, and has been wont to go with her to "Quaker Meeting," and feels she is a Quaker according to the true principles of that society.

Madame Antoinette Sterling is a thorough white-ribboner, and when she went to Australia two years ago (where she created an immense furore and put in some excellent strokes of work for the purity movement), she everywhere avowed her temperance sentiments, and our women rallied round her. While in Australia she lost her husband, who was also her manager, and her Christian faith and natural optimism were heavily taxed, but bore her safely through the shock and trial.

At a lunch party in her home Lady Henry Somerset and I had the pleasure of meeting several of her friends, among them Jean Ingelow, the poet; Mrs. Millicent Fawcett, the woman suffragist; Mrs. Huggins, the astronomer; Mrs. Hannah Whitall Smith, the evangelist, and several other interesting women of less fame. Our white-ribbon minstrel is ready for every good word and work that helps to advance the causes she has so nobly illustrated by her character and career. God bless her, say we, every one.

She has for many years longed to visit her native land, but the way has never opened until now. Her present purpose is to go across to Canada in a few months, and, after singing there, to go on down through the states and out to California. I am sure our white-ribbon women everywhere will welcome her as a sister and comrade beloved and honored, and I trust she will have many opportunities to sing to her own people the same blessed evangel she has sung for so many years in the land that has adopted her.

THE ANTI-GAMBLING CRUSADE.

BY LASALLE A. MAYNARD.

[Chairman of the Anti-Gambling Amendment Committee.]

For reasons which are not altogether obvious there has been a remarkable upgrowth of public sentiment in this country during the past year or two with reference to the gambling evil. This sentiment has found expression chiefly in the way either of enacting laws against gambling or preventing the passage of laws favoring this form of evil. In both of these directions the gains on the side of public morality have been many, large and positive.

The present movement against the gambling vice had its origin apparently in the moral and political cyclone which swept over the state of New Jersey two years ago, occasioned by the outrageous conduct of the race-track managers and gamblers in that state. For some years previous to that upheaval, New Jersey had been a veritable paradise for pool-sellers, book-makers and all the other evil following of the race courses. The tracks at Guttenberg, near New York and Gloucester, near Philadelphia, became notorious the country over for their vile and abominable practices.

These dens were run by thugs, in the interests of thugs. There was no pretense of decency. Racing at Guttenberg was maintained the year round through summer's heat and winter's snow, not because any one who frequented the track cared for the sport at all, for there was no sport in it for any one. A few sets of bones in the shape of horses were urged around the course at times through mud and sleet above their fetlocks, simply and only for the purpose of furnishing gambling material for the dealers on the track and the pool-sellers throughout the country.

Matters went on until the people of New Jersey woke up one day to find a race-track "starter" elected as the speaker in the lower house of their legislature and the "boss" gamblers of the state in control of all legislative machinery. Then came such an uprising of an indignant and outraged people as New Jersey had not witnessed since war times, and the gamblers and their political allies were buried so deep that nothing has been heard of them since. It would require a book to write the history of that magnificent campaign, led by such heroes as Dr. Kempshall and his associates of the State Law and Order League. To make the death of race-track gambling in New Jersey doubly sure the legislature of last winter passed an amendment to the state constitution forbidding in specific terms pool-selling and betting on races. This amendment will have to be passed by another legislature before it goes to the people for final action but there can be no doubt as to what that final action will be.

The disgraceful and shocking disclosures of corruption and demoralization connected with horse-racing in New Jersey aroused the attention of the whole country, and led to a general agitation of the subject, which has resulted in the passage of laws in several states prohibitive of race-track gambling and in the strict enforcement of existing anti-gambling statutes in many quarters. A deadly blow at race-track gambling was struck in New York state last fall through the adoption of an amendment to the state constitution specifically forbidding "pool-selling and book-making." A committee of citizens was formed in New York city to push this amendment, and a systematic and vigorous effort was made to stir up the people throughout the state with reference to this issue. The amendment was adopted by a fair majority, and is now a part of the organic law of the state. Thus far, however, the racing associations have been able, through the connivance of the legislature, to set the amendment practically at naught. It was the plain duty of the legislature at its last session to enact laws to carry into effect the provisions of the amendment. One bill was passed with this ostensible object in view, but other laws were enacted at the same time purposely designed to give race-track gambling a new lease of life. The net result of all the various legislative schemes and devices with reference to racing in this state was a strange and wondrous mixture of laws and regulations, which no one understands and no one respects.

The chief ingredient in this legal puddle is a measure known as the Gray-Percy law. This law was framed by a prominent jockey club lawyer, and its passage through the legislature was marked by many curious and suggestive incidents. One of the most notable of these incidents was the "defeat" of the bill in the senate on a certain day and a reversal of this action and the passage of the bill on the next succeeding day. The means used to bring about this remarkable exhibition of legislative high-tumbling are still a matter of speculation. The feat was successfully performed, however, and the Gray-Percy device found its way into the statute books. The racing associations of New York state are now operating under the new laws framed in their interests, and are trying to make the public believe that the turf has been reformed and a new era of virtue and honesty in racing has set in.

For some reason the race-tracks seem to be under the control largely of the same old set of "sharps" and swindlers and to possess attractions for the same old crowd of disreputable men and women. It is a fact that book-making as formerly practiced is no longer permitted at the tracks, but the professional gamblers have managed by one device and another to carry on business much the same as before. Thus, for the time being, thanks to the legislature, the gamblers appear to have the advantage here, but the anti-gambling amendment is safely lodged in the constitution and ultimately all laws in violation of its spirit and intent must give way. It is not believed by any one that the Gray-Percy racing law will stand the test of the higher courts to which it is certain to be brought very soon.

In other states the fight against race-track gambling during the past year has yielded better immediate results than in New York. Thus Delaware has effectually shut out the abomination from that state by a new law expressly forbidding betting on horse races. Pennsylvania has done the same. The gamblers of Gloucester and other defunct resorts of the kind in New Jersey, hoped to resume business across the line in the Keystone state and extensive preparations were made to that end, but their hopes were dashed by the passage in the legislature in May last of a bill sternly prohibiting all forms of race-track gambling. Connecticut has an excellent and effective law against gambling known as the "Anti-pool act," passed in 1893. An amendment to this act was introduced in the state legislature at its last session allowing each town to decide by vote in town meeting whether pool-selling should be allowed on race courses within the town limits. It was simply a gambling license bill, and, as such, was vigorously opposed by the moral and religious interests of the state. The senate finally passed the measure, but it was killed in the lower house after an exciting contest. Connecticut therefore maintains its old ground on the prohibitive law of 1893.

In Minnesota there was a long and exciting contest last winter over an anti-pool selling bill, with the final result in favor of the measure. Here, as elsewhere, the chief scene of conflict was in the halls of the state legislature, and it was only by dint of numerous appeals and petitions, and vigilant and unremitting effort on the part of noble and earnest men that the anti-pool selling law was finally wrested from the reluctant legislators. In Illinois the main issue came up in the form of the Humphrey Bill, a measure designed to license pool gambling on race courses in the state, with certain limitations. The Civic Federation of Chicago led the fight against this abomination with such effect that the bill was allowed to die in the lower house of the legislature after it had passed the senate. Gambling in all its forms has suffered many other reverses in Illinois during the past year in contests in the courts and in municipal administration, a full record of which would require a volume. Perhaps the greatest and most decisive victory was that gained in the decision of the Illinois Supreme Court to the effect that pool-selling either on local or foreign events, is common gambling and amenable as such to punishment under the state statutes. Under this decision it is practically certain that such dens as those at Hawthorne and Harlem may eventually be wholly suppressed. The Civic Federation of Chicago has waged a brave, strong and skillful campaign against gambling in all its forms, and its work has not failed of many excellent results, especially since it has a local administration in sympathy with its efforts.

Space fails us to more than mention other notable triumphs over the gambling evil in legislative halls and elsewhere. A new law directed against bucket-shops gambling has been enacted in Massachusetts. A new statute has just gone into effect in Montana which, it is said, will effectually close every gambling den in that state. In Rhode Island, Maryland and Virginia the lines around the gambling business have been tightened and a strong movement in favor of the entire suppression of this evil is in progress in all these states. Mention should also be made here of the new order of things in Saratoga which has been notorious for many years as a gambling resort. For several years the village has had a gambler for its president and a board of village trustees in open and avowed sympathy with the gambling business. Recently, however, a reform government has been inaugurated and orders have been given that all gambling must cease in Saratoga from this time forward. And this reform, it is believed, has come to stay. This first review of recent anti-gambling legislation would be very imperfect did I neglect to mention the notable triumph gained in the passage of an anti-lottery bill at the last session of Congress. The story of the struggle over this measure I cannot attempt to give. It marked what, it may be hoped, was the last stage in a long, bitter and eventful contest against the Louisiana Lottery and other concerns of its kind. For this and all other victories over the gambling vice which I have mentioned here, the people of this country have reason for profound thankfulness. The results everywhere are encouraging in the highest degree to all who are battling against vice and sin in any one of their multitudinous forms.

PURITY'S PROHIBITION POLICY.

BY MRS. JOSEPHINE E. BUTLER.

It may be asked how it is that any federation having for its direct aim the abolition of state regulated vice, and concentrating its energies as an organization on this aim has given birth to an awakening which has been so fruitful in so many directions? For me, and for those who have worked with me from the beginning, there is no difficulty in answering this question.

It is the open and public challenge to the governments and authorities of the world which has shaken the consciences of men and stirred public opinion as by an earthquake shock; and nothing short of such an open challenge could have done that. The spirit of a holy war cannot be aroused, nor can the opposition be provoked which it is necessary to provoke, by rescue work, by alterations of the laws here and there which deal with solicitation in the streets, etc., still less by a proposal to punish the female sinners in the case, the weakest and most helpless portion of society. Nor can such a spirit be immediately aroused by the education of the young in the home and in schools in principles of self-control and purity. These things are the influences which are needed and are being called into existence to bear upon the future —both the near and the more distant future. We must be ever assiduously preparing the way for a better state of things by the training of the young, by the reform of our social institutions, by the purifying of our laws, and the removal of the many hindrances around us to virtue; but before we can effectually do all this, it is necessary to proclaim openly a holy war, and this can only be done by a challenge, open, public, and sounded throughout the world, together with a demand that all the ruling powers shall abandon the position they have taken up in regard to this vital question, a position in which they are endeavoring continually to strengthen themselves.

How is it that such an open challenge awakens the public conscience and is recognized as a call to war? It is because it strikes at the very citadel of the evil in the hearts of men. The worst men will approve of our rescue work, will even subscribe to help it on; they will offer little or no opposition to certain legal reforms in detail, they will allow us, though unwillingly, to protect minor girls from their seductions or violence, knowing that laws for such protection may be, and constantly are, under the regulation system, made void in their administration. But when by our public challenge and our proclamation of destruction to all forms of governmental or official regulation and protection of vice we in effect deny the claim of men to oppress women, when we demand that men shall exercise self-control and live virtuously; when in this open challenge men read their deprivation of the impure privileges which they have claimed in all times they are furious; they are also filled with "the fear which hath torment," the depths of hell are stirred. And it is well; the depths of hell need to be stirred before we can hope for the battle to be set in array which will end in the final triumph of righteousness over iniquity.

Nothing short of such a proclamation and war-cry as ours can arouse the enthusiasm which is necessary to destroy the organized, tolerated and protected institution which aims at securing to evil men safety in the enjoyment of their disgraceful "rights," and which seals the slavery and secures the destruction of millions of women.

MY PARENTS.

BY LYMAN W. DENTON.

Oh, Time, in thy swift flight serene and grand.
I bid thee stay thy ruthless, wasteful hand,
And gently smooth the hair of raven hue,
Whose threads of white were penciled fair by thee
Upon my honored parents' noble heads;
Now let their latter days decline as sweet
As hallowed summer eve, with naught to grieve
Or vex; let sacred glory paint their skies,
And peace and joy pervade the air in which They pass what's left of their "earth's little while."

The Pilgrims En Route to the Grindelwald Conference.

June 24–26, 1895.

Dear Union Signal:—From London to Dover and Calais! A world-famous transit this; small wonder that the white-ribbon contingent who were booked for this route, armed with their blue budgets of coupons, tickets, etc., awaited the hour of starting in the Holborn Viaduct station that warm June morning with glowing countenances of expectation. We came with "hand baggage only" (vide the wise directions in The Union Signal), and must have presented something of the appearance of a group of emigrants as we made our way to the coaches at the appointed hour and were distributed by sixes and eights in the compartments which divide an English railway carriage.

It was a delightful change from the busy Convention days and hotel life in the great metropolis to find ourselves speeding away out of range of chimney pots across the garden land of England. The eyes dwelt with pleasure upon the cultivated lawns and fields, the hedge-bordered country lanes and the broad meadows, bright with flowers, of London's tributary surroundings. We caught a brief glimpse of the Norman outlines of the ancient Rochester Cathedral; of the busy manufacturing town of Chatham, and of the famous Canterbury Cathedral and ruins, ere we were landed with almost American velocity upon the pier at Dover.

"Can this be the tempestuous English Channel so dreaded by travelers?" was our natural thought as we steamed away from Dover. The blue dancing waters sparkled in the sunlight; the seabirds followed in our wake; the brilliant sunbeams enhanced the whiteness of the chalk cliffs. I slipped down shortly into the ladies' cabin to take a peep at the seasick voyagers. The luxurious couches in double tiers were almost deserted. Only one lone passenger, evidently determined to fulfill her part of the expected, with complete preparations about her, lay with half-shut eyes awaiting the inevitable. It never came!

Arrived at Calais (which our considerate Italian courier most courteously pronounced with an accent on the "s" that we Anglaise might more easily comprehend!) after the quickest voyage on record, the fortunate travelers were quickly mustered through the dreaded ordeal of the douane (customs). Such was the potency of the Grindelwald labels supplied by Dr. Lunn. Baggage secured (a bit of effort which no American traveler can put forth without a word of protest) and placed in the railway coaches reserved for our party, the lunch was heartily enjoyed; this, despite the warning in the reliable guidebook (published by that most considerate and thoughtful of men, Dr. Lunn) that the lunch was a "most uncertain quantity" after the Channel trip.

Boulogne, with its quaint houses and picturesque fishwives; Abbeville near the battlefield of Crécy; Amiens with its wonderful thirteenth century cathedral; Laon, another provincial cathedral town; Rheims of historical and jackdaw renown, and the headquarters of the champagne "industry," were all passed before we reached Chalons at 9 p. m.,—a place most important in our eyes because we were to dine there. The long tables on which the excellent repast was served were surrounded by a merry crowd. But none will know the mental process which took place in that hotel-keeper's mind when the hundred guests departed leaving the long rows of carefully arranged wine bottles untouched and every water bottle empty! It was an object lesson if nothing more.

That our white-ribbon pilgrims are famous travelers was proved by the way in which the majority adapted themselves to the unreasonable discomforts of an all-night continental trip. It would have been an entirely self-abnegating mortal who would have refrained from uttering some sotto voce remark on the superior advantages of American railway travel. An artist was sadly needed in our compartment where seven feminine white-ribboners and one possessor of the "legal male mind" sought to wile away the hours in slumber. The scene was kaleidoscopic. Sitting side by side the gray heads of the gentlemanly honorary member from Massachusetts, and the amiable courtly president from Arkansas, fell forward at acute angles threatening at every moment a violent collision which was expectantly awaited by their half drowsy neighbors. The kind-hearted president of three Canadian provinces, whose knowledge of continental travel and languages had constituted her our "guardian angel," uncomfortably wedged in a corner with upturned face shielded from the midnight lamp by a veil, sought in vain to catch a wink of sleep. The earnest local worker sat on her handbag on the floor, with head upon the cushions in a most prayerful attitude, while the weary traveling editor with a shawlstrap under her elbow, a handkerchief over her countenance and her feet upon a telescope bag, industriously slept on and on.

Morning found us at the gateway of Switzerland. The balance of the company who had come via Folkestone, Boulogne and Paris, making a total of one hundred and thirty in all joined us at the dejeuner in Berne, the beautiful Swiss capital. Every trace of sleepiness vanished as the long train crept slowly towards the Alpine highlands. Soon the glorious scenery of the Bernese Alps came upon our view, and we hailed with rejoicing "Her Serene Highness" the Jungfrau, whose majesty is nowhere more impressive than at the beautiful town of Interlaken. The ride thence on the Lake Thun steamers and up the cog mountain railway to the charming valley of Grindelwald framed by the eternal hills presented ever changing visions of loveliness and grandeur. Rest and refreshments awaited us at our journey's end. We had entered the "valley of blessing!"

Temperance Week at the Swiss Chautauqua.

June 24–30, 1895.

No wonder that the executive and observing projector of the Grindelwald conferences, after searching the whole of Switzerland for a suitable location for his "Chautauqua," fixed finally upon this delectable spot. The broad valley is a natural amphitheater, cooled by the breezes sweeping over the adjacent glaciers, through the deep mountain passes; watered by the swift Lutschine and shaded by the cool heavenly peaks inviting us to divine solitude and communion with the Creator of all things.

The Grindelwald conference, as Dr. Lunn himself tells us, was suggested by a political club of many-minded members to which the doctor at one time belonged and which met for the discussion of current political events each week. So helpful were these gatherings in leveling abstracts and enabling the members to see eye to eye, that the idea occurred to the Rev. Doctor that the same plan might be felicitiously carried out among religious teachers and preachers. The project met with immediate success, for nearly one thousand persons responded the first season, 1892. The plan of combining a holiday outing, with the opportunities for hearing and participating in the discussions of spiritual and intellectual subjects with specialists in the evenings, struck a popular chord.

This Chautauqua will differ always from American chautauquas in that none of its meetings are held during the day. The English know better than to give up an entire holiday to mental stimulus. An outing must always be an outing, and considering the fact that the evenings only are given to the mental food, the results are eminently encouraging.

The plan of coöperative educational travel originated in the mind of Dr. Lunn, and is connected with reunion conference movement. By means of the former, thousands of persons annually are enabled to travel economically, to hear lectures at the various points of interest by learned persons best fitted to impart the information: Canon Farrar at Rome, Professor Mahaffy at Greece, and many others. Dr. Lunn's latest plan is one to Palestine, Egypt, and Constantinople, to go with the Great Petition which is to be presented to the rulers of these countries next fall. The expedition starts in October. The rate of three hundred dollars from New York back to New York, which is unprecedentedly low, should make it possible for many of our white-ribboners to join in the notable tour, and those who have enjoyed the present excursion commend Dr. Lunn's practical arrangements most heartily.

Last year, 1894, two thousand five hundred persons attended the Grindelwald conference, and the religious leaders present were representatives of diverse theological opinions. The evangelical divines, broad churchmen, English churchmen, nonconformists and other non-episcopal leaders presented their views upon the same platform. This year the program has its discussion of temperance and social problems and a literary section besides the church reunion section. It is in the first division and the connection of the World's delegates therewith that The Union Signal readers will be especially interested.

Owing to the crisis in English governmental affairs, and the impending electoral campaign at which temperance will be the living issue, our leaders, Miss Willard and Lady Henry Somerset were obliged to telegraph their inability to attend. This was a great disappointment, but one which was met with the greatest possible good humor by the conference leader who saw his well arranged program thus decapitated. Word had already been received that Mrs. Josephine Butler, who had arrived at Berne on her way to Grindelwald, was detained by illness. Despite this accumulation of disasters, Wednesday evening found the German Swiss church in the village filled with an alert audience, who had come to hear the discussion of the various legislative ways of dealing with the drink question. Mrs. Helen M. Barker, of Chicago, presented the two ways of dealing with the traffic in America: License or tax, and prohibition. Local option which she averred was generally "too local and too optional," was included in the latter. With her usual ability she gave convincing illustrations proving license a delusion and that the prohibitory law can be enforced as well as any other law. Miss Slack, of England, gave the facts regarding the proposed English temperance measure, the "Direct Veto," which she earnestly claimed was their best first movement toward prohibition. Others joined in the discussion and the meeting was very interesting.

Miss Kearney, of Mississippi, and Miss Phelps, of Canada, were the speakers of Thursday evening. The former told the wonderful story of saloon exterminating in her state and made her usual eloquent plea for woman and abstinence. Miss Phelps, a well posted and popular speaker, concisely reviewed the history of the drink custom through the centuries, and the attempts at dealing with it in Canada. Mrs. Charles Archibald, president of the three Maritime provinces, was called for, and cheerily responded by giving some account of the local option workings in her districts, and the plebiscites for prohibition. Her statement that the government of Nova Scotia takes away the grant of the instructor who fails to give scientific temperance instructions was warmly applauded. Mrs. Hoffman, who has won her way to the hearts of English audiences, spoke encouragingly of the increasing favorable attitude of the church on the drink question.

On Saturday evening, our new World's corresponding secretary, Miss Agnes Slack, gave an address on a subject concerning which she has had wide experience and knowledge, as she was among the first of the lady guardians of the poor appointed by the English government and served a time, the only woman upon the board with seventy-five men to whom she awarded high praise for justice and discrimination. Her topic was "Woman's Work in Local Administration," and proved especially interesting to American hearers to whom many of the facts were new. Conceding that England must bow its head in shame because it had the most drunken women of any country, she rightly claimed that the women of England are the strongest political force of women of any land. Its recent District and Parish Councils acts have set one thousand women in municipal work. Three women have served on a royal commission of education, one woman as labor commissioner, and there are women factory inspectors, workhouse matrons, police matrons, etc. Women's claim to a share of governmental control is an ancient one.

The announcement that Arthur Booth-Clibborn, husband of La Marechale, would conduct services in the parlor of the hotel, packed the room on Sabbath morning at half-past nine. A man of spiritual refinement, with bushy, dark beard and hair, dressed in the regulation uniform of the Salvationist, was the figure which stepped before us. Accompanying himself upon the zither, he sang the sweetly solemn songs written by La Marechale and himself, making each verse a text by the interludes of exhortation and explanatory remarks. "We are not called simply to be saved but Saviours," he said. The Salvationist's motto, "Blood and Fire," means blood for our salvation, fire for the salvation of others. The cause for a lack of Pentecostal fire is the lack of Pentecostal fuel. Though his audience was a body of temperance workers, he would preach "intemperance" from the Pentecostal text. He wanted us to be filled with "new wine" and to become "intemperate,"—entirely given over to God's service. Our hearts were "stirred within us" at the eloquent spirituality of the man who has been reviled and persecuted in his arduous labors in the Catholic, wine-drinking lands, but who, under all circumstances, continues to preach the doctrine of a "clear and simple religion" and "a clear, limpid testimony."

Many climbed up the steep ascent under the hot afternoon sun to the open air amphitheater upon the hillside and listened to Mother Stewart's address on the effects of prayer during the Ohio Crusade. The "old, old story" came afresh to a Swiss mountain audience from the lips of the aged but still rugged apostle of the historic whisky crusade.

At five o'clock, in response to a call by the World's corresponding secretary, Miss Slack, the delegates assembled in the parlors of the Eiger hotel for a farewell meeting. There were prayer, singing, and brief, impromptu remarks by nearly a score of delegates. The white ribbon was tied on a Salvation Army sister who was present and spoke. The delegates parted feeling that this was the last time on this tour when so many would meet together, as their paths were now divergent.

Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman, "our Wendell Phillips of the drink reform," occupied the pulpit in the evening, her subject being, "Our Inheritance from the Past and our Legacy to the Future." Heredity was the keynote sounded with a clear, firm touch which no one could mistake. The audience was most appreciative and attentive.

The very full course of lectures concluded on Monday evening with an address by Miss Hallie Q. Brown, the reader, singer and lecturer of Wilberforce College, O.

Aside from the public evening meetings there were many quiet incidents, and temperance object lessons given by our devoted and representative delegation in its journey in distant lands. A page of The Union Signal might be filled with these and more, if each individual worker would give an account. An interesting story which has just come to me is that of an English high church clergyman addicted to tobacco. Coming to Mrs. Hoffman at the close of an address, he said, "I have been so impressed by what your ladies have said that I am giving up smoking, and want to present you with my pipe." Mrs. Hoffman claims this the best souvenir of her trip.

In Switzerland.

Grindelwald, July 1, 1895.

The traveler who visits the great "play ground of Europe" expecting absolute seclusion away from "the wild, maddening roar of the world," seeks it in vain. The iron horse, tip-tilted and slowgoing cog-wheel affair as it may be, has penetrated the mountain fastnesses and let loose the army of invading tourists of every nationality and clime into the most inaccessible districts. Every rural mountain path is besieged by lace-selling peasants, sturdy children with Alpen Rosen and berries for sale; Swiss maidens singing unintelligible melodies for a pour boire, and men with cheeks distended like bellows trying to elicit harmonious echoes through the lengthy Alpine horns from the opposite cliffs. Trinkhälle are perched in unexpected places, over the mountain paths with their inviting cool canopies and innocuous fluids to tempt the thirsty amatuer mountaineer.

All these evidences of "civilization" are met on every hand. True the cowbells still tinkle sweetly in the pastures of the upper Alps; the eternal snow glitters white upon the mountain tops or under the summer sun thunders with reverberations deep and long in avalanches down the mountain side and the long white glacier gleams remotely in the distant pass. But follow that path and you reach the glacier's side, only to find a flag flying, a little wooden hut and an artificial grotto with a demand for fifty centimes as admission fee!

Oh, these careful Swiss with their unique Industrie des Touristes! How they mingle practical economy with the sublime. "What is the capital of Switzerland?" was asked a traveler. "Why, the money they make from tourists, of course!" was the instant reply. It is well, however, that these sturdy, honest, though calculating folk, are able to eke out the scanty livelihood they can glean from rocky soil, by the great "tourist industry."

Some of us and especially those of American origin are very grateful for the aids to high climbing and vantage points which are so kindly provided (for compensation). Ready as the white-ribboner is to adapt herself to every circumstance, there are few of us so constituted or trained that we could enjoy many of the lovely excursions among these glorious mountains if it were not for these extraneous aids. Yet many remarkable feats have been accomplished by our more vigorous members during their brief residence among the heights. But the developments have been unequal and generally in unexpected quarters. Who would have conceived that the president of Kentucky would vie with Texas' leader upon a mountain pony? Or dreamt for a moment that the business manager of the W. T. P. A., would be distanced on a ten-mile descent by the National treasurer? But so it proved.

The favorite trip from Grindelwald is that to the little Scheidegg, the Wengernalp, from whence a glorious view could be obtained of the mountain giants, the Eiger, Mönch and Jungfrau, and the entire valley lay spread out far below us with its green and sloping hillsides, and snow-capped Wetterhorn, a silent and grim sentinel. The return by the mountain path through pasture, timber belt, hemlock forest and flowery meadows is a good initial walk for a "tenderfoot."

Beautiful Lauterbrunnen was another objective point, and its gleaming falls, the Trümmuelbach and Staubbach, sent cooling breezes in the faces of the admiring delegations who went by carriage or rail according to taste, inclination and pocketbook. Others undaunted entered the car of the almost perpendicular rope railway and were "lifted" to the summit of the ridge where a panoramic scene of beauty from the village of Mürren was their reward. The sturdy, disdaining to return by the same route, compassed the ten-mile walk down the well worn "mountain stairs" above the falls to the valley below. The ice glaciers, warranted to be the "most easily accessible in Switzerland" were also objective points of the active members of our party, some of whom, after the steep climb under the rays of the sun (which does warm here) wondered what it would be to reach an "inaccessible glacier."

Fine weather, arrangements and accommodations (of the most improved modern hotel type, "barring" the stair-climbing and candles all combined to make the week's stay in Grindelwald one long to be remembered. The unqualified appreciation of the white-ribbon party put in form of a resolution by Mrs. Barker, was accorded to our genial and courteous host, the Rev. Dr. Lunn.

Off for Lucerne and Paris!

The White Ribbon Pilgrims on the Continent and Homeward Bound.

London, July 13, 1895.

Individually the white-ribboner may not be termed mercurial in temperament; collectively, however, the American contingent to the World's W. C. T. U. has displayed manifest qualities of the volatile metal. The evidence was made after a few days' stay in the happy valley of Grindelwald. The cohesion and adhesion of the various companies within the delegation became disturbed. New parties united and formed; the solidity of the group was dissipated as the side trips and excursions, made possible by the elasticity of Dr. Lunn's well organized plan, were arranged according to individual tastes and inclinations. Some groups content with but a few days of Grindelwald were off at an early date for a glimpse of southern Switzerland and Italy. Others wended their way for a short distance within Teutonic borders. Even those who remained the entire week at Grindelwald took diverse paths towards Paris after their visit at Lucerne. Some chose to spend a day or two at the capital of Switzerland, Basle, going from there for a short excursion to the falls of the Rhine at Neuhausen. Others visited Berne enroute and still others went directly from Lucerne to the gay French metropolis. Wherever the trail of the pilgrims was found there went also the knowledge of our work and the seed was sown.

Quite a contrast to the sylvan life of the Grindelwald valley was that of the popular tourist resort, Lucerne. The lovely lake, glorious mountains and the fair city nestled within formed a picture long to be shrined in memory. Here the city life of the cultured and wealthy Swiss was illustrated in sharp contrast to the rural scene, we had just visited. The tourist was more numerous. But where, oh, where, in this mountain country does he (she) not penetrate either on foot or bicycle, by diligence, carriage or rail? The white-ribboner tourists did not seek the usual Meccas of the traveler, the Kurhaus, theater, concert hall or wine room as might be imagined. But our ribbons fluttered on the steamer decks, the old ramparts and city walls, in the glacier gardens, before the wonderful Loewendenkmal (the lion of Thorwaldsen) and within the cloistered walls of the ancient cathedral where the marvelous organ gave forth, with almost human intonations, the divine melodies of the Avé Marie and the Pilgrim Choir. Faith in the (now disputed) story of William Tell was reëstablished in our hearts as we gazed upon the very places in which his life-events transpired. After seeing the shrines, chapel and monument, who could doubt the reality of the sturdy mountain hero? It was of such that this staunch mountain republic was formed and maintained; his is but a single instance of heroic valor and self-respecting independence which might have been duplicated many times. We left Lucerne while still hungry for more—a healthy digestive condition, no doubt—the main line of the tour bearing us directly to Paris.

Paris—What can I tell you of Paris? You have read about it all—its gayety and brilliancy, its careless poverty, its well-disguised squalor, its glossed vice, and picturesque beggary. But reading brings but a faint conception of the wonders, beauties, historical and humane interests surrounding this "city of enchantment." One must see for one's self.

What did we white-ribbon travelers do in the face of these powerful and multitudinous attractions with but a few precious days of time? We had studied our maps and guide-books of course, and had our "bumps of locality" in good working order. The weather was bright and glorious, as it has been without exception since our arrival in London. We lost not an hour. For a "general view," we sought the platforms of the great Eiffel tower from which we had a wonderful outlook over the city and country. We drove in voiture, or ominbus, or on a Cook or Gaze "break" about the broad, smoothly paved boulevards. and through the beautiful Bois de Boulogne where fashionable Paris could be seen. We studied historical Paris in its monuments, which grace every open square and park, its tombs, its bridges, its palaces, and cathedrals, beginning at awe-inspiring Notre Dame, on the island of St. Louis, which is "the cradle of Paris," and ending with Versailles, thirty miles away, where the ill-fated but pitiable Marie Antionette held court.

A morning in the Louvre opened up treasures of art. We saw another side of life in Paris, conducted by members of the Armeedu Salut (Salvation Army). This was a night drive through the "fighting quarter," along streets crowded with gay seekers after questionable amusements, lined with brilliantly illumined open cafés, or wine-rooms where men and women clinked glasses together; past places of vile resort; the black saloon where recklessness has reached its highest point of horror, and liquor is drank from skull-shaped glasses, the bar is a coffin, and for a few sous the maudlin customer is covered in a caskot lowered to the cellar and mocking prayers are said over him!

A pleasant change during this evening's program was the call at the Salvation Army's rescue home at Neuillet, where the young girl inmates sang bright French hymns to which we responded by our own rather slow moving English ones and by prayer. We also stopped at the Barracks in a very rough quarter where we were cordially received and listened to a few stirring testimonies from the Army corps which were translated to us.

Mr. Arthur Booth-Clibborn, the husband of La Marechale, had made a special effort for the reception of the W. C. T. U. visitors in Paris. A little circular was issued with an announcement of the meetings for Sunday, July 7. Three services were held during the day, all of which were attended by our members, many of whom participated, by word and prayer. For the kindness and attentiveness of this hard-worked, self-forgetting, consecrated Commissioner of the Salvation Army for France and Switzerland, and his co-workers, the pilgrims are correspondingly greatful. We deeply regretted the illness of La Marechale, which prevented our seeing and meeting her in the great work to which she has devoted life and soul, and sacrificed health.

The modest lettering, W. W. C. T. U., in a window in the Rue St. Honoré (205) indicating the headquarters for France, invited many of our workers to enter the "tea-room and r ading-room for ladies," over which Miss De Broen, National president of W. C. T. U. for France presides. The window alone with its open Bibles, and illuminated mottoes is an inanimate evangel, shedding light upon the hundreds who pause before it each day and read the open pages. The leader herself was absent in England, but Sister Martha cordially welcomed the visitors and friends.

Not so many found their way by rail, tram or boat out to the village of Suresnes, where a walk along narrow winding streets through the work people's quarter brought one to a high wall, upon the top of which was the modest sign, "La Crêche de Suresnes." Entering the gate, a walk between vine-grown board walls brought one to the garden entrance and the steps leading to the door of the house. This was the crêche of the French Y, which the Y's of America have assisted in supporting. It was a pleasant thing to walk through the well cared for rooms and see the little ones whose mothers were out at work or unable to do for them being tenderly cared for, and in a way to be trained for temperance. The older ones were running about; some were having their noon-day nap in cot and cradle, and all, numbering about twenty, seemed to be happy and well. The crêche has accommodations for forty. The little gravel fenced-in plot in the garden under the high shade of the trees made an ideal playground. May the good work, planted under so much difficulty and labor, by our former Y representative (now Mrs. Isabel Gibson Scott, of Philadelphia) grow and bear fruit abundantly!

From July 9 to 12, each day found some of the pilgrims en route to London, in preparation for the return journey to the Home Land. To the question, "Are you ready to go?" the answer invariably is, "Yes, indeed, if I cannot stay a year longer, I might as well go now!"

Those who were bidden to the World's executive convened in the Memorial Hall committee room, Thursday, July 11, to transact business of importance, Miss Willard in the chair. Besides the general officers, there were about a dozen representatives from various countries, the associate editor of The Union Signal being admitted by courtesy but not to vote. The business was expeditiously conducted. Mrs. Barney, of Rhode Island, was made a round-the-world missionary; Mrs. Henry Osborne, of England, was elected an additional representative for the World's W. C. T. U. to attend the Basle conference in August, and Mrs. Bamford Slack, of England, was made World's superintendent of the political department.

Notices were given of amendments to the constitution, to be proposed two years hence, one of which was, that when the president of a National society is a general officer of the World's W. C. T. U., the society shall be represented in the executive committee by a member elected by the society. Another important notice was that the editors representing the World's official organ, shall be made ex-officio members of the World's executive committee. Finances were presented by Lady Henry Somerset, whose report showed that no expense is to be incurred by the World's W. C. T. U. for the great meetings in London; by Miss Anna Gordon, who gave the balance for the current year and Mrs. Edith Archibald of Maritime Provinces, who has been treasurer pro tem, pending the choice of permanent treasurer. This office is to be filled by Mrs. Sanderson, of Quebec, president of the province.

We returned to find the British sisterhood deep in the campaign attending the dissolution of Parliament and re-election of a new government. Yet they found time amid pressing duties to accord to us a five o'clock tea and farewell meeting on Friday afternoon, July 12, which had been arranged by Mrs. Mary Ward Poole, Miss Gertrude Hunt and Miss Helen Hood. Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Willard were present. After the warm hand-clasps of the reception and a light refreshment, a genuine Methodist "love-feast" formed the farewell meeting, each being called on in turn and speaking in impromptu fashion, as she was moved. One spoke of the breadth of comradeship that had been experienced during the five weeks' companionship of the convention and tour. Another encouraged the sentiment of pride in each other, claiming that in Biblical truth we should be "proudly exultant" over our accomplishments in His name. Madame Stirling sang, Lady Henry Somerset gave a sweetly earnest word of farewell, Miss Willard capped it with a prayer for the safe conduct of the company over the wide waters, placing them all in His care, the benediction was pronounced and the last farewell was over.

The main body of the Pilgrims will, God willing, have landed safely in New York city ere these lines meet the eyes of The Union Signal readers, and the notable W. C. T. U. pilgrimage of 1895, will have come to a happy close.

THE MOTHER CHAUTAUQUA.

Dear Union Signal:—The annual Chautauqua meetings opened this year with more than the usual number of people upon the grounds. Doubtless many of these were led to come early that they might enjoy the course of lectures delivered by Professor Moulton, of Chicago University. One of his best lectures was upon "The Literary Study of the Bible." Of this lecture Bishop Vincent said: "I can say without hesitation that it is the finest thing I ever heard."

The W. C. T. U. have very pleasant headquarters, centrally located, and a noon-day prayer-meeting is held regularly. One discussion has been upon the need of a school where workers may receive scientific temperance instruction and prepare themselves to visit schools and county institutes, where they can aid teachers.

A movement is now being projected to promote the special study of the life, deeds, words and character of Christ; the views which have been held concerning Him through all the Christian centuries; His influence on civilization and His relation to the present life and the future achievements of the Christian church. It is designed to adapt these studies to all grades, from the little child to the mature philosopher.

For the promotion of this important study it is intended to build during the coming year, "The Hall of the Christ," to occupy one of the most central, eligible and beautiful sites on the Chautauqua grounds. The building will be constructed of granite or of marble. It is intended to provide a room in which shall be placed a library made up chiefly of the lives of Jesus which have been written through the ages; another room will be devoted to the best engravings of the great pictures representing Christ, the contribution of art to the interpretation of His character and influence. It is also the purpose to make the building a memorial hall, its windows of stained glass representing various scenes in the life of Christ.

The Hall of the Christ will continually represent the central idea of the Chautauqua movement, the exaltation of Him who was in His earthly life the friend of the friendless, and whose gospel and spirit are this day the most effective promoters of the social science and the building up of the civilization founded upon the "Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of man."

A COUNTRY SERMON.

BY ELIZABETH GRINNELL.

It was midsummer. Owing to "an accident" as men would say, but to a "Providence" as heaven might call it, we found ourselves one Sabbath morning in a tiny prairie village. Along invisible roadways across the fields came folk to church, the women with sunbonnets on and the men in their shirt sleeves. From Sunday habit we joined the rest and sat down in the little place of worship no larger and no better than a wood shed. Some one kindly handed us a turkey wing fan and the heat of the day was forgotten.

The minister, also in his shirt sleeves, arose. His hands were brown and hard as if he had worked in the fields all the week, and his sandy hair was sun-bleached. We read in his deep blue eye the testimony of a true heart and we heard in the tone of his voice the promise of helpful words.

"My hearers," he said, "my text is 'The Lord's Prayer.' Turn to Matthew six, and read it with me. No, pray it with me. 'The secret of the Lord is with men,' the Scripture saith. With common men, not always with the preacher."

Then he began the sermon, closing his eyes at each petition as if praying, and then making his comments.

"We will have a short service to-day, it is so warm,—the sermon and the prayer in one. 'Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name.' Some say God is everywhere. Was He in your heart, brother, when you sold that scant bushel of potatoes to the new settler for good measure? Sister, was He in your heart when you sent home a trifle less than you had borrowed of a pan of flour by which you were the gainer of a biscuit's worth?

"'Hallowed be thy name.' Is His name hallowed when it is used in a joke even though the joke was clipped from a newspaper? Did you read the joke to the children and laugh? Is His name hallowed when you scream 'Lord o' mercy' at sight of a beetle or a mouse in a rain-barrel?

"'Thy kingdom come.' No need of going to Jerusalem or Chicago or New York to find the glory of a kingdom. 'Thy kingdom come,' the prayer says. Right here, on this desolate prairie. Did you see it coming, Brother Meeks, stealing right along, when Brother Beal came over Friday and asked you to forgive him for letting his cows browse in your corn on purpose, and then denying it? And when your hired man was troubled and gave you back a dollar of his wages because he shirked one day unbeknown to you, did you see the kingdom coming?

"Didn't you see the kingdom coming, Sister Drew, when neighbor Brown's big boy came over and scrubbed the floor that week you were sick, the same as if it was his mother's? There he was, right down on his knees, with his great hands at work, his hands that are so awkward you have made fun of them yourself before now. And he stopped and showed your Johnnie how to make a little dugout just to keep him from troubling you. It is a glorious kingdom as a whole, my friends. It is built of little bits of gold taken out of the mines of everyday life. It mostly comes in dust, not in great sheets ready to be laid on. And there are precious stones of neighborly kindness cut and hewed into shape right where they are, the same as in the building of Solomon's Temple. After a while all these small things will be gathered together and you will see how they are to beautify the kingdom.

"'Thy will be done in earth as it is done in heaven.' Some people think they must keep shouting as if they are doing His will. Mostly the prairie flowers grow softly, and the corn tassles out without mentioning it to the pumpkins, and the potatoes grow sweet and hearty in the dark right under the feet of the farmer. Doing His will in earth as it is done in heaven means doing it right where you are.

"'Give us this day our daily bread.' Our own bread, not our neighbor's bread. Brothers, if you don't pay your debts you are eating your neighbor's bread. 'Our daily bread.' Don't eat to-morrow's bread and be extravagant just because you happen to have it by you. Lay by a loaf for some other day's bread. Do not pray for marble cake and lemon pie just because Squire Dole has such things in his pantry. And do not pray for too much glory when you have the peace of doing right, just because some other man happens to have a little glory. Peace is the main standby for the soul, as bread is for the body. Peace and bread are what we want.

"'Give us our daily bread.' Sisters, good bread. Don't slight in the baking. Never put a sour loaf on the table nor serve sour words between meals. Do not be ashamed to pray that your bread may be good and sweet when you cover up the sponge and set it behind the stove to rise. Smile, when you give Sammy a 'piece' between times; it makes the bread better than if you said crossly, 'Boys are such a bother.' It is almost as good as if you could afford to put butter on it. Our Father takes notice of the bread.

"'And forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors.' Sister Green, did you forgive Sister Brown when she broke your flat-iron handle she borrowed, and she said she was 'real sorry'? Tommy, did you forgive Susan when she broke your pencil and gave you back the stub? Do you all forgive as you would have God forgive you in a hearty and neighborly fashion? You know God is our nearest neighbor away out here on the prairie, where we get lonesome sometimes but for Him.

"'And lead us not into temptation but deliver us from evil.' Sister Moon, did you pray that, when you asked Ezra to bring back a pint of brandy with the other things for the mince pies last Christmas, just because it was in the recipe on purpose to tempt you? And you asked Ezra to get it, just to tempt him and the boys. You knew very well that the pie would be good enough without brandy, just as you knew that something else would keep out the moths as well as tobacco this summer. And yet you asked Ezra to bring home a plug of it, and he had not touched tobacco for years till he nibbled at the corners of that plug all the way home. Didn't you know, Brother Ezra, that Molly was almost crazy with sick headache yesterday, when you came in and dinner wasn't ready? She had mentioned it in the morning, and you never so much as sent in a hired man, if you couldn't come yourself, to help her with the dinner and the washing. You tempted her to say she wished she had never married you, and she was 'tired of living out west,' and other things she was ashamed of, and didn't mean. You led her into temptation. And you will wonder by and by why you were not delivered from evil when your wife lies helpless, leaving you and the children to do the best you can. Neighbor Short, did you pay the doctor that time he stayed all night, and helped you through that dreadful suffering when your wife lay at death's door. Or did you let him go all this time unpaid, and he thinking to himself he will never come over to this settlement again, being tempted by you to let human suffering alone. We are all one in this matter. We bring the temptation and the evil upon one another, and then wonder our Father did not deliver us. The cyclone came last year and carried off little children in its great arms, and some of us were crippled for life, and we wondered why we were not delivered from evil. We had hard thoughts of our Father. If He made a path through the Red Sea to deliver His children from evil why did He not make a path through the cyclone? He has shown us what is better: how to deliver ourselves. Some of us made a cyclone cellar close to the house, and we were delivered from evil."

—And the sermon was done. We laid our turkey wing fans down on the bench and joined in the words, "For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory, Amen."

PREPARE YE THE WAY OF THE LORD.

BY LILLIAN F. PEASE.

After His resurrection Christ gave this command to His disciples, "Go ye unto all the world and preach the gospel to every creature," and Mark records that "they went forth and preached everywhere, the Lord working with them."

To every true follower of Christ this command must come, "Go forth in my vineyard, proclaim the glad tidings." To some it comes as an especial message, and these make special preparation, devoting all their time, talents and energies to the work of preaching the gospel.

Very many Christians appear to think, or at least to act, as if the preaching of the word of God and teaching the way of life belonged only to those who had answered the call and had given the time necessary to the preparation of an especial line of work. We are accustomed to think of our ministers and our home and foreign missionaries as set apart, especially called of God to do His work.

This question should come forcibly to every Christian mind and heart, How am I preparing the hearts of those with whom I come in contact to receive the glad tidings which I am bidden to preach? Am I, by my kindliness, thoughtfulness and Christlike living making straight the path for the Lord's entering into the heart of my child, or the girl who is doing my housework, the clerk of whom I buy my groceries, my dressmaker or my milliner, or any one on whom I am in any way dependent for the necessities and comforts of life?

For fifteen years I have been almost constantly teaching in Sunday-school, and my classes have been made up almost wholly of young men and women who are earning their living in what we are pleased to call humble occupations, doing housework, clerking in groceries or dry-goods stores, dressmaking, etc., and I have learned a good deal about the inconsistent thoughtlessness of really good Christian people. One thing which I have had especially brought to my notice is the hard work which we bring upon the clerks in our groceries on Saturdays, particularly on Saturday night. We see the clerks and delivery men employed by our grocers working on Saturdays from six in the morning until ten, eleven or twelve o'clock at night, and then we wonder why they cannot be induced to attend church on Sunday morning. We are apt to think that what little we get at the grocery will make no difference in their Saturday's work, and often leave our entire week's supplies to be ordered on Saturday morning, and of course, each one wants her order delivered immediately, so that her Saturday's work can be finished early in the day. There are articles, especially in warm weather, which must be procured on Saturday in order to have them fresh for Sunday, but if our Christian women would by "taking thought for the morrow," have all, or as many as possible of her week's supplies delivered earlier in the week her skirts would be clear, when, if she ventured to ask some young man to come and hear the word of life preached on Sunday morning she received for an answer this excuse, "I am too tired; our Saturdays are so hard I cannot get up in time for church on Sunday morning," or "Sunday is the only time I have to write my letters," or any similar reason for their non-attendance at the house of God. We have all had such replies to our invitations, so I have come to feel it almost a sin to ask that anything shall be delivered at my house after six o'clock on Saturday night.

We do not know how we are watched, especially by children. As an illustration of this, will you kindly excuse a personal allusion? It happened one Sunday morning, as I was about to prepare breakfast, I discovered that there was no coffee. I said to my husband, "I ordered and paid for the coffee on Friday and it has not been delivered. Will you step over to the grocery and get it?" He went for it and found that it had been delivered at the house which we had just moved from. I had neglected to give the new address. Nothing more was thought of the matter until fully two months later. Our little boy, barely five years old who had been taught that it was wrong to go to any store to buy anything on Sunday, had a penny given to him one Sunday afternoon, and immediately without my knowledge went to the nearest drugstore and spent it for candy. When I talked to him about it, and said "You know that mamma never goes to a store to buy anything on Sunday," he promptly replied, "But you sent papa for the coffee," and I found it difficult to explain the matter to the child's satisfaction or to my own when I came to give it more thought. He has referred to it several times since, showing he has not forgotten. I have wished many times since that we had breakfasted without our coffee that one morning.

Another phase of real Christian work, and one in which most housekeepers even of slender means and limited time could engage in, is the looking after the great number of young people and older ones as well, who flock every year to our city from the country and small towns about us. Very many of them are church members in good standing where they came from. They come into the great busy city entire strangers, many of them are wholly unused to city ways, and usually their first acquaintances are made in a large cheap boarding-house. They resolve that they will be faithful to their church vows and at first start bravely forth to find a church home, but as they sit in that big auditorium among so many strangers, a feeling of utter loneliness, followed by a great longing for the dear home church comes over them, and they go out feeling forlorn and homesick. As they go back to their boarding-house they are met by their new friends who are refreshed by sleeping the morning away, and they invite them to go to the park or some other place of amusement or sight-seeing, and from this they come home in the evening cheered and brightened, and resolve that next Sunday they will try another church. By and by they lose all their interest in the church and soon get to feel that God's holy day was made for a day of rest and recreation and that the ideas which they had of keeping the Sabbath were old-fashioned and countrified.

The pastors often urge the people to shake hands with the strangers and invite them to Sunday-school and prayer-meeting. I think that more than this is needed. No better missionary work can be done by any of us than by inviting these strangers into our homes occasionally after church on Sunday, not only feeding their hungry bodies with our plain Sunday dinner, but feeding their famishing souls with our kindliness and words of sympathy and good cheer. I am not a believer in Sunday visiting, but I do feel that many souls could be kept from going astray, if not from utterly forgetting God, by being received into our homes for a quiet Sunday afternoon.

KINDNESS.

Don't try to see how little,
But how much, boys, you can do;
Yours may be just the needed hand
To tide some trouble through.
Is it a schoolmate's lesson?
Do not withhold your aid,
But help him lift his burden,
Though obstacles invade.

Be faithful at your studies,
And merry at your play;
Out in the free, glad sunshine
Be happy while you may.
But drop kind words; how little
You know their worth, dear boys;
Sweeter than candy, or ma's kiss--
This sweetener of life's joys.

DOINGS OF THE ZOOLOGICAL TEMPERANCE CONVENTION.

BY EDWARD HITCHCOCK, D.D.

The long armed ape, Mr. Simia Lar, took the floor and called the attention of his audience to a substance in common use among men, asserting that it was something like alcohol and was generally used in connection with that, the one sharpening the appetite for the other. This substance was called Tobacco, a name which a friend of his, a Greek scholar, had derived from Bacchus, the dative case, signifying a certain weed dedicated to Bacchus and which greatly promoted his cause. The exhiliration was not indeed, quite as strong as from alcohol, but continued longer, and then one could use it constantly.

The Ape, after naming the different forms of the weed, remarked that he had tried them all, and with marked benefit. He had brought specimens and had invited a friend of his of the human family, called a Dandy, to the convention, and then and there he introduced him as a sample of the elegance they might attain by the use of alcohol and tobacco.

The Dandy instantly passed around his snuff-box and the long-nosed animals snuffed up not a little of its contents. The sneezing that this occasioned threw them into convulsions at which the lookers-on laughed unmercifully.

The Dandy then purchased some cigars, and passing one to the Ape, invited him to smoke with him.

As they were puffing away, many animals crowded around to witness the singular spectacle. Among these were the Cashmere Goat, the Raccoon, the Fox, the Sheep, the Ostrich, and the Condor. The sparks from the cigars fell among their fur and feathers, when, lo and behold, a fire burst forth, while the burning animals, fleeing in all directions, spread the flames on every side. One of them in his agony spranginto the water, while others, on seeing the effect of the water, followed his example.

The aquatic animals, taking this for an attack, drove them out of the water, and it was a laughable sight to see the singed and dripping creatures resume their seats in the convention. A good number of the tobacco users, however, lay bellowing on the ground in their agony.

When the Lion had restored order he summoned the Dandy and the Ape to the bar of the convention, and called upon a Newfoundland Dog to pronounce judgment. The Dog regarded the Ape as the most guilty, since he had introduced into the convention one of its bitterest enemies, although the resemblance between the Ape and the Dandy might be pleaded in extenuation.

He had been examining the laws of the empire to find a suitable penalty, and had at last fallen upon "The Singeing Law." "By this act any criminal that had, either directly or indirectly singéd another, must himself be singed."

His judgment, therefore, was that the Ape, being suspended by the fore-feet, should be well singed and then drenched with water. Afterwards he and the Dandy should be placed in the middle of the area of the convention, on the top of the rock that stands there, and both of them be required during the remainder of the session, to smoke cigars for the amusement of the members, while the Whale was directing how to drench them thoroughly with water.

So consistent with the feelings of the convention was this opinion that the Dandy and the Ape in vain attempted to obtain a hearing in arrest of judgment. The Dandy was heard in broken sentences to say that among men it would be no disgrace to be obliged to smoke all the time and in all places; that in fact the most accomplished gentlemen were accustomed to do it when they walked the streets and when they sat in the house; before eating to settle their stomachs and after eating to settle their dinner; in time of health to keep sickness away and in time of sickness to prevent contagion. And if other animals would only be persuaded to do the same what an amount of happiness would be the result! Instead of this, however, they were frightened by the first trial of snuffing and chewing because it produced sickness of the stomach, a thing which always took place among men ere they were broken into the use of tobacco.

But this incipient suffering was always made up to them by the subsequent pleasure and by contrast it heightened the pleasure; for the happiness did not end with tobacco, since the use of this only paved the way for the still higher pleasure resulting from the use of alcohol.

These two luxuries were naturally inseparable, and though some men did use the one without the other, they did violence to nature and as long as they usually yielded to her dictates and found themselves amply repaid. Oh! what a boon that convention was thus rudely rejecting and not only so, but were now going to inflict severe suffering upon his cousin, the Ape, for his benevolence. "But let not that noble animal sink under his sufferings! May the consciousness of doing right sustain him as the flames kindle around him; and let him not forget that his name will henceforth be enrolled among the martyrs who have suffered for the noble cause of tobacco, and by the persecutions of the very individuals whom he would have benefitted.

Here the disapprobation was so violent that the Dandy was silenced. The Ape expressed great indignation, warning the animals that they would one day repent their mean treatment of one belonging to a race so much superior to themselves.

This statement roused to desperation the members of the convention and they cried out for the execution of the sentence which had been unanimously pronounced upon the culprits. Accordingly the Giraffe seized the forepaws of the Ape and twisting some willow boughs around them he suspended the criminal upon a tree, and then the Dandy was required to apply a lighted match, when instantly the Ape was enveloped in a flame which would have proved fatal had not the Whale spouted a whole barrel of water upon the victim. He soon so far recovered himself that he and the Dandy were perched upon the rock and compelled to puff away at their "long pipes" the remainder of the session, while they were brayed at and squealed at and otherwise insulted by the members of the convention, especially whenever they emerged from the tremendous shower bath inflicted by the Whale.

Thus ended the effort to introduce tobacco among the lower animals.

As the sessions of the convention were drawing to a close, a committee appointed early in the deliberations came forward, and through their chairman reported several resolutions. Of these the sixth only is here given.

Resolved, That we now pledge ourselves by touching noses, that we will entirely abstain from all beverages but water:—that we nauseate the poisonous weed called tobacco; that we will discountenance their use by other animals, and that we will do all in our power to increase their use among men as the surest means of their ruin, and the only hope of preventing them from gaining the entire control of the whole animal kingdom.

This last resolution was severely agitated. But the Dog's speech was most to the point and ended the doings of the convention. He said that he had been greatly surprised that such objections to taking a pledge against the use of virulent poisons were urged by any animals except man. They were exactly the same sort as he had heard often at Human Temperance conventions, which he had frequently attended. And it did not surprise him to hear a race so wanting in patriotism as man, boldly avow such contemptible motives of conduct. But he greatly feared the effect of such sentiments avowing themselves unless frowned upon by the convention. He therefore moved as an amendment of the last resolve, that from the time the animals who take the pledge begin to touch noses one half hour be allowed to those who do not, to get as much as they can on their way home; but if overtaken they will be left to the mercy of those who come up with them.

This amendment was passed by an overwhelming majority. The animals arranged themselves by hundreds to take the pledge; while the rest showed their muscles to the utmost to get out of the way. It will relieve the sympathies of the reader to know that they succeeded in their efforts. All, both pledged and unpledged, finally reached their homes in safety, and spent many a long night in detailing the story of the "World's Zoological Convention."

THE WORLD FOR CHRIST.

Could the thought, uttered and unexpressed of the recent great Christian Endeavor gathering in Boston a fortnight ago, be compressed into a sentence, that sentence would be none other than these golden words which rang through speeches of welcome and response, through words of counsel and exhortation, through song and testimony and prayer—"the world for Christ."

An army of fifty thousand gathered in the name of Him who at last is to conquer the forces of evil and by the glory of His own righteousness forever put to rout the darkness of sin,—surely this alone must give a final blow to that pessimism which sees no hope for a millennial dawn.

As we contemplated this vast host whose banners are peace, whose message is love, whose future no man can measure, we looked back to the days when in England in 1781 Robert Raikes started the great Sunday-school movement; back to the awakening of Froebel whose appeal, "Come let us live with our children," still echoes in widening areas through the world, back still further to Galilean days when He who was God and had been a child stretched out great arms of love to the lambs of His fold and said: "Suffer the little ones to come unto me and forbid them not for of such is the kingdom of heaven." "Our hope is in the children," cry the reformers. The hope of the world grew bright in that hour when the little ones were welcomed to the Master's arms. They have been trooping to Him ever since and the close of the nineteenth century sees an army of fifty thousand representing two million and a half young people, marching to take the world for Christ—ten thousand of them juniors, and behind them, still in the shelter of mother's arms is the unnumbered host of little brothers and sisters soon to follow in the eager march, and behind them?—may it not be, "the world for Christ!"

A school of patriotism this convention has been called, and rightly,—the kind of patriotism that can sing first, "America," then "God Save the Queen," and then gathering up in sympathetic comprehension all of true fealty, give it voice in hearty strains of "Blest be the tie that binds, our hearts in Christian love."

There was no uncertain sound uttered by pupils or teachers in that great summer school gathered at "the Hub" of patriotism. Sturdily, straightly and steadily fell blow after blow upon the strongholds of those who have struck hands with Satan in an unwritten, but not unrecorded, compact to dethrone righteousness.

In his annual address on "The Responsibilities of Success," Dr. Francis E. Clark said:

"When, two years ago, at Montreal, the suggestion was made to you, Endeavorers, that as individuals you had unfulfilled duties along the lines of Christian citizenship and missionary enlargement, who would have believed that your response would have been so prompt and generous? How you have leaped forward to your duty and your privilege! How the rapid contagion of these ideas has spread from society to society, from local union to local union, from city to country, from state to state and province and nation! Not a death-dealing contagion is this, but a blessed inoculation which, please God, will make forever impossible the small-pox of such municipal misrule and corruption as we have known in the past. May this be a lymph, too, which shall render forever innocuous the wasting consumption of indifference to the spread of the kingdom in all the world!"

Note, too, this terse teaching from Dr. Wm. G. Clarke, who has been termed the "Parkhurst of Chicago," in his ten commandments for Christian citizenship: (1.) Thou shalt be an intelligent citizen. (2.) Thou shalt be a virtuous citizen. (3.) Thou shalt be an active citizen. (4.) Thou shalt employ thy voice and thy pen as well as thy vote. (5.) Thou shalt cast thy ballot at the caucus, the primaries, the convention, if you are sent there, and at the polls. (6.) Thou shalt be the inveterate foe of political corruption. (7.) Thou shalt resist the force of lawlessness. (8.) Thou shalt not be a slave to thy party. (9.) Thou shalt protect our American institutions—the free ballot, free schools, free press and freedom of worship. (10.) Thou shalt battle against the tyranny and infamy of the liquor traffic.

A voice of criticism has piped up through the press to say that there is a "desire, if not a settled purpose, to make the organization a distinct political power." This is a return blow from the direction that has felt the might of the Endeavorer's opposition to anything less than Christian citizenship. The hour is surely coming when there will be a "distinct political power"—distinct from all that pollutes, belittles or tyrannizes over man, political, since it will be that "branch of civics that treats of the administration of public affairs in the interest of the peace, prosperity and safety of the state," and a power, since right must be and is might.

When that blessed time comes every Christian Endeavorer, that is every Christ-following man and woman, will be enlisted in this "distinct political power." But till then, every one of the two million and a half C. E's stands first and always for principle and for party only as the latter is a true expression of the first. What says Dr. Clark, the father and leader of this host? "Not as a political party, but in all political parties stand for righteousness, for honesty, for purity, for good men and good laws. The Endeavor society is a quick and tender conscience in these matters among the young people of a community. It is an indignation meeting, against misrule and corruption which never adjourns. Its true mission is to awaken and to keep awake righteous public sentiment. . . Not as an organized society, but as well organized individuals, simply because we are followers of Christ, the Righteous, let us stand everywhere for right."

There has been much play upon the letters "C. E.," and some of the interpretations have been apt as well as amusing: Crankiness Eliminated, Courtesy Extended, Christian Enquiry, Christian Enthusiasm. When the Honor Roll was presented at the convention, bearing the record of 5,551 societies that have each given ten dollars or more during the past year to missions, some one said the initials could not mean Coppers Exclusively, but Dr. Henry C. McCook crowned all by saying that C. E. should come to mean Cities Emancipated, Country Evangelized and Christ Enthroned. The emancipation of cities, the evangelization of the country, and the enthronement of Christ means hearty help to all true reform, and we believe that is the attitude of all true C. E's.

The name of our own "cause" is engraved on Christian Endeavor hearts as witness the reception given to John G. Woolley. Says the Golden Rule:

"If the delegates in Tent Endeavor on Thursday night entered the canvas doors without any definite convictions about the liquor traffic, they left bearing in their hearts a perfect hatred of that minister plenipotentiary of the evil one. They left likewise with an overpowering realization of the truth that party is not principle, that truth is not entirely included in any platform and that the starry firmament is all too narrow to cover the saloon and the Christian church."

The Christian Endeavor platform of principles embodies this paragraph: "Christian Endeavor stands always and everywhere for Christian citizenship. It is forever opposed to the saloon, the gambling den, the brothel and every like iniquity. It stands for temperance, for law and for order, for Sabbath keeping, for a pure political atmosphere—in a word, for righteousness." Endeavoring along these lines has God's approval and divine approval is forever one with divine help. If one with God is a majority, what about the millions who have stepped over into His army?

It is stated that the only country in the world where the little C. E. pin may not shine and C. E. principles may not be sown is where the Turk stands with drawn sword to keep at bay the advent of good in his land. But who dare say that sword will long be flaunted in the face of such a prayer as that which went forth with a shout from the hearts of fifty thousand young people petitioning the Queen of England and the President of the United States to extend some arm of help to the Christian subjects of Turkey. There is a provision in the natural world whereby seeds are carried on their own wings of down by favoring breezes to find lodgement where else no green thing might flourish. May not some breath of God waft a seed of Christian Endeavor love and righteousness into the barren soil of Turkey, whence shall spring a mighty tree of life whose leaves shall be for the healing of that nation? And may all the seeds that have been sent flying in this great convention and from the humbler but not less faithful home-fields, fall on heaven-watched soil and bring forth fruit a thousand fold until the desert shall blossom as a rose, the barren rocks be tender with verdue and the scorching highways of sin be safe and sheltered and sweet under the shadow of trees from the garden of God.

CHURCH WORK.

It is one of the most encouraging things possible to listen in convention to the story of the different local unions as one after another sums up the work of the year. One cannot fail to be impressed with the proof of the constant, gentle agitation going on here, there, everywhere; or in listening resist the conviction that all that is needed to make it all powerful is for every woman to join in and do her share. If this were done nobody need be "prominent." The few women in every community universally recognized as temperance workers are such because they see so plainly what ought to be accomplished and they try to do what a multitude of idle women ought to take a hand in.

It is a strange and almost unaccountable thing that the white-ribbon order does not spread and increase until every good woman is embraced in its ranks. How can good women withstand its plea and hold aloof from its plans for the safety of woman's own kingdom? Many women do not understand the efficiency of any temperance work which has not an immediate effect upon the liquor traffic.

With an amendment campaign, or any kind of definite aggressive work before us, thousands would throw themselves with intensity of zeal into an effort likely to fail because they have not for years been doing the preparatory work laid out by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, which, for lack of members, can be little more than indicated. They would, as Ruskin says, "think to bring about great results by violent and unprepared effort, whereas it is only in fair and forecast order, as the earth brings forth her bud that righteousness and truth spring forth before the nations." They cannot realize the cumulative effect of educational and preventive work; they have no depth of insight, no faith. Opportunity eludes our grasp and we fail of present success because of the inaction of these infidels and unbelievers.

But there is another reason. It is not in the power of the saloon to check the labors or prevent the growth of the white-ribbon army. It is not the saloon which cripples the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and makes impossible the Loyal Temperance Legion, but the attitude of one class of good women in our churches.

Those who crusade for membership know that the universal reply which easily turns aside the most earnest appeal is this: "I do a good deal of church work; next to my family that is my first duty, and I have no time for anything else." And how deaf to argument is the woman who believes you are trying to entice her from the path of duty! Now what is it she calls church work? Ten to one it isn't spiritual work, not the prayer-meeting nor the Sunday-school class nor personal effort in striving to save souls.

The secretary of a local union wrote to her county president: "I am sorry to inform you that the union no longer exists. The 'aid society' is the only organization our ladies have time to support."

So those unthinking women made their choice, serenely conscious of performing the highest possible service for God and humanity. They met every Thursday afternoon, and set to work in the regulation aid society manner upon the universal aid society resource when opportunity fails of underbidding poor sewing women in the manufacture of children's garments with variegated buttonholes, or doing "picnic work" on some unfortunate man's shirts, viz., the composition of that ugly, uneconomical production, a rag carpet.

They cut and sewed and wound, and found a carpet-weaving woman willing to work up the material at a reduced rate, because it was "for the church." Perhaps the reason it wasn't "beat up" very well was on account of the beating down. Then, of course, they wanted to sell it. But it did not find a ready sale. It appeared that individual conceptions had differed in cutting the rags; some had cut their rags wide and some had cut them narrow, while some had followed a more picturesque method, wide at one end and narrow at the other. So the carpet had thick spots and thin spots, which these unimaginative parties who cared not for variety found objectionable. The carpet is, possibly, still church property. The women who made it had no time for the temperance cause, but they have been doing church work, and expect a blessing.

There are a good many odds and ends of church expenses left to the women which ought to be provided for by a good, liberal subscription list. They will continue to be so left as long as we are willing to devote time and strength to getting up variety shows to make up the deficit. Curiously enough, the deficit is generally proportioned to the success of these efforts. If the efforts should not be made there would, in all probability, be no deficit.

A young preacher once crusaded against these undignified methods of "work." He preached a sermon in which he held up to ridicule and righteous indignation the curious devices employed in church money making and brought all his influence to bear on the abatement of these abuses. He hurt the feelings of some of the church women who had labored untiringly, but he gained his point. When the yearly report was read at their anniversary meeting it was shown that everything was paid up; a larger sum than usual had been raised for missions, everything was in an unusually prosperous condition.

Should women never organize schemes for making money for the church? It may be justifiable in the case of a very poor and struggling church, but shall we not say never, if money making is the whole sum and substance of the affair?

One church of which we know, sold tickets to one hundred women for a course of three lectures on the care of the sick, given by a trained nurse, illustrated with patient and paraphernalia, and made a perfectly legitimate hundred dollars, an example of a most praiseworthy enterprise.

But when it comes to the point that a woman can attend the aid society and cannot work in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, cannot assist in the Loyal Temperance Legion but can bake cakes and serve on the committee for a public entertainment, she "borrows the livery of heaven" to no good purpose when she pleads this so-called "church work." The majority of Christian women have so much of this wicked "church work" on their hands that they cannot lift an eyelid against the arch enemy of souls—the devil incarnate—alcohol.

We would not be understood for a moment to underrate the work of the church for the advancement of Christ's kingdom. It is this we urge: The cause we advocate would have no claim if it did not seek the salvation of men now and hereafter. We would have women cease laying these earthly toys upon His altar when they might unite to rescue the perishing. We would awaken them to a truer conception of what is acceptable work for the Lord.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

One reason why unions do not more often use this unequaled means for agitating and educating the public, and stirring up that public interest and "public sentiment," the want of which we so often deplore, is that they do not know very well just how to do it. For, like every other line of our work, it needs to be done according to a plan, and there is no superintendent of public meetings to send her plans and suggestions to locals, who, being left to their own resources and devices, are often unequal to the emergency, and the "public meeting" becomes conspicuous for its rarity.

There is any amount of latent ability for taking part and doing helpful service on the programs of temperance meetings, and it should be the work of the union to bring forth this talent and set it into helpful action. But it will not be sufficient for the union to ask some minister or temperance-hearted brother to "give a talk," or "a paper," though that might work for two or three times successfully enough. If kept up with no more definite sort of plan, it would soon transpire that the speaker would spend so much time wondering what he should say that had not already been said, that he either would not speak at all when the time came, or the meetings having no special variety provided for as to topic, would seem to be monotonous, all of one idea, and come to be voted uninteresting to anybody but the cranks who run them.

Sometimes the temperance meeting has been pieced out with material that was not strictly temperance, in recitations, talks, or papers, in answer to this demand for "more variety." But it is a sad, unnecessary and usually fatal mistake, for the meetings will soon cease to be a power for good or to retain public respect when the program is made up of comic variety matter instead of the temperance gospel. And there is such a wealth of temperance material accessible to every one that, there is no need to bring in anything from outside.

The opportunity the public meeting presents will be very poorly improved if it is only used to continuously harp on one or two phases of the subject, or to present over and over again one or two well-worn lines of argument. Let some bright member of the union make out a list of "views," topics, lines of argument, or let all the union do this, compiling results. Let the union by all means have a superintendent of public meeting programs, and let her make up long beforehand the programs, having at each meeting some special idea or theme for consideration.

Take the financial phase for one evening. Make out a set of topics under this head, and ask each brother or sister whom you desire to have take part to speak or write upon the special sub-topic you assign them. Furnish each one on the program at the time you make the request, with a copy of the program in full, that they may know who their colleagues are, what parts of the general subject have been given to others, and be the better informed within what limits each is to confine himself. As, for instance, if you wished to have the public consider the power of the saloon for evil, the following program recently given at a public meeting may be a suggestive illustration:

The saloon a foe to the home.
The saloon a foe to the church.
The saloon a foe to the school.
The saloon a foe to business interests.
The saloon a foe to good government.

Take the legal line for one evening, the moral for another, the hereditary and health side of the question for another; give one evening to a review of the struggles for prohibition through state constitutional amendments and state statutory enactments, and show the lessons they teach. Have a review of temperance societies, showing the special value of each to the world. Make license, high and low, the subject for an evening, state control that for another, local option for still another. The list might be extended almost indefinitely. The subject of temperance, far from being "hackneyed," or threadbare, is one of the most vitally interesting and manysided that can be presented to the public, if care and pains are taken to present it well.

Then have fresh, telling temperance recitations as a part of the meeting. Do not trust to luck to get them, or expect them to turn up of themselves when needed. Let the union invest in a copy of the recitations books published by the W. T. P. A., and by the National Temperance Society (58 Reade street, N. Y.) also the Demorest recitation books, and any others it may learn of that are strictly temperance. Scan carefully at the same time everything in current religious and temperance literature, and there will be found an almost inexhaustible supply now on hand, and more constantly making.

If those who are quite unused to public speaking beg on that account to be excused, make the program consist of a greater number of shorter sub-topics, and ask each unpracticed sister or brother to write a seven or eight minute paper on his assigned sub-topic. It will result in a better preparation than a talk would be apt to have.

Use the same sweet persistence in getting helpers for this work that you find successful in getting people to do anything else to which they are not much accustomed. Do not imagine because one refuses that he is opposed, or out of sympathy, or a coward, or that he will never help at all, or any such hasty or uncomplimentary judgment. Accept the excuse offered and give opportunity to take part on the next program. Have the faith that "thinketh no evil" and you will be surprised to see what your encouragement and persuasion will do to win help from those who have never made just this kind of effort before.

As to music, have the best, heartiest and most appropriate you are able to obtain. It is an important part of the meeting, but not the most important. If you can get real musical treats as a part of the program, be thankful, but do not wait for them. Use some of the soul-stirring hymns and gospel songs found in all church collections, the more familiar the better.

Be content to grow an interest and an increasing attendance, for temperance meetings are still a sort of mission work in which great growth is to be expected. So be patient with small beginnings. Especially do not be discouraged if none of the "rulers of the people" patronize the meetings with their support and attendance. Look carefully and you will usually see a row or more of the back seats filled with boys and young men, the sort that have no particular weight or influence in the place.

It is worth while to have the meetings for their sake alone. For "these boys are the voters of to-morrow," and nowhere will they get such instruction as these meetings afford unless you give it to them in this way. And it will decide many of them unconsciously for the right and strengthen them for a manly resistance to the temptations that are spread to ruin them here in this Christian land—spread with as little regard for their well being as though "boys" were the thing that we had absolutely no use or regard for.

Do not make a program too long. Advertise all meetings well. Pray for God's blessing. Believe in the willingness of temperance people to help you carry out well-laid plans. Be steadfast and painstaking, and your work will be prospered and blessed to the final "pulling down of strongholds."

Though scoffers ask you where is your gain,
And mocking say your work is vain;
Such scoffers die and are forgot,
Work done for God, it dieth not.

Press on! press on! nor doubt, nor fear,
From age to age this voice shall cheer,
Whate'er may die and be forgot,
Work done for God, it dieth not.

Why are women seldom titled or in any wise recognized in a public way as to their services? Because they are not yet *en*titled—are not sovereign citizens.

At the times when we cannot see God there is still open to us this sacred possibility, to show God, for it is the love and kindness of human hearts through which the divine reality comes home to men, whether they name it or not. Let this thought, then, stay with us, there may be times when we cannot find help, but there is no time when we cannot give help.

We hear a great deal of religious experience, but I am confident if we would make it more on the line of every-day temptation and success it would be far more valuable. A dear old Quaker who arose in meeting and said, "When I was spoken to yesterday in an irritable, and as I thought, unjust manner, by John Smith, I was favored not to say a word in reply!" She gave a good testimony (i. e., she brought a "good report") and "witnessed a good testimony before many witnesses." Also that other good Quaker, who, when an insulting boy who met her on the street had deposited tobacco juice on the front breadth of her new gown, gently exclaimed, "Heavenly Father must know where I am going to get another!"

The pyramid of humanity is whirling on its apex; let us help good men to set it solidly down on its base.

Rev. Dr. Ecob, of Albany, N. Y., upon being asked his opinion of the propriety of women preaching, replied: "Any human being who knows our Lord Jesus Christ by personal experience and has a clear call from Him to preach the Word, has the world before him or her. Such a person is estopped by any human tribunal at its peril."

"Who shalt dwell in thy tabernacle and who shalt abide in thy holy hill? He that walketh uprightly and worketh righteousness and speaketh the truth in his heart"—not with his lips alone.

Someone has said that he never in his life heard reformers and philanthropists prayed for from the pulpit. Doubtless this is not literally, but undoubtedly it is generally, true. The pulpit does not as a rule deal with unpopular movements. The present system of paid pews and fixed salaries cannot but act as a brake on the pastor's train of thought. We must not expect too much, but take what we get thankfully, and wait for better times.

An article in an exchange headed "Wine Tempered by Electricity" attracted my attention recently, and I read it carefully, though with a line of thought very different from that which was doubtless intended. "Italian wine merchants have reason to congratulate themselves on the introduction of the electrical process for the aging of wines." That is enough. Man's impatience to drink has led him to chain the lightning of heaven even for this demoniacal purpose—"aging" the wine, i. e., hastening forward the ferment that is poison—death. Was there not destruction enough in what the Indians have wisely named "fire-water" without hastening and intensifying the process? Further down in the column are these words, with another unintended double signification: "The suggestion has been made that it (electricity) might be employed with advantage in the correction of faults arising from the richness of the soil on which the grape has been grown." So they set God at naught—He who made the perfect little grape-cups and prepared the "richness of the soil" that they might be filled with wine which maketh glad the heart of man, as do all good and perfect gifts of heaven! But the richness of the soil must be offset by premature "aging," deliberate decay, instilled death!

On Duty.

NORTH CAROLINA.

STATE CONVENTION.

The thirteenth annual convention of the W. C. T. U. was held in the beautiful auditorium of the Y. M. C. A. in Charlotte, the last week of June. Although the delegation was not as large as we desired, owing to the distance of Charlotte from many of our active unions, yet the meeting was one of enthusiasm and a soul feast to all who had the pleasure of participating in it.

Our state president, Mrs. Cartland, though bowed by bereavement in the death of her dear father only a few days previous, was enabled by the sustaining grace of the Master, to "cast her burden on the Lord," take up the duties of the hour, and lead the convention in a session at once harmonious, cheerful, interesting and profitable. Her annual address, full of bright thoughts and broad views, and suggestive of advanced positions in many departments for the coming year, was an inspiration to her loyal audience, and received with a unanimous rising vote.

Many of the city pastors gave us encouragement by their presence and kind words. The evening meetings were made especially cheery by the inspiring music of a good choir whose selections were taken from "White Ribbon Hymnal." Cordial welcomes greeted us not only in the hospitable homes of the beautiful queen city of the south, but the clergy, the union and the city through the mayor, gave us welcome in hearty addresses.

Dr. Creasy spoke in happy style for the clergy, and Mrs. Littlejohn for the union. Rev. Dr. Pritchard, of the Baptist church, made a most pathetic and touching address, replete with incident and illustration, which was listened to by a large and appreciative audience. That intoxicating liquors are the curse of society and the church, was fully proved by his experience in dealing with people during a pastorate of forty years, and by the sad fact that one-half of his comrades of early years now fill drunkard's graves.

Rev. Mr. Tolston, another Baptist brother, gave the young women some wholesome advice in a speech, entitled, "Young Ladies—Don't." Among the many negatives which he presented and which were all to the point we notice specially the following: Don't be butterflies, whose wings cannot lift you above the clouds, but be the opposite—eagles in courage and strength, whose pinions bear you upward to God and heaven. Don't laugh at wine-created jokes. Frown on the man who comes to you with wine on his breath, and forsake his company, however intellectual or prosperous he may seem. Don't marry a man expecting to reform him. Don't be mannish and extreme, but be a girl who can and will march side by side with father and brother in the great battle against the saloon and the whisky traffic.

On Y evening Miss Eunice Darden, a bright young graduate of Guilford College, presided with ease and grace, while the excellent reports and papers of what young women can do and have done were presented. The report of increased and eminently successful work during the past year was such as might be expected from such a band of earnest, consecrated young workers. A paper, "What it means to be a Y," strongly delineated the power of young women to crush out the liquor traffic, proving conclusively that when young womanhood demands that man be as pure as he expects her to be, saloons will be closed and distillery fixtures rust out without legislative enactment or local option elections.

Miss Tomlinson gave a beautiful recitation, and at its close a bright little girl of eleven years, Eva Eddins, stepped to the front with a dainty basket decorated in white ribbon, and in a speech of much earnestness and life called for a collection, to which the good people responded generously.

Department reports were in the main encouraging. Progress has been made wherever much effort has been put forth. Unions are concentrating their energies to the development of special lines of work as necessities arise in their respective localities. One comes forward with the literature department to the front in the circulation of ninety-six thousand pages; another, unfermented wine; another, scientific temperance; others, rescue work for girls, and so on through the several departments, so that each superintendent has a banner union as well as encouraging words all along the line.

Organization being the keynote of the W. C. T. U. this year, North Carolina is bravely bestirring herself for the five hundred increase of membership before the National Convention. Half of the number has been secured by the earnest efforts of our state president, who spent nearly two months in the field, and our state organizer, whose time has been so much in demand in other states that she has given us only a few weeks. She goes out to the villages of our beautiful mountain districts next week. In these "fastnesses" arises the smoke of the government and the illicit distillery, so that planting the white-ribbon banner in this section means much hard work and sacrifice. Our organizer, however, has the faculty of being "all things to all men"—Pauline adaptation—whereby she may "by all means save some." We reasonably expect great results from her skill in presenting the truth in love to these people.

The two reports of special interest to unions and the general public were those of the corresponding secretary and treasurer. Both showed an increase in membership, interest, work and funds. The devotion of our women to the cause of right partakes of the fervor of the Crusade fire, and these reports of love, sacrifice and labor were fuel to the flame.

A city paper reporting our meeting says: "A glance at the faces in Association Hall yesterday convinced one of the fact that these women mean something—they 'mean business.' The fruits of their labors may not be seen at once, but faith such as theirs is sure some day to remove the mountain of difficulty."

Trusting alone in the good Master we here raise our Ebenezer and go forward.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

CONVENTION TIMES.

Through fields standing dressed in living green, past broad acres of waving grain and under propitious skies, have white-ribboners gathered to conventions in this glad spring and summer tide. With hearts filled with gratitude to the Giver of all good, have voices been raised in consecrated service for "God, Home and Native Land." Convention has succeeded convention, each one creating a deepened interest in our work and bringing a spiritual uplift to the participants.

That of the fifth district was held on May 21, at Madison, with Mrs. Lulu Ramsey, the able president in the chair. Thirty-one delegates and five officers made a goodly showing for a scattered South Dakota district. The opening evening exercises were held in the opera house where a large audience listened to an instructive and entertaining program, interspersed with devotional exercises, music and addresses. Dr. A. F. Wolff delivered his popular lecture, "Our partnership with the saloon," which created a deep impression. An afternoon session was profitably devoted to the consideration of Y work and mothers' meetings. A model Y meeting was conducted by Miss Lora Headlee and Mrs. Blackman lead a popular mothers' meeting. On the second evening a gold medal contest under the direction of Professor McClenon, principal of Madison schools, was presented to a packed audience. The medal was awarded by Mrs. Ramsey to Miss Zella Webster. Professor McClenon has conducted seven medal contests during the past winter, thus contributing inestimable assistance to the temperance cause.

On May 22d the tenth annual convention of the first district convened at Hudson, with Mrs. Emma Myers, president, in the chair. Reports from county presidents were very encouraging, showing active unions all along the line.

Addresses of welcome from Mrs. Millet, local president, from "Doc" Kittredge, a bright little representative of the L. T. L., Rev. Corwin, on behalf of the churches, and Professor Dickinson, representing the schools, were responded to by Mrs. L. W. Bell, of Centerville. On Thursday morning Rev. Mr. Carhart outlined the purposes of the Prohibition Union, a state organization laboring for the retention of our prohibitory law and the securing of its enforcement. Mr. Carhart is fearless, earnest and consecrated. The objects which he represents deserves the hearty support of our organization throughout the state.

The L. T. L. work of Miss Kara Smart, the gifted daughter of a gifted mother, received special recognition. Miss Smart, in the face of many obstacles, has built up in Sioux Falls a flourishing Legion of one hundred and sixty members. A paper on narcotics, by Mrs. Bailey, gave startling statistics on the phenomenal growth of the cigarette trade. The formation of anti-tobacco leagues among school children was urged and several reported. The school board of Canton enforce the state tobacco law and expel pupils using cigarettes on the school grounds.

The closing evening session was instructive and entertaining. Mrs. Hagar spoke on "Mothers in Reform Movements." Her talk was an earnest appeal for the emancipation of motherhood. President Mrs. Myers' able address was the especial feature of the evening. Former officers were reëlected, and stirring resolutions for the retention of prohibition and the gaining of the ballot for women were adopted. More vigorous work for the ensuing year was promised.

On June 18 the hospitable Presbyterian church of Britton opened its doors to receive the fourth district convention.

District president, Mrs. Kate Haines, presided. The attendance was not large but earnest and enthusiastic. Mrs. Emma Myers, state corresponding secretary, gave an address on the second evening which was a thorough exposition of the purpose of our organization. Parliamentary drills were conducted by Mrs. Myers throughout the session. A Scandinavian temperance society of goodly numbers, having expressed a desire to become auxillary to our organization, were publically received. The right hand of fellowship was extended to their president by our county president. An afternoon session was devoted to mothers' meetings, "Mothers' Difficulties" being the subject under consideration. Many helpful suggestions and methods were presented. A very interesting original paper on humane and mercy work was read by Mrs. Norris, of Webster. It was resolved that renewed effort for equal suffrage be put forth during the coming year, and that every union appoint a superintendent for a band of mercy. Mrs. Ella Rockwell, of Marshall county, was elected district president, and Mrs. Jessie Wilson, of Day county, reëlected corresponding secretary.

County conventions are reported as follows: Codington county, May 24, the president, Mrs. Kate Folger, in the chair. Valuable and helpful papers and discussions on Sabbath observance, organization, non-partisanism and narcotics were discussed. Earnestness and renewed vigor were created for future work. Hughes and Stanley counties held a convention on May 21, at East Pierre, Mrs. M. J. Stevens, president, in the chair. An original poem by Mrs. Fentress, "Home Protection," was very bright and pointed. Papers and discussions upon equal suffrage, heredity, Y work, scientific temperance instruction and social purity, were progressive and encouraging. A pleasing feature was the attendance of the school children in a body after school hours. They were entertained by an article entitled, "What I Would do if I Were a Boy," by Mrs. Esterbrook, after which the children sang "America."

The need of our state for a home for unfortunate women and children was discussed, and a committee appointed to investigate and report as to the possibilities of such a refuge being established.

Resolutions were adopted deploring the re-submission of prohibition, determining to do all possible to prevent such repeal carrying at the polls, and declaring for the ballot for woman as the only effective solution of the liquor problem.

The enforced absence of our beloved state president, Mrs. Cranmer, from all these conventions is greatly deplored, but our hearts are cheered by the encouraging reports from Battle Creek Sanitarium of her improved health. She hopes to be at work again by September 1.

Rapid City union reports most excellent work of a very diversified character. Last November they instituted social "coffees," held at the residence of different members. Business is dispatched, after which follows a brief program. One member recently reviewed "Microbes and Men," in a series of papers. The laws of South Dakota affecting women, as compiled by Mrs. Irene Adams, have been taken up and read. Light refreshments are served, and a receptacle for a voluntary dime offering is provided. A pleasant social afternoon is thus furnished, and new members are generally gained.

Ten dollars was furnished by this union for the state legislative work, and five sent recently to the state treasury. Ten dollars has been sent to the Temple, and ten to the Temperance Hospital. Particular interest is felt by Rapid City union in the hospital for the reason that the daughter of one of its most active members, Miss Carrie Clift, has been in attendance at the training school for nurses at the hospital, and graduated there in April last with great credit. The union keeps a column in the local newspapers, and has held two very successful Demorest contests, Miss Anna Carr and Miss Maysie Barker being the two successful contestants.

The superintendent of scientific temperance instruction has procured copies of our state law on the question, to be placed in every schoolhouse in the county. Public meetings are held quarterly, at which literature is distributed. Altogether, this union appears to be one of the best all-around wide-awake unions in the state.

TENNESSEE.

AN EDUCATIONAL VICTORY.

Since my last report I have had a letter from Mrs. Settle, our superintendent of legislative work, who has fought so valiantly for years for our scientific temperance instruction law, giving details of her work which secured the final passage of that bill. Petitions were sent in by the W. C. T. U. and by Prohibitionists from all over the state. Mrs. Mizell, than whom no state has a more faithful worker, was Mrs. Settle's faithful co-worker all the way through. Side by side and day after day they tramped together up Capitol Hill, and besieged the legislature, interviewed members, and fought as only W. C. T. U. women know how to fight. We, from the outside watched the battle with anxiety, for so engrossed were the members with the gubernatorial struggle that we nearly lost hope of getting a W. C. T. U. bill through. Judge then of our delighted astonishment when its final passage was announced. Mr. Mesick, of Coffee, said he wanted it taught wherever a child could be found on the streets, in the fence corners, in the country, in the towns and cities, in the churches, homes and schools, by day and by night, at all hours and all times. Mr. Hicks also made a strong speech for it. But the orator of the occasion was Mr. Heiskill, of Knox, who plead so earnestly for the children of Tennessee, begging that this wall of protection be built around them. Mr. Stratton, of Davidson, who is known as the "Christian statesman," introduced the bill as his own and fought for it valiantly all the way through.

Mrs. Settle desires me to state that some of the petitions sent in had no name of county or town on them or anything by which it could be told from what locality they came. Consequently they could not be used, very much to her regret. In future, in circulating petitions, it would be well to be sure that both county and town from which the names come head the list.

Our bill, making seduction under promise of marriage, felony, was smothered in the committee room. Mr. Fitzgerald, who had the bill in charge, wrote me that he tried repeatedly to have the bill reported but could with no success.

The East Nashville union is working faithfully. It has not missed a meeting in a good many years. Two of the oldest members have recently passed away, each one over eighty years of age. One of them, Sister Moorman, requested that her coffin be decorated only with white ribbon. The W. C. T. U. conducted services at her home and acted as honorary pall-bearers. Then they walked into the church in a body. Both the ministers taking part in the services spoke kindly words for the W. C. T. U. Since these occasions quite a number of women have signified their desire to have services similarly conducted for them when the end comes.

Harriman, among other things, sends a report of their district convention which passed off nicely, much enthusiasm being aroused and some new members secured.

Mrs. Stevenson, National corresponding secretary, was with them, making the two evening addresses and conducting memorial services in memory of Mrs. Woodbridge and Mrs. Lathrap. Mrs. Dimond writes: "We were delighted with Mrs. Stevenson. Her genial, sunny disposition, which sees the hopeful side of everything, endears her to the hearts of those fortunate ones who had the privilege of making her acquaintance. Her words to the students of the university were instructive and helpful. Her lectures to the W. C. T. U. were among the best we have had. She seemed to get down to foundation principles, and with the force of her own convictions carried conviction to the minds of her audience. She organized a colored union which bears her name. This is the second colored union in Harriman.

The Harriman union is still laboring heavily under the temple debt. During commencement week they served refreshments to visitors, netting thereby about twenty dollars to pay the interest. They are now planning another entertainment to the same end. They have decided to start a chain letter, and it is hoped that every one receiving the letters will answer them.

VERMONT.

HARD AT WORK.

All over our state women loyal and true to the temperance work are planning and executing in a manner that will tell in the future. Bands of loyal children are looking forward to picnics and days spent in the woods where they can enjoy themselves as only children can. The work in the state for the past few months is of a highly encouraging character.

The convention of Addison county held at Vergennes, in May, was very successful, as all of the conventions have been under the management of the county president, Mrs. L. D. Dyer. Her annual address was one of her best, and very interesting. The essay on physical culture, by Miss Lucy Hitchcock, was well written, and showed a practical knowledge of her subject throughout. In the evening a full house greeted the speakers. Our state president, Mrs. Ida H. Read, together with Mrs. Dyer, the mayor of the city, and resident clergymen, were seated on the platform. Mrs. Hatch gave the unions, in behalf of the Vergennes union a cordial welcome to their city. Welcomes were extended from the mayor and clergymen, to which Mrs. E. S. Farr responded.

The inmates of the industrial school took an interesting part, and showed good training, while the children of the city spoke and sung in such an admirable way as to receive much praise.

During the morning session of Thursday Rev. C. T. Noble, of Middlebury, spoke to the convention. Essays were read during the meeting by Mrs. D. K. Johnson, Mrs. H. H. Ellis, Mrs. Sessions and others. Mrs. Luna Daniels read an interesting paper on the Orphans' Home, of Burlington, and Mrs. Twitchell presented the needs of the same. It is necessary to erect new buildings, and funds for the same will be thankfully received.

Mrs. Read gave the convention an interesting account of the home for friendless women in Burlington. She told how in answer to prayer they had received supplies and help far beyond their desires. Before the close of the session memorial services were held. Only one member from the county has passed to the wonderful beyond during the past year. Mrs. Marcia E. Sneden fell asleep at her home in Bristol, November 4. She was one of the King's Daughters, and a woman of a lovely character. The knot of white ribbon on her bosom spoke of devotion to our cause.

Mrs. J. E. Weeks with her fine voice added greatly to the convention. The flower mission of Addison county have furnished many loving tributes to the sick and afflicted during the past year, the number being over five hundred. The convention were invited to hold a midwinter meeting in Weybridge, which was gladly accepted. The local union of Vergennes did all in their power to make the convention a success, and the delegates were made welcome in nearly every home in the city.

Gratifying news is heard from several unions. At Fernville some of the women of that place having been at the Spring Grove meeting in the summer, were anxious to form a union. Miss Lucy Hitchcock gathered them together for a conference, the result of which was the organization of a union which met every Friday afternoon at the close of school in the school room. The children were invited to remain, and soon nearly all were wearing the temperance badge. A parlor meeting at which about forty were present was held in October. The temperance program rendered by the children was received enthusiastically.

The proceeds of the evening were devoted to the purchase of fifty volumes, which furnished food for thought in a neighborhood where religious and temperance reading matter was as scarce as at Squeers school in Dotheboys' Hall.

Scientific temperance instruction was made interesting by experiments with the white of an egg and alcohol, and by subjecting alcohol to different tests, showing its effect on the system and the brain. The year's work in Fernville has been productive of much good and now a live union is in the place and they purpose to be found in the forefront of the battle. Lincoln union report encouragingly of their monthly gospel temperance services. They have closed two years of these meetings, and they have been successful, as well as helpful. People not connected with the union have manifested their willingness by assisting when called upon. Temperance sentiment has advanced largely in the town and the women of the union feel that in no other line of work can they see such good results. I would encourage every union that has not taken up this line of work to do so at once. Montpelier union reports good work.

Permanent and good influence grew out of resolutions, and discussions at the state convention held in Burlington in 1889. A resolution was presented and adopted, aiming to a better enforcement of the law against non-attendance of children of school age in our public schools. The two delegates from Montpelier who attended this annual meeting went home with the determination to find out if this law was enforced in their village. The books of the district clerk showed over one hundred children of school age out of school.

Conversation with the committee and the different pastors resulted in a call for a meeting, which was well attended and an organization effected. A canvass of the village was made, and by kind inquiries in families, the cause of non-attendance was ascertained.

The W. C. T. U. offered to furnish rooms for the association, where supplies of all kinds are kept and second hand clothing repaired. Every year from fifty to sixty children receive help. They appeal through the papers for help, which always meets with hearty response. The King's Daughters have responded nobly by work and contributions of money.

Three years ago an industrial school for girls was added, and it has proved very beneficial, as the girls are taught sewing and desirable rules of habit. This small beginning has now become a valuable auxiliary to the public schools. What Montpelier has done other villages can do. In all large towns there is a call for this kind of educational and benevolent effort, and this appeals to the heart of every mother in our land.

During the spring our state president was journeying through our state for thirty-nine days and assisted in forty-seven meetings. Such persistent, faithful work will advance the temperance cause.

OREGON.

HER LITTLE CREEKS.

The county convention of Multumah met with the neighboring county W. C. T. U. at Oregon City. The officers elected were: President, Mrs. Additon; corresponding secretary, Miss Nella McKinley; recording secretary, Mrs. Nora Bingley; treasurer, Mrs. Niles. Two new unions reported at Gresham and University Park. Mrs. Additon had lectured in both these places. Her address to the University students was a marked success. She has likewise added two new unions to Clackamas, and has organized Morrow county, adding to the enrollment during the year one hundred and sixty-four new members, active and honorary.

In the same month Yamhill held her county convention at McMinnville, electing Mrs. M. E. Allen, for president; Mrs. M. Elliott, corresponding secretary; Mrs. M. Flower, recording secretary, and Mrs. C. G. Esson as treasurer. Our state president gave one of her stirring lectures in the evening, and some sterling good advice to the unions in conducting the question-box. Yamhill is a very flourishing county, with one hundred and twenty-one paid up members, and twenty-three honorary. They have spent $258.36 on local work and distributed nearly twenty-six thousand pages of literature.

The last county convention that I have to report is that of Linn, at which I was present myself. In the unavoidable absence of the president, Mrs. L. E. Blaine occupied the chair. The election gave the following officers: Mrs. Edith Thompson, president; Mrs. L. E. Blaine, vice-president; Miss Ida Porter, recording secretary; Mrs. L. A. Nash, corresponding secretary; Mrs. N. E. Gill, treasurer, and a goodly number of superintendents, notwithstanding the doubling up of some of the departments. A fine audience greeted our state president, Mrs. N. W. Kinney, in Albany's largest church, whose old time enthusiasm, with its power of evoking the same, showed itself in no wise abated. She delivered an address before the ladies of Portland in the parlors of Calvary Presbyterian church, which resulted in a new union for Portland, with Mrs. Root, Mrs. Burns and Mrs. Barmore for officers.

During the matron's absence our dear Mrs. Riggs took her place at the Refuge Home, which continues its valuable life-saving work in our metropolis. There were at that time eleven inmates and six infants.

The Heppner union gained a victory at their last election. Some of their law and order men told them to choose their men and they would do all in their power to elect them. The result was that out of four candidates for office, the mayor and two good substantial law and order councilmen were elected. The last effort of this union was to try the law on the Sunday saloon question with the result that may be easily guessed. They had a jury trial in one case, were acquitted in the other; the jury hung, but, in spite of the seeming defeat, it proved a good work, for it opened the eyes of many indifferent citizens to the fact that they were firmly in the grip of the liquor traffic and thoroughly aroused the righteous indignation of all good people.

Milton, a little town within sight of the Blue Mountains of Eastern Oregon, seems to be the most thoroughly organized union of that section. Among other things, they have twelve Temple Wheels revolving. They supply their ministers with THE UNION SIGNAL, and keep wall pockets at the hotels. Both Milton and its neighbor, Weston, gathered nearly three hundred and fifty signatures to the cigarette petition that was circulated at the time of the legislature.

Our state evangelist, Mrs. Mead, has given latterly some of her well-appreciated Bible readings in three of our valley towns, Philomoth, Corvallis and Albany.

Albany has just held a Demorest medal contest, the first, as I hope, of a series. The contestants were very young, and although no grand elocutionary flights could have been expected, the Opera House had a good audience. On the same occasion the L. T. L. had a picturesque march on the stage, with mottoed banners in the hands of the officers and small stars and stripes in all the others, after which they sang, "Onward, we are marching" out of the song book for young crusaders.

As everybody was on the flit to the coast, we have been obliged, unfortunately, to disband them for the remaining summer months. And so it is by littles, and chiefly among the little people, perhaps, that our cause grows and becomes strong, reinforcing unconsciously the fact in its open discouragements, reminding me of A. H. Clough's lovely words:

"For while the tired waves, vainly breaking,
Seem here no painful inch to gain,
Far back, through creeks and inlets making,
Comes silent, flooding in the main."

NEW MEXICO.

SUMMER ACTIVITIES.

Mrs. Bettie Hoag, president of the Malago union, writes encouragingly of the work at that place. The ladies held a public meeting May 5, furnishing a bright program of song, recitation and select readings. Three new members and eight honoraries were added to the ranks. This union is planning to start a Loyal Temperance Legion and is active in Demorest contest work.

Santa Fé held its annual election of officers May 7, with the following result: President, Mrs. Kate McKinzie Irvine; vice-president, Mrs. G. S. Madden; second vice-president, Mrs. S. A. Harvey; corresponding secretary, Mrs. M. J. Warner; recording secretary, Miss Nettie B. Smith; treasurer, Mrs. W. M. Berger. The above is a list of good workers and we expect much from the Santa Fé union "as the days are going by."

Mrs. M. Jenne Warner writes: "Sunday, June 16, was one of the annual breaks in the monotony of prison life for the unhappy folk confined in the penitentiary of New Mexico."

The large-hearted and courteous superintendent, Col. Bergmann, arranged to have the W. C. T. U. conduct a bright service of praise and prayer in the chapel, which the women had adorned with beautiful flowers —these being afterwards distributed among the prisoners by the visitors' children.

The scene was very impressive when about one hundred and fifty men entered quietly and seated themselves in orderly rows on benches. The women prisoners, six in number, occupied a gallery. The exercises were opened by Mrs. Harvey, the vice-president of the W. C. T. U.—she having been intrusted with the management of the proceedings. Rev. G. S. Madden then offered prayer in simple, touching language. This was followed by singing. The choir being men in the United States regulation dress, and very creditably they acquitted themselves. The organist was himself a prisoner. Col. Bergmann finds music especially helpful in the work of reformation After a short Bible reading and exposition by Mrs. Harvey, Rev. W. Williams delivered a pithy exhortation in Spanish, the majority of the convicts being of Mexican extraction. The prisoners sang another song after which Miss Gulliford sang a beautiful solo, then came the distribution of flowers. Rev. Wm. Madden spoke a few earnest words and the service closed.

Occasions like these prove very helpful to those for whom they are planned, and June never passes without this special service being held at the penitentiary.

Aside from the management of the W. C. T. U. library the Las Vegas union has taken up the department of flower mission and clean linen, attends to the distribution of good literature and in September will begin juvenile work.

News in a Nutshell.

THE twelfth district W. C. T. U. of Minnesota met in convention June 11 and 12, the state president, Mrs. Sue M. D. Fry, in the chair. Mrs. Fry delivered an evening address on "Selfhood and Statehood," that will be long and helpfully remembered by all who heard it.

MRS. S. L. OBERHOLTZER, World's superintendent of savings banks, has been engaged by the Pennsylvania State Granger's Association to speak an hour on their "biggest day," August 29 at Williams' Grove, on school savings banks. She will tell them in the evening of "Butter Making in Sweden and Denmark."

THE W. C. T. U. of Jasper county, Illinois, celebrated the Fourth of July at Rose Hill, Ill. It was a decided success in every respect. Miss M. C. Brehm, president of the sixteenth district, delivered one of the addresses. A Demorest silver medal contest was also a feature of the day. Mrs. Emma Brehmer, county president, presided.

MRS. LUCIA H. ADDITON, of Lents, Oregon, has been appointed one of the National lecturers for the department of the relation of temperance to labor and capital. Although for some time Mrs. Additon has made social industrial topics her special theme, there is scarcely a line of work with which she is not familiar.

NEBRASKA has green temperance oases! The sixth district W. C. T. U. held its annual gathering at York in July. A large attendance, excellent reports of work, vigorous plans for further campaigning and the helpful presence of Mrs. S. A. Benjamin made the occasion a memorable one. Mrs. Benjamin's two-hour address on "Then and Now" was received with glowing enthusiasm.

MR. JOHN KEENEN, stepfather of our beloved Ohio state recording secretary, Miss Anna M. Pollock, has fallen asleep in Jesus. Mr. Keenen was one of the most highly respected citizens of Newark, an exemplary Christian man. He had long looked forward with joyful anticipation to his entrance into the celestial home, and he was ready to respond to his Master's call.

GLASGOW union, Kentucky, observed flower mission day by special services. A prayer-meeting was held in the Methodist church after which several of the ladies, accompanied by the pastor of the church, went to the jail and held an interesting service with the twenty-nine inmates, giving each a little bunch of flowers. They also went to visit the sick and afflicted in the town, distributing in all fifty bouquets.

SCIENTIFIC temperance instruction in the public schools has right of way in Wilmington, Del. Prizes in money were offered for the best essays on temperance—or intemperance—a grand rally of the school children arranged, with an interesting, spirited program, the prizes being awarded. The prize essays—thirty in number—were printed in a pretty souvenir book, which, scattered through the town of Wilmington, will preach many a temperance sermon where another voice would not be tolerated. Mrs. J. R. Milligan, superintendent of this department in the Wilmington W. C. T. U., is to be congratulated upon the success of her work.

MRS. J. K. NICHOLS, of Indianapolis, World's superintendent of the fair department, is doing splendid work in her own state. She addressed the May festival of the M. E. church, at Brook, Newton county, May 29. Marion county has an annual gathering of old settlers; judging by the past, it is reasonable to expect an audience of fifteen thousand; Mrs. Nichols addresses this meeting August 8; the state Horticultural and Agricultural Society, the afternoon of August 10, at the state fair grounds; the Acton M. E. Chautauqua the evening of August 10, and Zionsville camp-meeting August 6, while every day to September 1 is taken in the interest of the Hadley school.

SCHOOLS OF METHODS AND PARLIAMENTARY USAGE.

Will all superintendents read with careful attention the following requests. Please send me not later than September 15, full report of all work done since last National Convention. Do not say "several" or "quite a few" or a "good many," but give the exact number of schools or drills. Enclose the program of each school and say whether fully carried out. If not note the omissions or substitutions.

Say whether the drills were confined to the school of methods or were a part of the assembly work. Give the exact number of white-ribboners enrolled; give the average attendance both of the membership and of "outsiders." Give items of special interest; in short, make your report full, clear, concise, accurate.

Yours for correct reports,
Portland, Mich. A. S. BENJAMIN.

SUGGESTIONS FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF WORK AMONG FOREIGNERS.

DEAR CO-LABORERS:—We often have to go back to first principles in the work of our departments to give instructions, because new workers come in who have not been accustomed to the methods already many times considered; so, although it may seem to be "line upon line" to some, it is always needed by others. In going into work among our foreign speaking people we must remember that this is in a sense the missionary department. We are carrying to the people that sit in darkness the gospel of right living and the benefits of total abstinence, to them a new revelation. We must carry this message to them as our Leader carried the gospel of life—in a personal way. "And He laid His hands upon them and healed them." Personal interest, personal sympathy, kindness, love, and often the personal contact of a neighborly visit, are the solution of the problem of gaining our aliens to favorable convictions concerning the temperance work, so that "house to house" visitation is the strong "hold" of the foreign work. A superintendent, no matter how active or capable she is, cannot do this work alone. Therefore I always advise that a committee of two ladies be appointed each month in the local unions to help in this visiting, letting two go at a time, one or two afternoons in the week. We can well afford this effort and time for the Master's service. If these people were across the seas we would be proud to do some missionary work among them. Let us be glad to avail ourselves of the chance to gain them at our doors, and receive the reward that will come when the "life-test" is made. "I was a stranger and ye regarded me."

Go to these people cheerfully, pleasantly, friendly; show them that you are interested in them; notice their children, praise their housekeeping, inquire after their health; invite them to church or to your meetings, or their children to the Loyal Temperance Legion; when you go out, slip two or three leaflets in their hands, in their own language, and ask God's blessing on them, and upon those who receive them. And God will honor these efforts, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it. Go again and again. Just a little call, enough to let them know you are remembering them. If you think of organizing unions among the women it will scarcely be worth while to do so until a few of these have become sufficiently well acquainted with our methods by attendance on the meetings of our unions to be able to carry on their own meetings intelligently. An organization that is formed before it can be well carried on is only a source of new discouragement. Bring the women to our unions and put them on the committees for carrying on the work among their own people in various lines.

I am informed by the National corresponding secretary that my report will have to be in her hands by the middle of September. May I then ask my state superintendents to be prompt with theirs? Certainly not later than the first of September. We are limited in our report to two thousand words. I have five National assistants and twenty-six state superintendents. This if equally divided will give us sixty words apiece. Let them be telling ones.

And now sisters may I urge you to distribute the printed page. It is the only way we have of reaching the brains and hearts of these people, and of bringing conviction to them. If you find places where the unions are too poor to purchase leaflets, let me know, and I will give them leaflets free. If you can send postage in such cases please do so, as funds are very scarce, so much so that it will be impossible for me to continue the salary of our missionary much longer unless help comes from some source, my appropriation not being sufficient to carry on the work and do this also. Let us work and trust and be faithful.

SCHOOL SAVINGS BANKS IN NEW JERSEY.

The Schools Savings Banks, which have proved so helpful as an uplifting and individualizing factor in almost four hundred schools of the United States for the last three or four years, have among their latest recruits thirty-nine schools in New Jersey, situated in Camden, Atlantic City, Gloucester, Merchantville, Stockton, Delair and Pensauken. Though the teaching of thrift and economy in these schools began but a few months ago, being in fact instituted in Atlantic City schools as late as May 1, the encouraging results are affecting adjacent districts. Haddonfield and country points are preparing to take up the system in the fall. The Camden children are so interested in the growth of their savings that the bank officers have agreed to accept any pennies they may be able to earn and save during vacation and credit on their school deposits.

The Jersey press speaks highly of this work, and already its reformatory influence is being felt. It is arresting thought of foolish expenditures among the older folk and laying the foundation of self-reliance, understanding generosity and honest habits among the children. It promises to decrease the production of spendthrifts and drunkards by training the mind to the capability and responsibility of possession and self-thought.

In these thirty-nine schools there are 6,745 of the pupils who are depositors and they had on June 1, $8,148.91 to their bank credit. In some countries there is government provision for the savings of the people and also national care of the school saving bank. Here we have no postal savings banks, no systematic thrift training, and we need all the more as a guard against pauperism, extravagance and crime to introduce through private and coöperative philanthropic effort this simple method of inculcating economy.

There are many invitations for it in the western states, and I would call cheerfully to the National for helpers in this great tributary to W. C. T. U. results, the upbuilding of the home and the downfall of the drink habit and other disturbing forces.

Organizers' Corner.

No money in the state treasury; an old debt on hands; only thirty-three local unions, with a paying membership of only three hundred and eighteen; an immense area—long distances, and railroad fare never less than five cents a mile, and sometimes eight; this was the state of affairs that confronted me when I accepted the presidency of East Washington last September. With an earnest prayer to God for help to keep up the W. C. T. U. of Washington I started out to do all I could. Collections failed to pay expenses, so May 30 Mrs. Lucy R. Berry, of Walla Walla, state treasurer, and I started from Walla Walla with a team and buggy to drive throughout the northern part of the state, since which time we have driven over four hundred miles. I have given thirty-eight public addresses, held six day meetings for method work, organized one Y and reorganized three other unions, receiving quite a number of members, both voting and honorary. We have about three weeks' work still ahead of us before we turn our weary way homeward. Crops have been lost, and with demonetized silver, such low prices there is scarcely any money in the country, and our collections often fall below a dollar a night, yet the people are hungry for the truth, and listen gladly, and join us in the prayer that help may come to us that we may be able to combat the awful power of legalized rum that is ruining us so in this western country.

There is no field worker in the state but me, and no money to bring in others, and while the glad echoes from the World's Convention reach us with their cheering notes we clasp the Master's hand a little more closely and pray for strength of body and spirit to stand for God, Home and Native Land till reinforcements come.

ing for this since my return from Chicago, in my own loved state, Indiana. We are confident we will succeed, so my labor has been mostly confined to Indiana. I have delivered fifty addresses since my last report, held gospel services in ten jails, preached twelve sermons, held twelve Bible readings, conducted twenty-five women's meetings, three county conventions, aided in one school of methods, delivered memorial address on Decoration Day, addressed college students, and organized three unions. I greet with pleasure my fellow workers, and read with pleasure of their labors throughout the land; their suggestions are very helpful. I know that God will certainly deliver the enemy (the liquor traffic) into the hands of women, because they are doing with their might what their hands find to do.

Cor. Secy's Notes.

HERE AND THERE.

So constant a flitting has been mine during THE UNION SIGNAL'S brief vacation that I hardly know where to begin, or, what is perhaps more important in editorial eyes, where to leave off. I spent Sunday, July 7, in the beautiful country township of Nauausay, the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Oliver H. Johnson, the latter Kendall county's evangelistic superintendent, and the former its Christian Endeavor secretary. In such a home one could not fail of rest, even though two addresses were given, the first on Sunday evening and the second on Monday, at the charming reception with which I was honored. Nearly one hundred women were gathered in Mrs. Johnson's home, members of the union and other friends, and it was an ideal occasion. The parlors were beautifully decorated with white and green, a great bow of white ribbon being over the bay window where the guests were received. Refreshments were served after the address and six new members were secured. Such occasions only serve to deepen the query which is perpetually rising in my soul—"How can I sufficiently show my gratitude towards, and how can I serve faithfully enough such a constituency?" I am constantly humbled before you, sisters, and yet the very humbling exalts—brings me nearer to God.

Beautiful Bay View must have a report by itself, and yet I cannot refrain from saying, even now as I am speeding from its shores with Mountain Lake Park as my objective point, that I have never spent six days of W. C. T. U. work under such well-nigh perfect conditions. I can think of nothing to really regret as I look back upon them—hardly anything that I could even wish otherwise. I believe few schools of methods have ever had such a corps of workers as were gathered about me. Whatever I might have done or left undone the meeting could not have been a failure so long as they were there. I have no words to express my gratitude.

Will the corresponding secretaries of all states holding spring and summer conventions please send at once a complete list of the officers for the ensuing year? Several have already done this, but I make the request general in order that there may be no failure. The report blanks will very soon be sent out and I am anxious that they should get into the right hands without delay. Please remember that the Convention is OCTOBER 18 TO 23, and that reports must not be delayed. The official call will very shortly appear in THE UNION SIGNAL.

I have an especial pleasure in announcing that Dr. W. Xavier Sudduth, who has an enviable reputation as a scientist, is hereafter to be located in Chicago, and that he will be glad to address unions in Illinois or adjacent states, on the subject of alcoholism and narcotism from a scientific standpoint, for expenses only. Dr. Sudduth has several lectures upon this subject, some of which are illustrated with the stereoptican. I have long felt the need of just such instruction coming from a source which should carry weight, and therefore, I rejoice in making the announcement, "as one that findeth great spoil." I tried to arrange for Dr. Sudduth's lecture on "The Sins of the Parents" during the Bay View Institute, but did not know that he could be secured in time to complete arrangements. "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge," says God's word. Here is a chance to join "Thus saith science" to "thus saith the Lord." The statement is the same in both formulas, but we need to learn that science and God's word are in absolute harmony. I bespeak for Dr. Sudduth a cordial welcome to white ribbon ranks.

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS.

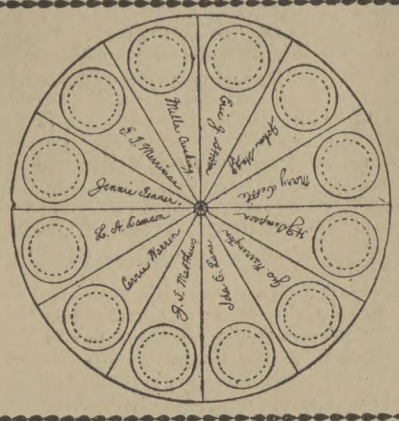
BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

And Jesus answering saith unto them, Have faith in God. For verily I say unto you, that whosoever shall say unto this mountain, Be thou removed and be thou cast into the sea; and shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that those things which he saith shall come to pass, he shall have whatsoever he saith.—Mark 11:22, 23.

We have secured still further subscriptions towards the $300,000 fund. One of Chicago's great manufacturers, Mr. R. T. Crane, has subscribed $10,000; Mrs. W. Jennings Demorest, New York, $500, which is but a small beginning of what she hopes to give; Mrs. L. A. Hagans, Elmhurst, Ill., $1,000. The first person who subscribed for stock in the Temple was the noble husband of Mrs. Hagans, who passed to the Temple not made with hands several years ago. This, with the sums previously reported, makes $71,000. When the receipts of our financial secretary, Miss Johnson, are added to this, it will bring the amount up to about $90,000. I expect soon to leave for a couple of weeks of much-needed rest in order to fit me for the fall campaign, when the balance of the $300,000 must be secured. Until after my return there will probably be no addition to the above subscriptions.

A BEAUTIFUL GIFT FOR EVERY WHEEL FILLED.



$100, $50 and $25 TO THE THREE PERSONS WHO FILL THE MOST WHEELS BY JANUARY.

The count for the three prizes for $100, $50, $25—commenced May 23. The three who filled the most Wheels for the month ending June 23, are Emma Browning, Mooresville, N. Y.; Miss Julia Braton, Snow Hill, Md., and Mrs. Seymour, Aurora, Ill. Strange to say each of the above filled five Wheels for the month ending June 23. What are the boys and girls, now that they are out of school, doing? Let them set to work at once and try for the cash prizes. Any boy or girl could easily get twice five Wheels filled in a month. A little L. T. L. boy, Harry Hardman, ten years old, who lives in Idaho Falls, Idaho, sends a Wheel filled. He writes: "I secured this money in one hour after Mrs. Mitchell gave me the Wheel." Mrs. Z. M. Doolittle, South Bend, Ind., who is three-score years and ten and is an invalid besides, writes: "I only spent four hours in filling two Wheels. I shall try and fill four and so obtain the souvenir spoon." Little Clare Russell, Pleasant Hill, Mo., writes: "My mamma thought I was too little to fill a Wheel. I am seven years old, but I begged until she let me try and I have filled it in an hour and a half. Please send me for premium a knife." Little eight-year-old Ethel Hall, of Danville, Ill., writes: "Now that school is out I am going to try to fill a Wheel every week. The one I enclose was given me Monday and I had it filled by evening." Mrs. Emily B. Gardner, Shunderstown, R. I., writes: "I filled my first Wheel in one forenoon, which encouraged me so much I want to do more."

Are the above not words of encouragement sufficient to inspire the heart of old and young alike to aid in filling as many Wheels as possible as the work is so easy of accomplishment and the end to be attained so great? I feel as though a thick cable were around my neck and I were trying to drag up a steep hill three hundred thousand dollars income to the Temple. I am sure if you all saw me bending under such a load physically as I am mentally, you would rush to my assistance and help pull with a will. Every Wheel that is filled by matron, maid or little child lightens my load just that much. Think how easy it would be if all took hold. Beloved, won't you take a hand at the cable and help?

All orders for Temple Wheels, mite-boxes and Baby Band lists, and everything pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago. Send two-cent stamp for either the Temple Wheel or mite-box. Money orders and checks should be made out in the name of Mr. G. B. Shaw, treasurer, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, Room 1111, The Temple, Chicago.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE HOSPITAL

1619 Diversey Street, Chicago.

The National Temperance Hospital has never had so many white-ribboners on its sick list as for the past few months. Mrs. Maude L. Green, National organizer and lecturer, came to the hospital soon after the Cleveland Convention, and was obliged to cancel her engagements for a time. She bore her afflictions with the utmost patience. One look in her sweet spiritual face convinced you that did the messenger call her hence she was ready to obey the summons. Fortunately for her friends, she is to tarry yet awhile, being much improved. She and her friend and comrade, Miss Ida Clothier, have returned to Manitou, Colo., where they will remain for the summer.

Mrs. Henniretta Skelton, also National organizer, was an inmate of the hospital for a few weeks. She has returned West, after a much needed rest, feeling very grateful for the care she received, which the following characteristic letter testifies:

"DEAR SISTERS:—I leave here to-day, and would like to express my heartfelt thanks for the kindness extended to me through this excellent hospital. I am glad I came here very ill and had to be taken care of, to see for myself the appointments of this home, for a home it is, not a mere hospital. May God bless you and give you the means to enlarge the work. It will be my future aim to tell our women of it and try to interest them in the work. I hope the day is not far distant when you will be able to have a building of your own. The work deserves it.

"Your sister in Christ,
"HENNIRETTA SKELTON."

Mrs. M. C. Board, president of the nineteenth district of Illinois, has been in the hospital since March. Thanks to the good nursing she has received she is greatly improved and hopes soon to go to her home. Her work for the past ten years has been the entire charge of the temperance work in nine counties, and she believes her present trouble is due to overtaxing herself.

The W. C. T. U. of Villa Ridge, a small country village in Illinois, sends to the hospital Mrs. Davidson. Her trouble is chronic cystici. Dr. B., her physician, thinks she has been greatly benefitted by the care and attention the hospital has been able to give her.

Mrs. A. J. McKinney has been in the hospital only a short time. She is the one white-ribboner in her town and holds up the banner of temperance quite valiantly.

Miss Otwell, president of the Y's of Carlinville, Ill., is under the care of Dr. Boynton.

A young man, Arthur Oliphant, of Scotland, was getting ready to leave the city for California, when he fell on the street insensible from heart trouble and was carried to the hospital. He is a very interesting patient and we hope his recovery will be speedy.

Here and There.

The woman who laughs in her sleeves in these days must develop a loud tone, or her efforts will be lost.

"I do not hesitate, Mr. Staylate," she remarked gently, "to say you are a young man of excellent habits, but I am very much afraid that you would spend too much of your time away from home."

"Why do you think so?"

"Because,"—and she yawned a little—"you spend so much of your time away from home now."

A little bright and thoughtful fellow of four summers awoke the other morning, and turning to his grandmother, said, "Grandma, I dreamed I had a carriage last night." "Did you," said she; "well, what did you do with it?" "Oh," said he, in his thoughtful manner, "I left it in the dream house."

The teacher in a city school received the following note from the mother of a boy who had been absent for a day or two.

"Dere mam: plese eggscuse Willy He didn't have but one pair of pants an I kep him home to wash and mend them and Mrs. O'toole's goat come and et them off the line and that awt to be eggscuse enuff, goodness nose. Yours with respeck, Mrs. B——."

"What time does the last train leave?" asked the traveler.

And the gatekeeper at the Boston depot gave him a haughty look and replied:

"When the road quits business."

Fond parent (on suburban train).—"Does mother's little Tessie want a nice banana?"

Tessie.—"Bet I do!"

Fond Parent.—"Then cry, pet, real hard. There's a dear little girl on the other side of the aisle with a paper sack full of them, and she'll give you one to quiet you."

Life reports that a housekeeper calls her Irish servant "Japan," because she has such a grudge against china.

Several men were talking about how they happened to marry.

"I married my wife," said one after the others had all had their say, "because she was different from any woman I had ever met."

"How was that?" chorused the others.

"She was the only woman I ever met who would have me," and there was a burst of applause.

Little Mary was crying because she had lost her purse. "And your lovely 'gold' penny, dear," said her mother, "that is lost, too." "Oh, no, it isn't," cried Mary, quickly, "it's shut up tight in the purse."

"Bridget, have you cracked those nuts for the dessert I want to make?"

"Yis, ma'am; all but them big walnuts, an' it'll take stronger jaws than mine to manage them; but I got troo wid the others all roight, ma'am."

In a prominent church the choir sang one Sunday morning an unusully brilliant Te Deum which had a grand fortissimo ending. At its close the rector arose, and in his quiet voice read the second lesson, which on this particular Sunday was the twentieth of Acts, beginning, "And after the uproar was ceased."

As a Boston street car was blocked a woman was heard confiding her domestic cares to a neighbor. "Yes, I keep a girl a while to rest my body, then I go without for a while to rest my mind."

A Bismarck schoolma'am, who had been telling the story of David, ended it with; "And all this happened over 3,000 years ago." A little cherub, his blue eyes wide open with wonder, said after a moment's thought, "Oh, my, what a memory you've got!"

If you have nothing else to do see how rapidly you can say "soup soothes theosophists thoroughly."

Three different waiters at a Southern hotel asked a little prim, precise Harvard professor at a dinner, in quick succession, if he would have soup. A little annoyed, he said to the last waiter who asked:

"Is it compulsory?"

"No, sah," answered our friend and brother; "no, sah, I think it am mock turtle."

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

Home Hints.

Asbestos mats are very useful to have about the kitchen stove. They are almost indestructible and perfect conductors of heat. Use them under pots and pans to prevent burning the food. They are inexpensive and can be found at all house furnishing stores.

Turnips boiled with the skins on are, like potatoes, much better than peeled. A very little sugar added to them will overcome the bitterness which sometimes injures the flavor of this vegetable.

If doubtful about the tenderness of a piece of meat put a tablespoonful of vinegar over it, when put on to boil.

Here are reliable directions for pressed chicken, which is one of the nicest of summer meats for luncheon: After the fowl is dressed and singed, wipe well with a damp towel, put in a kettle and cover with cold water. Simmer over a moderate fire until the meat falls from the bones. If the fowl is old three or four hours simmering will be needed. When half cooked add a teaspoonful of salt. When done, take the meat from the bones and cut into half-inch pieces. Put the bones and skins back into the kettle, and boil until the liquor is reduced to one and a-half pints, strain and season with salt. Mix this with the chicken, pour the whole into a square mould, put a weight upon it, and let stand in a cool place over night. When hard and cold turn onto a plate and slice.

A simple furniture polish for common use is made by mixing two tablespoonfuls of sweet or linseed oil with a tablespoonful of turpentine. Rub on with a piece of flannel and polish with a dry piece.

Matting should never be washed with soap and water. After sweeping with a long-handled bristle brush, which is much better than a broom, as it is better adapted to the fibrous surface, wash it thoroughly with a rather strong solution of salt water. Wipe dry with a large cotton cloth.

Fresh eggs are the best substitute for meat during the hot weather, and variety in preparing is desirable. Steamed eggs are delicious. Butter a deep tin and break carefully into it as many eggs as are needed. Sprinkle them with salt and bits of butter. Place in a steamer over boiling water until done. This is a very delicate way of preparing eggs for an invalid.

A long cake tin with a partition in the middle is a convenience where two kinds of cake are wanted for a small family. Make any white cake desired, put half the batter in one end of the tin; to the remainder add spices, raisins and other fruit according to taste for the other half of the tin.

Vaseline is said to be one of the best dressings for russet shoes, and spirits of turpentine the correct thing for cleaning and brightening patent leather.

Some woman has discovered another way of brightening and preserving the freshness of her light tan shoes. Wet a soft muslin rag with water into which a few drops of household ammonia have been poured. Rub it with a little castile soap and wash the shoes over, being very careful not to wet the cloth so as to soak through the leather. Rinse off thoroughly, smooth the shoes with the hand into as perfect shape as possible and stand away for about half an hour to dry. Then rub well with a soft flannel which gives them a natural gloss.

An assortment of screw-eyes, brass screw hooks and cup hooks is one of the greatest conveniences that a housekeeper can have. Put a screw-eye in the handle of the broom, dish mop, strainer or any utensil which by that addition can be hung up instead of being stood in a corner or given valuable shelf room, and certainly is an improvement on hanging by a dirty, breakable string. Screw them into the wall where you want to string up a temporary clothesline in either kitchen or bathroom. You will find dozens of places where they are just the thing. The screw hooks are most convenient for hanging up any small article in kitchen or pantry, and even in the other rooms for the lightly framed pictures, calendars and small ornaments. Use the cup hooks in the pantry or china closet on the under side of the shelves, and hang on them the pretty china cups which you do not care to keep on easels with their saucers. None of these screws make bad holes in the wall, and can be used in many places where a nail would look out of place or do damage.

The Only Portion of Montana where Irrigation is Wholly Unnecessary and not Employed in the Cultivation of Crops —Delightful and Healthful Climate—Unsurpassed in Productiveness—HOMES FOR ALL.

THE Flathead country is located in the northwest corner of Montana. The main range of the Rocky Mountains forms the eastern boundary, and the Kootenai range the western. The Flathead Valley is much larger than several of the smaller Eastern states. It comprises prairie lands, timber lands, bench lands and lowlands. The resources are agriculture, lumbering, stock ranges, coal, iron, building stone deposits, clay, limestone and precious metals.

As for climate, no part of the continent can present any greater charms to the home seeker. The mild seasons are due to the Chinook winds from the Pacific. The air is pure from the surrounding forests of mountain pines and plentiful streams of never-failing water from snowy peaks.

THE GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY

Gives the valley shipping facilities west to the Pacific Coast and east to St. Paul and Minneapolis.

Kalispell, the county seat of Flathead county, has a population of 2,500 people, and is the distributing and receiving point for a large scope of country abounding in untold wealth. It contains three national banks, three newspapers, water works, electric lights, good schools and churches, and all classes of business are represented. It is located on the Flathead river, a navigable stream. Flathead lake near by, is the largest body of fresh water in the Rocky Mountains.

Publisher's Notes.

Our special offer for August will be found on this page. If you do not already possess the three numbers of the White Ribbon Portfolio, do not fail to cut out the coupon. If not sending for them yourself please call the attention of a friend to the offer.

The Fair number of THE UNION SIGNAL will be the issue of August 22. We would recommend that local unions begin now to plan for a systematic and extensive circulation of this special number throughout the country. It will be a twenty-page paper, and will deal with phases of reform specially touching the interests of farmers and farmers' wives.

"Do Everything," Miss Willard's new Handbook for the World's White-Ribboners, brought out by the White Ribbon Publishing Co., of London, is, as far as the W. C. T. U. organization is concerned, almost as comprehensive as its title. No worker, certainly no local union, can afford to be without it. Presenting as it does in our Chieftain's own happy style, the "what" and the "how" of the white-ribbon idea of Christian temperance, it fills an important place in W. C. T. U. literature and as a help to workers will prove invaluable.

Experience has demonstrated that nothing strengthens our local work so much as the friendliness and coöperation of pastors. One of the wisest investments of money a union can make is to send THE UNION SIGNAL to every minister in its community. In proportion to the amount invested nothing a local union can do will bring such encouraging returns. If ministers of the different denominations, north and south, east and west, were readers of THE UNION SIGNAL, an immense impetus would be given to our work as a whole, and local workers would find their hands upheld as never before. Will not every union see to it that its own pastors become readers? The subscription price to pastors in America is only fifty cents a year. (See terms on last column of this page.) If you can spare but one dollar at first, send the paper to two of your ministers, and later supply others as you may be able.

The Young Crusader for August contains material that is especially valuable to L. T. L. workers. It gives practical answers to questions about organizing, explains Mrs. Rice's "New Plans" for diplomas and seals, prints a list of L. T. L. state superintendents and agents for The Young Crusader, and gives information about supplies. Send for extra copies for distribution among L. T. L. teachers.

Here are some of the nice things said about "Thumb Nail Sketches": "A little gem in the publishing art." "Beauty and utility happily combined." "An invaluable adjunct to the library of every woman interested in 'knowing.'" "A handy volume of condensed history of W. C. T. U. leaders, which provides many choice nuggets of knowledge ready for use." "It makes a pretty present," says Miss Willard, "to give to young women, and many a bright girl would choose to work with us if she were introduced to the workers we already have, and saw how they made their way in the beautiful fields of philanthropy and reform."

The familiar voice, cheery laugh and "level head" of our Business Manager, is once more among the pleasant features of daily life at Headquarters. Refreshed by the stirring events of the great World's Convention, the mountain air of Switzerland, and the invigorating breezes of the Atlantic, Mrs. Grow is to be found in her accustomed place in the Temple. She finds a warm welcome from her associates and an abundance of work awaiting her.

PLEASURE AND PROFIT IN BIBLE STUDY. By D. L. Moody.

The great battering-ram that this world-known evangelist uses to break down the walls of prejudice, indifference and sin is the word of God. Moody is preëminently a Bible expositor. He says himself, "I think I would rather preach about the Word of God than anything else except the love of God, because I believe it is the best thing in this world." In this little volume of less than one hundred and fifty pages, Mr. Moody gives in his characteristic style,—terse and clear, practical suggestions on how to study the Bible and strong words of warning against its neglect. An invaluable book for young Christians.

THE FEMALE OFFENDER. By Prof. Cæsar Lombroso and William Ferrero. Introduction by W. Douglas Morrison, Her Majesty's Prison, Wandsworth, England.

This volume belongs to the Criminology Series, edited by W. Douglas Morrison, M. A. In the introduction to this work is a table of crime proportion which is startling in the extreme. In 1850 the number of prisoners in the United States was 6,737, or one in every 3,442 of population. Since then the increase has been steady until in 1890 we find the awful ratio of 1 to 757. W. D. Morrison says in his introduction: "Dr. Lombroso's distinctive merit consists in the fact that he has devoted a laborious life to the examination of these biological, or, as he prefers to call them, anthropological anomalies. Criminal anthropology, as he has termed his investigations, is really an inquiry on scientific principles into the physical, mental and pathological characteristics of the criminal population." THE FEMALE OFFENDER is in no sense a pleasant book to peruse, but he who would learn must face much that is dark and repellant. The chapter-titles give some idea of the nature of contents: The Skull of the Female Offender; Pathological Anomalies of the Female Offender; The Brains of Female Criminals; The Born Criminal; Occasional Criminals; Crimes of Passion; Epileptic Delinquents and Moral Insanity, etc. Any who come in contact with criminals in reform work ought to have an intelligent appreciation of those conditions of brain and body that sway the soul and make sin in varied forms the dominant life-characteristics. The book in question is replete with vital and carefully tabulated information.

THAT EURASIAN. By Aleph Bey. Published by F. Tennyson Neely, New York and Chicago. Price $1.25.

As explanatory of the title of the book in question it may be stated that "the word Eurasian is made of Eur, from Europe, and Asian, from Asia, and applied to the children of a European and an Asiatic and to their descendants, of whom there is a large class in India." The dark crime about which the story clusters is one against which India may well cry out in pain and horror. It is twin sister to the cantonment system against which Christians—and the word here is used in a deeper sense than to mean civilized whites—are earnestly battling in their missionary efforts. A "Christian" civilization has taught the Indian to ruin himself with wine and opium and is peopling India with men and women who are not to be wondered at when they curse the hour of their birth, since Europeans and natives alike look upon them as outcasts. The book is an autobiography. The writer is the child of an English father and a Mohammedan mother. The mother was cast aside "as the skin of the mango you have eaten," died of a broken heart, the children were separated. The boy—"that Eurasian"—was adopted and educated by a godly Englishman, the girl was lost sight of. In later years her brother finds her in the degradation her mother had suffered (a sahib's aurat or woman) and her "sahib" was none other than her own father.

It is not to be wondered at that the Eurasian's thought of Christianity is a distorted one—not to be wondered at that through his life he would have none of the church or her rites and sacraments, would have nothing in common with those "Christians" who had darkened his life and the lives of countless helpless ones.

From a literary point of view the book is not faultless by any means. Whatever the authorship may be there is a vein of American slanginess that spoils it. But the facts on which the narrative is built are too true and the lesson not to be overlooked.

The New Webster Dictionary and Complete Vest-Pocket Library.

By E. EDGAR MILES.

AS AN always-at-hand, ready reference book, this little intellectual giant has no peer. It contains 45,800 words, absolutely fully pronounced as in Webster's great International Dictionary; a complete Parliamentary Manual, based on Roberts' and Cushing's; a Pronouncing Gazetteer of the World; a Rapid Calculator, with Business and Social Forms; and a Literary Guide. Cost two and one-half years' labor to compile.

Says Dr. Sheldon, President of the State Normal School at Oswego, N. Y.: "It is a wonderful combination of useful matter. I am surprised that so much that is valuable for one to know is brought into so small a compass and sold at so small a price."

It has many original features, and is noted for methods of condensation without omission.

Small, but great.
192 pages, 5⅝ x 2⅝ inches.
Weight, 2 ounces.

An index never before used groups the words and makes it possible to find any word in half the time. Another new device shows the plural forms of the nouns. Another points out about 5,000 especially difficult words; but the greatest of all achievements in modern dictionary making is the addition of 25,300 words to this dictionary by means of a single page, called the "Columbian Word-Builder."

This little "New Webster" is so nearly complete, and affords so good a degree of satisfaction, that it is being used in thousands of offices, studies and schools, to save the time and trouble of handling the ponderous unabridged.

Lack of space forbids speaking particularly of the four other books found in this remarkable combination volume, but they are of equal excellence with the dictionary, and, like it, are standard authority and thoroughly up-to-date. No intelligent, progressive person can afford to be without this most helpful work. It is not a luxury, but a necessity. Secure a copy at once. Take the best. Make presents to your friends, or get them to order with you.

Signal Notes.

MR. JOHN G. WOOLLEY will speak at the fifth annual Prohibition picnic of Lycoming county, Pa., August 22.

THE Empress of Japan is president of the Red Cross Society, which organization gave such Christian and humane help to the wounded Chinese prisoners.

IT is only twenty-five years since Oberlin College took the lead in opening its doors to women. There are now 40,000 women in attendance in the various American colleges.

THE beautifully executed bust of Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, by Anne Whitney, has just been received from Rome. The unveiling will probably occur on October 4, at Boston.

IN twenty-five years the Presbyterian women of the parent Woman's Board have raised $2,690,956 and have 163 missionaries and 1,100 native readers and teachers now in the field.

OHIO Wesleyan University has declared against the use of tobacco. Beginning with the fall term all students will be asked to discontinue the use of tobacco, or, as President Bashford states it, "We will have to dissolve partnership necessarily."

ESKIMOS of the Aleutian Islands are an industrious people but slaves to tobacco, both men and women using it to excess. They chew and rechew the weed, and then dry and smoke it. Until the whalers introduced rum and whisky among them they were usually quite exemplary in their married relations, but for drink they now seem willing to sell body and soul.

MANCHESTER, England, according to telegraphic communication, will soon be a prohibition town. The leaders of the state Law and Order League have insisted that the police commissioners enforce the statuatory prohibition law, and on July 23 announced that in two weeks from that time every saloon in the city must be closed. It is expected that the liquor dealers will make a vigorous fight.

A SPARRING match, to put it mildly, was advertised to take place on July 3, at Nantucket. The Y. W. C. T. U. and other active societies circulated petitions and in twenty-four hours presented them to the selectmen with two hundred eighty signatures, requesting that the permission to hold the brutal exhibition be revoked. The selectmen reversed their decision and no boxing will take place there this summer.

THE Duluth Press, the home paper of the Northwest, is the official paper of St. Louis county, Minn., and its editorial staff is made up entirely of women. This fact doubtless has much to do with the fact that woman's work receives so many notices in its dignified, business-like columns. It is matter for regret, however, that one advertisement of "brewers and bottlers" in the issue in hand blots the otherwise clean sheet.

THE Jaffa-Jerusalem railway should certainly have a cosmopolitan hold on the world since so many countries contributed to its building. Turkey gave the concession, France found the capital, Belgium and England furnished the rails and coal, Poland and Switzerland sent engineers and laborers, Greece furnished the cooks. The United States shares with Germans the man who first surveyed the road. Philadelphia supplied the engines.

THE Epworth League, in international conference at Chattanooga, among resolutions adopted thus expressed itself on the temperance question: "We are unalterably committed to the prohibition of the liquor traffic, and we are determined to fight the saloon until this deadly foe is destroyed in our land." The policemen showed their appreciation of the attitude of the young people by promptly arresting three thirsty counterfeits, who, with Epworth League badges in their buttonholes, were entering a saloon.

THE following is the result of an analysis of a cigarette, made recently by a physician: "The tobacco was found to be strongly impregnated with opium, while the wrapper, which was warranted to be rice paper, was proved to be the most ordinary quality of paper whitened with arsenic. The two poisons combined were present in sufficient quantities to create in the smoker a habit of using opium without his being aware of it, his craving for which can only be satisfied by an incessant consumption of cigarettes." These facts would be sufficient to stop the manufacture of anything less insiduous in its influence. But smokers will smoke on to the death.

The Second Summer,
many mothers believe, is the most precarious in a child's life; generally it may be true, but you will find that mothers and physicians familiar with the value of the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk do not so regard it.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

A destructive cloudburst destroyed lives and property in Wyoming and New Mexico last week.

Professor Heinrich, one of the most eminent of German historians, died at Berlin, August 1.

The prospects for a phenomenal crop of corn in the United States are reported from the Agricultural Bureau.

A wild mob of Italians in the mining district of Spring Valley, Ill., killed and injured forty negro miners Aug. 4.

Reports from Ku Cheng, China, state that ten British missionaries have been killed at the Wha Sang mission.

Richard M. Hunt, the noted architect designer of the Administration Building at the World's Fair, died at his residence in Newport, R. I., July 31.

Governor Altgeld, of Illinois, has appointed a board of arbitration of three members, one a capitalist, one a laboring man and one an eminent jurist.

The colored women in conference in Boston last week decided to form a national organization, to be known as the National Federation of Afro-American Women.

The mayor of West Superior, Wis., has been impeached by the city council on the charge of extorting money from saloon-keepers, and the office of mayor declared vacant.

The extra session of the Illinois legislature adjourned August 2 in a disgraceful riot, with no business of importance accomplished, and the resolution to investigate charges of "boodling" rejected.

ALL juvenile readers of THE UNION SIGNAL as well as the subscribers to Young Women, will be glad to know that Miss Jennie A. Stewart ("Aunt Jane") sails for home August 10, and immediately upon her return will resume the Cozy Corner letters in THE UNION SIGNAL and issue a large sized edition of Young Women, in which the World's W. C. T. U. Convention will be written up from the standpoint of a Y and an experienced correspondent. This issue will come out the last of August, just the time when the Y unions are entering upon their fall work, so will be most useful in awakening renewed interest.

DESPITE the repeated notices of our intended fortnight's holiday, many readers were surprised and alarmed at not receiving their UNION SIGNAL for two weeks, and have written us letters of inquiry. All such inquiries were patiently answered until the issue of August 1 was in the mail, which we thought contained sufficient explanation of the absence of the two previous numbers. We refer our readers to the issues of June 13 (page 9), June 20 (page 1), and July 11 (pages 1 and 19), and can only say to them, as we often say in jest to each other at headquarters when some important news has not been noticed, "Read THE UNION SIGNAL and you will know what is going on in the world!"

OUR Fair number will be issued this year, as already announced, August 22. We consider this the strategic number of the entire year, as it carries the fundamental truths of total abstinence and prohibition right into the homes of the farmers, who are the earnest thinking force of our population. Unions can do their best literature work with this issue of THE UNION SIGNAL. Five hundred or a thousand copies should be distributed at every county and state fair held between August and October. For special terms see Publisher's column, and for specific directions for fair work and distribution of literature, see our editorial and national superintendent's official communication in next week's issue.

THERE is every prospect of a second "woman's crusade" in Harvey, Ill. This town was founded about five years ago by an association which put into all its deeds a clause providing that no saloon should ever be established and the penalty was forfeiture of the land. Hundreds of the staunchest temperance people were attracted by this provision, bought land and made homes in the thriving little manufacturing village. The land association after a time changed officers, and the provisions in its charter seemed to have been disregarded, at least the council last week voted for a saloon license and the mayor signed it. No grosser perfidy could have been perpetrated. The population is ten to one against saloons, indeed, most of the residents of Harvey are there solely because of its supposed inviolable prohibition charter, and now the hydra-headed monster is to be planted in their very midst! But the women are determined. They have appointed a committee of one hundred to crusade the saloon out before it comes in. We hope to give our readers a history of their work written by a well-known white-ribboner of Harvey.

THE services in Westminster Abbey, the most historic of English cathedrals, on the Sunday evening following the World's W. C. T. U. Convention were attended by a large number of white-ribbon women, seats having been reserved by order of the Dean for the leaders of the different nations. The Bishop of Dover preached a straightforward, earnest sermon, in which he advocated total abstinence and strong legal measures against the liquor traffic. He referred warmly to the great convocation of temperance women who had been holding meetings in London during the week, and which was represented in the historic old Abbey at this temperance gathering. He said there were people who thought it witty to laugh at the temperance cause, but there was not a cause more sacred. Dean Bradley read those conclusive verses of St. Paul, "If meat cause my brother to offend, I will eat no meat while the world standeth." The anthem, "Cry aloud and spare not," sent a great wave of fresh young voices through the "dim mysterious aisles" of the venerable edifice, which we venture to say has never before witnessed a service wherein the organized undenominational work of women has been recognized. Of all the varied meanings of the wonderful ten days' meetings in London, probably no single event was so significant as this service in the Abbey.

No particulars have reached us but we learn through the Times-Herald, of Chicago, that Judge Chilty, of London, holds that Lady Henry Somerset must renew the license to public houses on her estate. It will be remembered that Lady Henry has been accused of inconsistency in advocating total abstinence and holding property on which public houses, or saloons, were situated. We have repeatedly explained that she was powerless to prevent such use of her property until the licenses which she had inherited had expired. This occurred recently and she gave notice to the holders that she would not renew their licenses. Whereupon the dramsellers brought suit and the judge decided that Lady Henry "must not let her personal opinions influence her actions in her fiduciary (trust holding) capacity," and that being only a tenant for life, she must put her conscience in abeyance and rerent her property for immoral purposes! Nothing will show so clearly to American readers, who do not comprehend the management of entailed property, the anomalous situation in which Lady Henry finds herself, and the brave efforts she is making to conform her business interests to her convictions of right and duty. Instead of deriding her, as so many of our penny papers have done, every friend of truth and justice should applaud her for her dauntless, but fruitless efforts to arrest her inherited estate from corrupt uses.

THE case of Maria Barberi strikingly shows the inadequacy of law in affording justice and protection to women. Here is a young Italian girl, shown by the evidence to be pure and innocent and fighting desperately for her honor, under sentence of death in Sing Sing prison for killing her betrayer. It was clearly demonstrated that she was no willful murderer, so that in passing sentence of death the judge overstepped his prerogative. Doubtless if the knife had been wielded by a man avenging an outrage upon daughter or sister the verdict rendered by a jury of his peers would have been "justifiable homicide." Or if the girl had been one of a family of wealth and influence, or anybody but a poor Italian so ignorant of the English language as not to know what her sentence was, the act would not have been condemned. We have just read of an "attractive and accomplished woman," daughter of a prominent general of the army, who shot and killed a negro boy whom she caught stealing fruit from her garden. The coroner's jury decided that she did not do it "with murderous intent," and she was released. The attorney who prosecuted Maria Barberi is generous (!) enough to say, with a fine flavor of masculine arrogance, that the "ends of justice would not be defeated if her sentence was commuted," as the "moral effect of the law has been accomplished in her conviction and sentence." Moral effect of law forsooth! The conviction and sentence places a premium on immorality. It is not commutation that Maria Barberi should have, but full pardon. It is not mercy that her case calls for, but justice. We rejoice that manly men and womanly women all over the country are demanding this justice, and that the secular and religious press unite in declaring that the execution of this girl would be a disgrace to the state of New York and to America. Perhaps the attorney who prosecuted her, the jury who convicted her, the judge who sentenced her will find that the day has gone by when the libertine can be protected by law—that the "new woman" is here and by her side the "new man" who sees the horrible injustice of the prison and the scaffold being the only places in the making and administration of law where woman can represent herself. One man in the progressive state of Kansas has shown his keen sense of the injustice of law toward the "weaker sex" by offering himself as a substitute for this woman in the electrocutor's chair. All events work together to pave the way for the presence and voice of woman in government.

THE CHILD AT THE DOOR.

Behold, I stand at the door.—Rev. 3 : 20.

BY MARY A. LATHBURY.

[Written for the department of Securing Homes for Homeless Children.]

There's a child outside your door,
Let him in.
He may never pass it more,—
Let him in.
Let a little wandering waif
Find a shelter sweet and safe
In the love and light of home,
Let him come.

There's a cry along your street,
Day by day;
There's a sound of little feet
Gone astray.
Open wide your guarded gate
For the little ones that wait,
Till a voice of love from home
Bid them come.

There's a voice divinely sweet,
Calls to-day;
"Will you let these little feet
Stray away?
Let the lambs be homeward led
And of you it shall be said,
'You have done it faithfully
Unto me.'"

We shall stand some solemn day
At His door.
Shall we hear the Master say
O'er and o'er—
"Let the children all come in
From a world of pain and sin;
Open wide the doors of Home,
Children, come."

AUNT HANNAH.

In Two Chapters.

BY E. H. CHASE.

CHAPTER II.

Miss Patience and the stranger lingered, walking around the grass-grown acre, and plucking a wild rose or a bit of wild thyme; then they walked back toward the town.

"'Twas a tough time with me when I first knew Aunt Hannah," Miss Patience said, renewing the conversation. "The country was new then, an' we'd just got here. We came from Maine. I took up a piece o' land an' I earnt somethin' considerable, an' I expected to pay for it. I spun an' wove, and went from house to house makin' men's an' boys' clothes. I wanted to have a home, an' I thought I could lay up somethin' for a nest egg. But the years grew harder an' harder, an' father was sick considerable, an' the war come on, an' then the boys went off to the war an' never come back. I didn't seem to have no spirit to do things," she said, mournfully. "The state had given 'em some bounty, an' father took it an' built the house. 'Twas the last work he did; an' then he was sick a good while. Aunt Hannah had a little money she'd saved, that her boys had sent her. She would make me take it to buy a coffin. I used to sew for her, an' try to pay it back; but la, you couldn't never pay Aunt Hannah. She'd do more for you than you could for her any way you could fix it. An' then she married Mr. Morrill an' moved off to the city, an' I've been alone, so to speak, ever since. She's allers remembered to send me somethin' for Christmas an' birthdays, an' once she come to see me an' staid all night. I haint seen her much, but I knew she was there." A tear stole down the sallow cheek, and the voice was very pathetic.

"And so you, too, are all alone," Miss Crosby said, softly.

"Yes, I'm all alone. I never was no great hand to mix up with other folks, I don't seem to mind tellin' you. Somehow you don't seem like the rest of the world. Everybody else has got somebody to care for, seems to me. I've got a garden, an' my house, but I can't seem to do much now to get a livin'. Folks mostly buys store clothes for boys an' men, an' women here does their own washin' an' ironin', an' nobody now wants spinin' an' weavin' done. My cow was some company, but I had to sell her last winter to git along. Now I don't know what I shall do. The haint no use whinin', though; I expect to live till I die, an' I mean to keep a stiff upper lip, an' not take the trouble till it comes."

They had walked along slowly, side by side, and now they had come to a small, unpainted house near an overhanging willow. There was a luxuriant growth of grass and running vines in the yard, a row of blush rose bushes full of heavy, half-open buds, a few lilacs showing yet something of the late bloom, and by the doorstep there was a clump of sweet, old-fashioned pinks. A stout piece of string on which some morning glories had begun to run was tied to a nail above the window. In the corner of the yard was a weather-beaten apple tree, and under it two bee-hives sat side by side on a bench. Near the path an old gray hen and her brood burrowed in the sand.

Amy Crosby stopped by the gate and drank in the peacefulness of the scene.

"Oh, you must come in with me," Miss Patience said, opening the gate, "your train won't be along for four hours yet."

So the two went up the grass-grown path, and Miss Patience unlocked the door. The rooms were sweet and clean, and the sun shimmering through the willow, lay in mottled patches on the painted floor. There was a smell of wild strawberries in the kitchen, and two fresh laid eggs were on the table. A great white cat jumped down from the rocking-chair and came and rubbed against Miss Patience.

"Take off your things an' lay 'em on the bed," Miss Patience said, opening the door into a tidy bedroom, "an' then you jest make yourself to home, an' I'll step round an' git us a bite, an' a sip o' tea."

She rolled up the strings of her own bonnet and laid it in a drawer. From another drawer she took a smoothly ironed calico apron, and tied it on by crossing the long strings behind and making a bow in front. Then she went out to start the fire.

Miss Crosby smoothed her hair before the little cracked glass, patted the friendly cat, and then followed Miss Patience to the kitchen. A bright tin tea-kettle stood on the stove, and she took it up and went through the open door to the pump where she filled it, and was putting it on the stove as Miss Patience came in with the wood.

Then Miss Crosby began setting the table.

"How handy you be," Miss Patience said, stopping to watch her. "I haint got anything to do, but it seems so good to have you round."

Miss Crosby smiled. "I'd give the world for a home like this," she said. "I board first in one place and then in another; but it is not home. This looks like a real home."

The table had been set with a snow white cloth and queer old-fashioned dishes of deep blue. For lunch there were some slices of toasted bread, a square of honey, two baked potatoes, the two fresh laid eggs and a dish of wild strawberries.

The two women sat near together and talked over their tea. The shadows grew long but they did not heed them. A sharp whistle sounded near and the rush of the train surprised them. Miss Crosby started up and made a rush for the little bedroom.

"You can't get it now. You wouldn't have time," Miss Patience said, looking from the window.

Miss Crosby laughed a little uneasily as she came out to the door, her bonnet in her hand. The station was a quarter of a mile away and the train was already there. She turned back into the house and looked at Miss Patience and both women laughed.

"You might as well make the best of it," the older woman said. "If I just thought of myself I should be rather glad you got left."

There was no one in the distant city who would know or care whether she staid or not. Miss Crosby looked into the worn, lonesome face before her very steadily for a moment, and then she got up and put her arms around Miss Patience and kissed her.

Both faces lighted up. They looked at each other and the sadness vanished. Then both women laughed again.

"Well, I never!" said Miss Patience. "This morning I didn't know you was livin', an' now seems though you belong to me."

"And I came to weep at the grave of the only friend I had in the world," said Miss Crosby, "and I have remained to rejoice that a new one is found."

"If you could live with me, now, we should both have a home," said Miss Patience, after a little time.

"I shall never wish to leave you," the younger woman returned quickly. "I have money enough for us both if we are prudent, and I earn something with my pen. To-morrow, if you like, we can go to the city and gather up what belongings I have and bring them here. They will help to make us comfortable, and as many of them were my mother's I like to have them about me."

"It's too good to be true, I only hope I sha'n't wake up an' find I've been dreaming," Miss Patience answered her.

Miss Crosby laughed as she stooped and lifted the cat in her arms and pressed her face to the soft fur. They had forgotten that the table still stood in the floor; now, as if actuated by one thought, they both came to it and began to pick up the dishes and to clear away the food. Then Miss Crosby took the little rocker and went out under the willow, while Miss Patience fed her chickens.

"I'm a fool," she said again as the parti-colored flock clustered around her, pushing and quarreling over the bits of bread and the kernels of wheat she tossed out to them from her apron. "I wonder what set me to thinking of Lewis Crosby to-day of all days. He's dead. He was killed in the war, I saw his name in the paper, an' 'taint no sign because that girl's eyes are just the same color, an' look at you just the same way that she's any kith or kin' o' his. 'Taint no ways likely!" and she dropped the corners of her apron and let out all the food it contained to the great satisfaction of the crowd around her.

In her younger days Miss Patience had been quite a belle among the country youth of her native state, and nobody but herself had ever found out what it was that came between herself and Lewis Crosby. They only knew that one morning the sleepy little town among the Maine hills woke up to learn that Lewis Crosby had gone away to sea, and that Amrad Foster was going west. Several years afterward an old neighbor sent her father a paper having a list of those killed in the battle of Bull Run, and Lewis Crosby's name was one of the first on the list. All this persisted in going through Miss Patience mind as she reclined on the little lounge and watched the stars come out and the swaying figure out there in the dusk of the girl in the rocker. And then she arose hastily.

"The dew's a-fallin' an' you'll catch yer death o' cold," she said, stepping to the door.

The next day the two women went to Minneapolis to gather up and ship Miss Crosby's goods. These proved to be the excellent old-fashioned furnishings that had belonged to Mrs. Crosby, and which the daughter had carefully preserved. Miss Patience was nearly beside herself as she rolled up heavy, soft carpets, and helped to repack silver, curtains, dishes and "household stuff" generally.

The two women were very happy for weeks arranging and brightening up the little home. It was all so simple that to another it would have been of but little value but to these two it meant plenty and comfort.

The house took on an air of newness with its coat of gray paint, and under the willow a hammock swung, and a light rocker found place. The cow was bought back, and the two women settled down to a content they had not known for many a year.

"It's all the doin's of that blessed Aunt Hannah," Miss Patience would often say. "When she lived, she lived to do good to them as needed her, an' when she died her burial brought two lonely ones together."

Then Miss Crosby would look away across the prairie to where the white stones stood thickly in the long grass, and remember the day when she had first seen Miss Patience.

"I am sure she would be more than repaid if she knew we lived to pass the good deeds on," she would answer softly.

The summer passed away, and the short, cold days of a Minnesota winter were at hand. The prairie now was but a sea of brown grass with patches of ice here and there. Within there was the cheery glow of an open wood fire, and the square bay window in front of Amy Crosby's writing table was full of blooming plants. Miss Patience sat before the fire knitting busily on a long, woolen stocking. In the rocking-chair in the cozy corner the white cat was taking his afternoon nap.

Through the snow that was beginning to fall a stooping figure came stumbling along the path from the town. Amy had let her eyes rest on him as he came, seeing him, but with mind intent on a refractory line of her manuscript. Presently, as he neared the gate, she noted something familiar in the halting gait, and her heart stood still. The man opened the gate and came up the short walk. His rap sounded on the door, and Miss Patience laid down her knitting and went to see who was there. There was a moment's silence and then Amy heard Miss Patience's voice:

"Why, Lewis Crosby! Can the grave give up its dead?"

Miss Amy started up hurriedly, and in a moment stood by Miss Patience.

"Oh, my father," she said, and her arms were about the man, and her lips close to the bearded face.

There were tears, and stories of loss and suffering told through smiles, but Lewis Crosby had come to his own at last, and the years of lonely waiting were forgotten.

YESTERDAY AND TO-DAY.

BY HELEN CAMPBELL.

The summer boarder whose happy fortune it is to spend the vacation, long or short, in an old New England village off the beaten track, turns for part of the day's amusement to the old graveyard, wherein history and poetry are both embalmed. Now and then a really old one, as age goes in this country, is discovered, stones almost two hundred years old yielding up their inscriptions only after much clearing away of grass and digging out of half-obliterate letters. It is worth the trouble, most of all in the strange food for thought, not on one's latter end or any of the terrors urged upon the reader by the ancient epitaphs. It is not at all the art of dying that becomes the question. That passes quite out of sight, and living and its methods take its place.

Nothing could be more natural. The oldest memorials are the most suggestive ones, and the student of them at once formulates a statement as to colonial tendencies. It is plain that most men had many wives. They married early and they married often. "Mercy, wife of Aaron Small," dies at twenty-five, leaving six small children to mourn her loss. Phœbe follows, and goes to her rest at forty, leaving also six, and Mehitable, who takes her turn and manages to survive Aaron, finds the twelve so hard a task that her own babies have no chance whatever, and make a little row of graves near the other mothers, who, it is to be hoped, paid them proper attention on their arrival in that country from which they had so lately come.

Two, three, even four wives, one, the youngest of all, dying at eighteen. The men live long, seventy, eighty, more than one ninety years, but each and all would seem to have planned for as speedy a filling of the family plot as could be brought about by any and all means save actual murder. How did they do it? Why did they do it? Was it all a "providential interposition" as they record upon the stones, or did it dawn upon any of them that under these pines was the sole resting place Mercy and Jane and many Marys had ever known?

It is at this point that speculation begins. We are told that the modern woman is discontented, unruly, reckless; that the old days knew no such characteristics; that the women who were our grandmothers and great grandmothers, went their quiet round untroubled by the questions the woman of to-day persists in asking. In short that content was the rule for those "good old times" that filled the graveyard, and that America can know neither peace nor further progress till her women return to the same mind. In the meantime there they lie, those women who might tell us the truth, and never one comes back to make the way plainer for this "new woman" fumbling out toward light, and dimly questioning if the grandmothers were not in the right in renouncing the struggle before it had well begun.

Were they content? That is the question which can find answer only in old records of occasional insubordination, like that of Anne Hutchinson, for instance. The diaries that remain to us of one and another distinguished Puritan woman are no clue to the real feelings. Duty in its sternest aspect ruled, and the thing recorded was what one ought to feel, never what one actually felt. But with the birth of the factory movement in New England, the rush of farmers' daughters toward the mills, and a day of fourteen hours of work joyfully accepted, is the only answer needed. Lucy Larcom tells the story in her "A New England Girlhood," and gives a picture of the life, which, hard as it was, seemed ease compared with that from which they had fled.

The colonial family was patriarchal in its nature as to numbers and necessities, and the industries of the patriarchal time were still retained under every roof. Even with servants the mistress must arise by daylight and work well into the night if tasks were not to overlap. They did their work and did it faultlessly well, but it is easy to see why each household, in old Linborough, for instance, had three mistresses, two in the graveyard and one presiding in their place.

"Remember! I should think so!" said an energetic old lady the other day when asked as to her own opinion of conditions eighty years ago. "There were contented women of course, but I prefer the word 'resignation' as truer to facts. My mother was happy because my father worshipped her, yet in spite of this the law as it then stood made her simply a chattel. She told me when she was grown, that she hoped that I might live to see the time when a woman could have some share in what she earned, and that, well as my father loved her, she had never had five dollars at once to spend as she pleased, since she married him. Women loved her and told her their troubles, and she said those old times held often a despair and weariness the new ones do not know, because now law has changed and there is hope and all is bettering. Don't I remember! There was my beautiful Aunt Adelaide whose husband kicked her out into the snow one winter's night in one of his periodical sprees. He had done it before and this time she would not go back. But the law gave him her property and the three children, and she ended her days in an insane asylum because she could not get them. No, my dear, thank God, you live to-day and not a hundred years ago, and every day will give you more and more cause for being thankful. It is a better time for every soul on earth, and this thing you call 'good old times' is a dreary humbug, that might better be decently interred and done with. Give me the new times and the new man, for he is coming along too, side by side with what they call the 'new woman.' God bless her! He doesn't know it, this thick-headed male thing whom we taught to lay burdens upon us, but he is being made over no less than all the rest of us, and all at once there will be a reconstructed world, and oh, my dear, what good times we are all going to have!"

This is the voice of the old woman, long past eighty, who remembers, and the new woman who sometimes forgets, may well take heart of grace, since the new day is here, and, though a little foggy and uncertain at times, holds promise of such sunshine as earth has never seen before.

HEREDITY AND NARCOTISM.

BY W. XAVIER SUDDUTH, M. D.

The habit of narcotism is often induced as the result of a morbid craving for a stimulant. This condition is, many times, due to the prenatal use of narcotics by the parents. While it may not be scientifically held that inebriety is inherited, yet it does undoubtedly "run in families." The explanation, however, is to be found in an inherited tendency rather than a direct inheritance of the disease.

The general consensus of opinion among students of heredity is toward the position that only a limited number of diseases (perhaps two or three) are directly inherited, and that when such a condition prevails the offspring seldom reach maturity, but most commonly die in infancy. Not all cases of premature death, however, are to be taken as evidence of congenital disease, as food stuffs and environment, together with infection, play an important part in infant mortality, but above all these in importance heredity may easily be classed first in determining the tendency to disease in general and inebriety in particular.

The offspring of parents addicted to the use of narcotics are very apt to be physically degenerate, and are consequently less able to assume the burdens of life and less brave to withstand the pains of existence than their more robust brothers and sisters, hence more liable to resort to the use of narcotics and stimulants. Indirectly, therefore, it may be said that narcotism may be inherited; the tendency surely exists, and if the individual is brought up in the same environment as that into which he is born, partakes of the same food and moves in the same mental and physical atmosphere, he naturally follows in the path trodden by his parents, and falls into the same degenerate habits, and were it not that the disease is self-limiting in one to two generations, a family of degenerates would follow. Narcomania, however, tends to sterility, and the progeny of the inebriate are cut down, many times, before they reach maturity. It is a wise provision of nature that the fittest only survive, and by the operation of this inexorable law nature unequivocally places her stamp of disapproval upon indulgence in the use of narcotics in all their multitudinous forms.

In addition to the physical stigmata, mental degeneracy constantly crops out in the progeny of the narcomaniac. This is the most unpromising phase of the question. While much may be done by proper treatment and dieting to alleviate and to a great extent better the physical condition of the inebriate, yet little has as yet been accomplished for the condition of mental degeneracy. This latter term is not intended to include imbeciles and epileptics, but to apply to perverts only. The members of this class are destined to pass through life always with a cloud hanging over them, shadowed by a spectre that may at any moment cause the performance of some rash act for which not they but their sinful ancestors are responsible. Born degenerate into a degenerate atmosphere, is it any wonder that they adopt degenerate habits later in life, unless brought into a changed environment?

Max Nordeau, in a recent work on degeneracy, says that "the marks of degeneracy are directly traceable to constitutional poisoning," and quotes Morel to substantiate him in his position. The latter says, "A race which is regularly addicted, even without excess, to narcotics and stimulants in any form (such as fermented alcoholic drinks, tobacco, opium, hasheesh or arsenic), which partakes of tainted foods (bread stuffs made of bad corn), which absorbs organic poisons (marsh fevers, syphilis, tuberculosis or goitre), begets degenerate descendants who, if they remain exposed to the same influences, rapidly descend to the lowest degree of degeneracy, to idiocy, dwarfishness and the like." That there is here opportunity for a disastrous, vicious circle of reciprocal effects is also held by Nordeau when he says, "The drinker and apparently the smoker also begets enfeebled children, hereditarily fatigued or degenerate, and these drink or smoke in their turn because they are fatigued. They crave for a stimulus, for a momentary artificial invigoration or alleviation of their painful excitability and then when they recognize that this only increases in the long run their excitement, they cannot, through weakness of will (of themselves) resist those habits." He also quotes Legraine as saying that "at the base of all forms of inebriety we find mental degeneracy." This theory is borne out by the fact that science has as yet been unable to establish any pathological lesion that is alone characteristic of any special form of narcotism, by means of which the condition may be diagnosed, as is the case in most recognized diseases.

While it is true that the views herein presented may be considered by some as radical, nevertheless they are born of a close study of the psychology and pathology of inebriety in all its forms. In the past, medical treatment alone has been of little avail. The mental as well as the physical condition must receive attention, and a system of mental treatment inaugurated that will strengthen the will of the habitué which is invariably weakened by indulgence.

If we would make the stream pure and sweet we must go to the fountain head. So in narcotism the mental perversion which lies back of the habit is to be taken into consideration and if we would reach permanent result, some line of treatment must be adopted that will establish a condition of mental and moral as well as physical hygiene.

WILLARD HALL NOONTIDE LINKS.

A lady from Wisconsin writes: "Please tell us about the noon meetings, what they are like, how long they last, and what kind of people attend them?"

Promptly at noon each week day, rain or shine, heat or cold, the services commence, and when the clock says one, they cease.

Prince and beggar, black and white, saint and sinner, sit side by side, to hear and speak of our wonderful Saviour.

The attendance increases from day to day, and if the present average holds good until October, the place will be filled, and the winter will see a great work well in hand.

The usual program consists of song service, reading of the Scripture, prayer and a fifteen minutes' talk, followed by an open meeting, and it is not unusual to see three or five people on their feet at one time anxious to be heard.

Requests for prayers are many, and many a wandering soul starts out on a new life at these blessed meetings.

The work needs money, and if all who read this will send a contribution, large or small, I can promise them that their seed-sowing will yield a thousand fold.

"Who will come to the help of the Lord against the mighty?"

. . . . . .

He came running down the aisle at the close of one of the meetings and fairly shrieked as he ran, and as he came to me he said:

"Oh, I am an awful drunkard. Is there any help for me?" Friends gathered about him. He knelt and prayed for himself. Sometimes he called on God, sometimes on his dead mother. Oh, it was pitiful to hear him.

He signed the pledge, promised everything, and went out to the street, and God alone knows how the fight goes on with him.

. . . . . .

A truly womanly woman is Mary A. Blood, principal of the Columbia School of Oratory at Steinway Hall, who on Monday came to read the Bible for us.

Her first selection was that dear old Psalm, "Bless the Lord, oh, my soul, and all that is within me, bless his holy name."

As a bird flutters its wings at the first gray dawn, and then breaks into song; as the gray blushes to crimson in the east, so my soul rose exultant from the shadow in which it sat, and stood triumphant on the mountain top, under the assurance, "That as far as the east is from the west, so far has he removed our transgressions from us."

Then followed the Sermon on the Mount and other selections. A strange mingling of emotions seized me as she read, emotions suggestive of pasture lands, and fair streams gurgling through, of storm-swept aisles, of penitent souls, of victories.

The voice wooed and won, scorched, judged and condemned us, and when reaching the climax, she put to us the question of the gentle preacher, "Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, shall he not much more clothe you, oh ye of little faith?" the audience, impatient of restraint, broke out in one glad shout, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

And one of the grandest meetings ever held in Willard Hall was over.

THE WORLD'S CONVENTION FROM AN ENGLAND STANDPOINT.

Dear Union Signal:—The great International Convention, with all its attendant stir, has come and gone. The doings of the week will have left their mark for good and truth and right on this city and country, and their echoes have already been heard, transmitted over continents and under seas throughout the civilized world. A great impression has been made on the public mind through the newspaper press, and directly on many thousands of people who have thronged the great halls day after day and night after night, finding always a plethora of new ideas making for righteousness, clamoring for entry through eye-gate and ear-gate alike to the citadel of the brain. And it may be believed that the delegates from your country and from many another have themselves taken away—or will when they go, which should be long yet if they please us English folk—quite new understandings of the magnitude and the essential oneness of the temperance reformation on these islands. They have had opportunity for being impressed, and as I have talked with them it has seemed that they have been, and not unfavorably. May the satisfaction, born of the knowledge of the greatness and solidity of the temperance enterprise in England and the reflection that no effort has been spared to present in their fullness the best available indications of the facts, compensate for such discomforts as may have had to be endured.

There are plenty of people in this country (good people too) who only know of the temperance world as one would know of a pageant viewed through the wrong end of a telescope. The scenes and events that transpire before their eyes are only seen as though far off, the horrors and evils produced by drink make little or no impression on their perceptive nerves, and the strenuous efforts of earnest and determined reformers seem to such listless onlookers to be merely the antics of distant Liliputians. Sometimes, even, the rays of light by which they see what they do see are colored by falling through a full wine-glass; sometimes again "the other eye" (you remember it need not be shut when looking through a telescope) is fixed on a parcel of brewery shares! I dare say you have such folk even in Chicago. In London they thrive as natives of the soil, and that notwithstanding the fact that temperance principles thrive too, and are deeply rooted, producing a perennial crop of blossom and of fruit; personal abstinence based on sound conviction extending all the time and preparing the way for "legal suasion" which, when it once becomes the law, John Bull will hold with tight grip—and will enforce it too.

It was a vivid sense of the situation here suggested (though in what form of thought this witness knoweth not), as well as the desire to fitly welcome the international delegates, which prompted Lady Henry Somerset to evolve the idea of spectacular demonstration in their honor. The attempt was made by means of the first public function of the week to present a varied program which should be capable of showing at once the world-wide character, the deep and far-reaching ramifications, the imposing proportions, the solidity and power of the temperance party, and by means of such a display to compel attention, and to convince many who are indifferent to any ordinary temperance propaganda. To what extent the effort was successful I ought to leave to other pens to tell, for it has been my privilege (acting in the capacity of an expert for and at the instance of Lady Henry Somerset) to control and direct the organization of the great public gatherings. as well as those of the World's W. C. T. U. Convention itself. Yet it may be permitted me to say that not a few American and other delegates have offered generous testimony of their sense of the success which has attended the meetings.

Others have no doubt told you of the doings of the Convention on the many subjects with which it dealt. I will only say that one hundred temperance and other organizations (among them every one of the great societies whose work has brought the cause to its present high position) in the United Kingdom accepted the invitation to send "friendly delegates," and did send them, to take part in the Convention. A list of these societies would take too much space, but it would be representative of every phase of temperance reform, and of others kindred to the aims of the W. C. T. U. No meeting ever held in this country more fully proved the essential unity of the temperance movement the world over.

At one point Miss Willard called the native representatives of over a dozen countries to join hands on the platform, and the Convention cheered again and again the visible exemplification of international unity. It was an unconscious, but very striking commentary on the remark of one of our English temperance papers, which said the other week: "In 1846 the first World's Temperance Congress was held in Canada. . . . A proposal to form a World's Temperance Union was not favorably entertained, and it was left for the valiant women of the W. C. T. U. to cover the ground." That they have covered it was proved by the presence of women from Africa, Australia, Burmah, Bahamas, Canada, China, Ceylon, Denmark, Egypt, France, Finland, Germany, India, Madeira Islands, Madagascar, Newfoundland, New Zealand, Norway, Turkey, Armenia, United States, England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales.

I will only add that the meetings of the British Women's Temperance Association, which preceded the Convention, were immensely successful; that for the various meetings some of the most famous metropolitan buildings were used—Dr. Joseph Parker's City Temple and the Memorial Hall, both famous Congregational buildings; John Wesley's Chapel, the cathedral of Methodism; Westminster Abbey; the Queen's Hall; the Royal Albert Hall and Exeter Hall; that the audiences here enthusiastically welcomed your splendid women speakers; that the whole series of meetings has been reported in the newspaper press to an unprecedented extent; that the receptions given by the Lord Mayor of London at the Mansion House and by Lady Henry Somerset at Reigate Priory were brilliant functions, and that by means of an artistic "souvenir program," which I had the pleasure to prepare and publish, we were able to provide a somewhat permanent record of the doings of a remarkable week, accompanied by portraits of leaders and views of the great buildings used.

"AGE OF CONSENT" LEGISLATION.

Dear Union Signal:—I learn from Colorado's Secretary of State that the new "Age of Consent" law in that state, intended to apply only to rape, has inadvertently forbidden marriage under eighteen years. "Not a bad thing to do" many will say, but it is not a good thing to have woman's first legislation accomplish even a good thing by mistake. Another fact also shows the need of more careful preparation for next year's campaigning on this subject.

One of the W. C. T. U. women of Delaware asks me to correct my statement that the age of consent is only seven years in Delaware. She has been deceived by the legislature's raising of the age in another and much less important law than that of rape, from which age of consent is always reckoned, and this despite my careful explanation of this very fact in The Union Signal. No doubt the legislature intended thus to deceive the women of the state. But the women of that and of every state must become so informed before another winter that they cannot be deceived. Yet another fact supports the argument for more thorough preparation. One of the purity superintendents of the W. C. T. U. showed in conversation with me that she did not understand the legal meaning of the "age of consent," which does not mean the "age of (proper) consent" but the "age of (possible) consent," that is, the age when consent has a legal existence that can be recognized, not in extenuation but only in palliation of the crime—recognized as changing the crime from rape to seduction. As a minor's consent to the disposal of property is null and void, so the consent of any minor, whether man or woman, in the higher matters of the person and of purity should be declared by law to be also null. The "age of consent" is no doubt a misleading term, and even age of protection which Miss Willard substitutes is not wholly accurate, as all ages are protected.

The laws of the nation and of the states on this whole question of impurity, having been made by men, should be first classified and exposed, and second unified and improved, by a strong committee of women, in the interest of mothers' sons as well as mothers' daughters. It is not a day too soon to organize the committee and divide up the great work of preparing a model law, to be approved first by the whole committee, then by the conference of purity superintendents that is to convene in Baltimore before the next convention of the N. W. C. T. U., then by the convention itself. The committee's report, with the model law appended, and also petitions in duplicate to Congress (which should enact it for the capital and the territories) and to the state legislature should be published in every newspaper in the land early in November, with the suggestion that the petitions be at once signed by individuals and indorsed by societies, and presented by influential committees to legislators while they are yet at home among their constituents, that legislation on this matter may be achieved in the leisure hours at the opening of the legislative bodies before questions of property are ready to monopolize the time.

Permit me to suggest that some one with an aptitude for law and for classification, with assistants, shall be commissioned to make a table, with the aid of some large law library, of all the laws relating to rape, seduction, prostitution, including the accomplices in these crimes, showing first, what is forbidden in each state and territory and the District of Columbia; and, second, what penalties are provided. Another person with assistants should prepare, by correspondence with police and court officials, a comparative table, to be combined with the foregoing, at last showing as far as possible, by samples at least, how these laws are enforced—the arrests, the convictions, the punishments, the pardons.

Having thus made a thorough diagnosis, a prescription for this pestilence that walketh in darkness may be intelligently made—one comprehensive law "to prevent and punish all sexual congress out of wedlock," which can be substituted in every state and in the laws of Congress for all the confused and inadequate laws now existing.

In nearly all the legislatures that met last winter this subject was up, but the discussions showed that the preparation of the public by information, education and agitation had not been sufficient to achieve the best results. It is perhaps no real loss that a better law failed in some cases, for "the better is a great enemy of the best."

One thing should be especially insisted upon, shown to be essential to effectiveness in such laws by an article in The Arena of June on Canadian age of consent laws, namely, that for all this class of crimes the punishment should include imprisonment. Fallen men and fallen women pay fines readily and regularly as a part of the cost of their sin, but the former, of ten persons of so-called respectability, would be greatly deterred by the chance of imprisonment as scene second in their wrong-doing. And in the case of the women, the choice of reformation or incarceration on an indeterminate sentence after second offense, would be a wholesome protection to society. Over the door of Sing Sing prison are the words, "The way of transgressors is hard." The laws of nature have so written, but not yet the laws of the states and the nation over the doors of the house of death.

A MISSION TOUR AT HOME.

Dear Union Signal:—Leaving home May 18, I have traveled 3,236 miles, having visited twenty-four towns in Indiana, Ohio, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Dakota and Manitoba; have spoken thirty-eight times, beside the work in two conventions, and have received three public receptions.

I have gone very slowly, for the most part, learning to know our women by face and name as well as "by heart," and have learned very much as to the status of the work and the conditions under which it is being done. The Lord hath given us a spirit "of love and of power and of a sound mind."

I have meant to make this a missionary tour. To encourage and strengthen our workers by the message from the courageous in a far off land, and to appeal to their faith and generosity in behalf of those who need our prayers and gifts in that land. I have wanted to impress the principle that a country brought up in the way it should go, "when it is old it will not depart from it," and show the necessity for a strong, definite organization of our lines of work wherever civilization is beginning.

It was a great privilege to visit "The Temple" and meet "at home" the officers, editors and others. I realized as never before what a stupendous monument this is to the patience and consecration of the founder and those who have upheld her hands. I saw, also, in this itinerancy the beautiful hall which Mr. Ridgeway, of La Porte, Ind., has "lent" rent free for headquarters of the W. C. T. U. I wish many other gentlemen were so mindful of our local unions.

We arrived at Wabash, Ind., just in time to see the delegates of the county L. T. L. convention separating for their homes and to accompany the state superintendent, Mrs. Straw, to North Manchester, where we had a very pleasant meeting.

Other places visited in Indiana in May and early in June were Goshen, Huntertown, Huntington and Hammond. We were sorry to have been too far away to accept the invitation from Monon union to speak there on Decoration Day. We think it very commendable that the unions should take advantage of all public holidays to have addresses and exercises suitable to the occasion presented. If this is done in connection with "whatever may be going on" we cannot help having auditors. Certainly a woman who has been absent from her native land so long as I must enjoy "cheering the eagle when he soars."

The fifteenth district convention of Ohio, held in the Presbyterian church of West Unity, June 5 and 6, was worthy of Ohio, and what more can be said? There was beautiful harmony of spirit and beautiful spiritual harmony. We were all sorry a heavy pressure of Christian work should prevent Miss Hattie Hughes, the faithful president for three years, from again accepting the office, but her successor is one of that noble Crusade band toward whom the eyes of our peaceful women warriors in all countries are turned to-day, as toward leaders and exemplars in the contest.

Thirty-two women, representing a membership of rather more than five hundred, made up the annual meeting of the Manitoba W. C. T. U. We went to Meepawa, and too much could not be said of the charming and hospitable manner in which we were entertained.

Mrs. McCurdy, county secretary of Minnesota, is one of our best in making appointments for speakers. Notwithstanding rainy weather and very warm, too, most of the time there were "good houses." One of our happiest visits was a beautiful summer Sunday spent in Lodi, Wisconsin. Wisconsin is a state "lovely for situation." The call seems to be coming for more work in the Northwest after the conference at Mountain Lake, where I think we shall get new inspiration for the contest.

Yours for activity,

ALICE R. PALMER.

A REFORMED "FOURTH."

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—People are getting somewhat awakened to the importance of reforming our Fourth of July and now I am glad to report to any who may not be aware of it that an organized movement has been started to work for that result and at least in one place, I know not how many more, our great national holiday has been celebrated in a peaceful and beautiful manner.

The Massachusetts branch of the floral emblem society inaugurated the movement at Winthrop, doing on a small scale as an object lesson what it is hoped may be done on a large scale throughout the land in the near future.

In studying the subject of enlarging the work I have been thinking that the school buildings should be made the centers of attraction and activity and the school children should be the trained participants in a grand and beautiful patriotic service.

The "Fourth" must always have its parades, and what could be more impressive than a great procession of school children with flags and banners and garlands of flowers, marching to the music of our national airs.

The flower play given at Winthrop would be a good opening exercise, and there is no end of artistic and musical talent capable of creating new and beautiful things. Here is a great opportunity for the development of a patriotic and peaceful spirit in the rising generation.

Let each and every one in his and her own way and place help to do away with the fire-cracker and torpedo, the tin horn and clanging bell, and substitute the sweet music of children's voices, the martial music of brass bands, and all the beauty that color and artistic arrangement can provide.

The "little red school-house" in the country and the great school buildings of the cities can all alike furnish place and opportunity for this new reform, and it will go farther than anything else to quiet the spirit of discord that has arisen between different factions and inculcate a spirit of loyalty to our public schools.

It is to be hoped that early in the year, when there is ample time for arrangement and execution, all over the land committees will be organized in the country districts and the city wards to further this new and promising movement.

WICKED VOTING.

DEAR EDITORS:—THE UNION SIGNAL is one of the papers that I read thoroughly and greatly enjoy. To my mind there is no subject discussed in THE SIGNAL of more importance than that of the responsibility of church members for saloon domination, and if you could only get these derelicts to read your facts and arguments, especially Mr. Woolley's magnificent addresses, the battle would be more than half won. Thousands of these old party voters are good men, who give liberally of time and money for the cause of Christ. It is true that their influence, even in their own families is neutralized by their lawlessness, for a man who will break the command, "Whether ye eat or drink, or whatever ye do, do all to the glory of God," in one particular, openly and persistently, will invariably do so in others. He will break the Sabbath by riding on the street or steam cars past a dozen other churches, that he may attend his favorite church, and he may there labor as usher, deacon or elder, in the most acceptable manner. He smokes because it quiets his nerves, he thinks, but really because he enjoys it. With tears he may bewail the fact that his boys, when they reach their teens not only fail of conversion, but prefer the theater or base ball to Sunday-school or church; for he is a good (blind) Christian. How to open these blind eyes is the question of the hour.

EZRA A. COOK.

Chicago, Ill.

DEAR CO-WORKERS:—A little pamphlet has fallen into my hands that has so much of helpfulness for young mothers in it—I mean the young mothers who have not been taught how to nurture the wee babies—that I want to mention it here. It is "How to Feed a Baby for Ten Cents a Day on Domestic Foods." It is written by a Chicago physician from a wide experience and published by the Chicago Daily News Fresh Air Fund. A postal card dropped to that address would ascertain at what price you could purchase a number for use in the department of mothers' meetings. Many a loving mother loses her child through simple ignorance of its needs and dangers, and the booklet in question tells in easiest terms how to avoid those diseases and difficulties that send so many little ones—especially in summer time—to a grave that need not have been.

Miss Margaret Wintringer, the state secretary of the Illinois Loyal Temperance Legion, sends this good plan for a method of forwarding the L. T. L. work in farming communities:

Get permission from the school directors to organize an L. T. L. in the district school, to meet the last hour of each Friday afternoon's session (which is usually devoted to general exercises). Appoint as superintendent the white-ribboner nearest the school. The teacher will welcome the innovation as a relief from preparing the Friday's program, and soon will be so interested and helpful that the superintendent will find her duties merely nominal. One country union in Illinois is supporting four such L. T. L's, and another three. It solves the problem of how to get the attendance of the children in rural districts.

A great many unions are "willing" to have Loyal Temperance Legions in their midst; all ought to have them; most can have them. But they will not spring up without planting, and after planting they will not grow without being nurtured. Miss Wintringer sends us news of the way in which two city girls "back up" L. T. L. work, and I am glad to pass the word along that it may be an inspiration to some one else.

What might not be done in every great city for the saloon tempted children, if we only had more white-ribboners with the consecration possessed by two dear young wage-earners, who amid the busy life in a Chicago office building, were led to think of this work? These two young women purchased the supplies with their own slender earnings, and secured the services of the district W. C. T. U. president, to organize the Home Guard L. T. L. in a West Side Free M. E. mission church. The result of the faithful year's work may be best told by the letter which lies before me, written by one of these dear young women: "The Chicago District Sunday-school convention of the Free Methodist church has a committee with me as chairman, consisting of one member from each church in the district. This committee is on Loyal Temperance Legion work. They knew I was working in this department, for after attending the services at the unveiling of the Willard Fountain, we took our L. T. L. to Melrose Park where this convention was in session. We bought lunches for all of them, and they marched over to the church with flag and banner. Upon request they sang, 'Saloons Must Go.' They also took part in the question drawer, and were called upon to answer questions that were put in the question drawer regarding our work. Altogether it was very interesting. All expenses of the day were paid by us, except the five cent car fare which each child paid." If other white-ribboners would follow this example, introducing the L. T. L. to their various church assemblies, I think there would be less disposition shown by these bodies to ignore the rights of the Legion, and crowd it to the wall in favor of the Junior societies.

A word comes from our Southern comrades in Louisiana outlining the summer situation—a condition duplicated in many localities. The prolonged and intense heat, the absence of so many workers who are "vacationing," the "beer on ice" attractions at the saloons—no worse than the "hot lunch free" of winter days—combine to make the temperance march a hard one, but more than ever needful. Much "active" work, as our correspondent says, must necessarily be suspended (such as meetings of various kinds), "but now is the time to keep in touch with the work through the means of the temperance literature of the organization." The only trouble in rowing with one oar is that one is apt to move in a circle, and thus slide down stream. But if we must, we must, so while old Sol stares at us so ardently let us so manage our one oar that we will hold our own, if we cannot do more.

"They also serve who only stand and wait!"

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

By faith the walls of Jericho fell down, after they were compassed about seven days.—Heb. 11:30.

The Temple Prayer Band is daily increasing. There are over fifty names entered on my book now. The letters sent by these dear sisters have been the means of encouraging my heart and strengthening my hands. And other noble hearts are answering their own prayers, by sending their gifts.

Abraham Lincoln's name is to be placed in Willard Hall! The second installment of money paid for this purpose, $36.50, has been received from Miss Mary Vose, Los Angeles, Cal. Miss Vose has been contemplating doing this patriotic deed for some time. What a happy thought it is, to commemorate the name of Lincoln in the Temperance Temple, for the great emancipator was also a warm advocate of temperance. Another honored name is to be inscribed there—John O. Wattles. This noble man lectured on temperance from 1835 until 1859. He was born in Connecticut, and died in Kansas in 1859. Most of his life was passed in Ohio, and it is the desire of Mrs. Wattles, who lives at Oberlin, Ohio, that his name be recorded on the Ohio tablet, she having forwarded $100 for that purpose. The late Rev. David McKee was an honorary member of the Harlan, Iowa, W. C. T. U. Mrs. McKee sends $100 to have her husband's name placed on the Iowa memorial tablet. And so, as they pass within the gates, we inscribe their names in gold on the beautiful marble walls of Willard Hall, that others following on may know of their faith and works. One hundred dollars comes from "a friend" for the purpose of having the Lumberton, N. J., W. C. T. U., inscribed on the New Jersey tablet. Mrs. Henry Ellsworth sends $50, which completes the $100 for the tablet in honor of her mother, Mrs. Almira E. Hurd, Rockford, Ill.

Eight thousand thirty-nine dollars has been received from Wheels up to July 1. This seems a goodly sum to raise in four months, from such a source, but it is not at all commensurate with what it should be. There should have been $50,000 at least received if all had taken hold half as heartily as a few have done. Hardly a person that filled a Wheel but has ordered more. They have found the work so easy it has been a pleasure rather than otherwise. The beautiful little picture of the Temple which each one secures that puts in a dime, has been a great means of educating people in regard to the work of the W. C. T. U. Then the premium that each one receives for getting a Wheel filled has given great pleasure and satisfaction. Besides the opportunity given for all to compete for the three prizes of $100, $50 and $25, to be paid January 1, to the three persons who fill the most Wheels from May 23 to January 1.

We find a good many Wheels lately are being lost in the mails, stolen without doubt. To guard against this we will have to ask our friends who send us but a single Wheel at a time to take the money out of it first and purchase a postal order and send by letter. The Wheel can be sent (as we desire the names on it) for one cent by post if it is not sealed, just tie the string about it. When several are sent at a time it is best to send them by express—as a great many are now doing.

HOW THE WHEELS ARE FILLED.

Mrs. T. C. Bailey, of Evanston, Ill., writes: "I took my Wheel with me when I went to market and brought it back filled, and then I thought I would try another and so I have sent in my ninth Wheel. I have made it a point not to ask white-ribboners, nor persons that any one else would be likely to go to. If the unions would only take hold how easy it would be." Mrs. Jennie B. Thompson, Tipton, Ia., sends four Wheels filled. She says the work was done by Mr. John Dorcas, an honorary member of the union, and an indefatigable worker in every good cause. He is especially interested in the Temple. One Wheel is filled by his children and another by his grandchildren.

At the annual state convention of the Wisconsin W. C. T. U., which occurred recently, the following appears among the "Plans of Work":

"That we express our hearty indorsement of the Temperance Temple, and in view of the generous offer of Mr. Marshall Field, of Chicago, we make a special effort this year to assist in raising the amount on which the gift is conditioned."

Mrs. Hanchett writes that the Winnebago county, Wis., W. C. T. U. also passed a strong resolution in favor of the county doing all it can to fill the Temple Wheels.

A NEW SONG OF SIXPENCE.

BY MRS. N. S. KITCHEL.

[Read at the spring convention of the Morris county, N. J., W. C. T. U., May, 1895.]

Sing a song of ways and means,
Nice good-natured man,
With an empty pocketbook,
Hits upon a plan.
Gets a paper and a pen,
Writes an application;
Gets it signed by twelve nice men
Of decent grade and station!
When the paper's opened,
'Tis clearly understood,
The whole thing is "conducive
To the public good."

Fellow buys his license,
Pays his money down;
Isn't that an easy way
Of lighting up a town?
Make the sidewalks wider,
Make 'em wide and straight;
Sometimes men come reeling
Homeward rather late—
Once were babies cuddled tight,
As though the love would smother;
Isn't this a pleasant sight
To set before a mother?

Sing a song of broken hearts,
Hearts that break for sorrow;
Eyes that look through blinding tears
For a better morrow.
When the polls are opened,
The votes and drink go down;
Isn't this a precious sight
To set before a town?

Sing a song of ships afloat,
Starry pennants wearing;
For a distant heathen port
See them seaward bearing.
Tracts and whisky casks aboard,
Rum and salvation;
'Tis a most consistent dish
Before a Christian nation.

Sing a song of woman's work,
Women's faith and prayers;
Four and twenty duties,
Four and twenty cares.
Girls with sunny faces,
Women with white hair;
Unions in the East and West,
Unions everywhere,
Working for a Christian cause,
Men that cause delaying,
Women with their ribbons white,
Hoping, trusting, praying.
When the Book is opened,
Where creed and act accord,
Won't this be a pleasant sight
To set before the Lord?

TRY OUR "OLD BOURBON."

BY MARY MAXLEY.

Yesterday while seated with my books and papers trying to steal a quiet hour from my domestic duties, the door-bell rang with such convulsive impatience that I quickly hurried out to see who was there. I was surprised when I opened the door to find no one. At my feet, however, lay a square, snowy white envelope. Opening it, I read: "Yourself and family are cordially invited to attend the opening reception of our new 'sample rooms.'" Then followed date, street and number. In one corner in very small script was written, "Try our 'Old Bourbon.'" The hot blood of resentment surged through my veins, and as I looked down at my little white ribbon, it seemed to me that it, too, was turning crimson with the indignation it felt at being brought into such close proximity with this invitation from Hades.

It is not enough that every public place must be smirched by filthy placards, but the sanctuary of our homes, our nation's very bulwark must be invaded, our door-ways and hall-ways used for their advertising purposes, and our fathers and sons inveigled out to these enticing places.

I felt thankful, as I consigned the polluting thing to the mercies of the devouring flames, that I, and not one of the twenty young men of our household had received this invitation. "Try our 'Old Bourbon.'" How long, oh, how long, shall the fair name of that beautiful county of "My old Kentucky home," bear the shame of her disgrace? I, too, can say from personal experience, "Try Old Bourbon." Try the beauty of her scenery if you are weary and careworn. Take an outing and spend a short time in this beautiful park that was laid out by God's hand. Try a day in her forests, under the protecting shadows of her great elms and oaks and see if you are not invigorated and strengthened. And as you behold the thousands of acres of undulating bluegrass, which seem like the waves of the ocean, you will forget the rush of business; your overtaxed mind will find its needed rest; your prostrated nerves will be restored. Try the warm-hearted hospitality of one of Old Bourbon's country homes and you will find that St. Paul's admonition, "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers" is remembered and practiced there to this very day, and while some of the "angels" to whom they mete out their bounty may prove to be fallen ones, yet the time honored fame of the hospitality of "Old Bourbon" is just as great now as in the pioneer days.

Try our "Old Bourbon"—the accursed product of the still? Had I the voice of the thunder and the trumpet of Gabriel I would cry out to all the inhabitants of the earth, "For God's sake, for your mother's sake, for your soul's sake, try not 'Old Bourbon.' Concealed within that sparkling amber cup is hidden a poison that is just as sure to do its deadly work as is the angel of death. Does not the Bible say, 'No drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of heaven'?"

A few years ago a party of tourists from Bourbon county, while at Ottawa, were taking dinner at the Queen's Hotel. At the same table were several Canadian gentlemen who had formed the acquaintance of the party. One of them whispered to the waiter to bring him a glass of "Old Bourbon." When he received it he turned to the beautiful woman at his side, and with the polished airs of a French Canadian, smilingly said: "Fair lady, I am going to drink to your health in true Kentucky style by drinking your own sparkling nectar, 'Old Bourbon.'" Instantly a pallor overspread her face, and regardless of the place and the observers, she caught the hand that held the uplifted glass and said: "I entreat you, if you desire to compliment me, taste not that glass of whisky, but drink to my health with pure water." In a husky voice she added: "My heart is filled with remorse and my very soul with disgust that everywhere I go I am reminded of the accursed brand that is placed upon my native home by those flaunting signs, 'Old Bourbon' and 'Pure Kentucky Whiskies.'"

"This," she continued, pointing to her little white-ribbon bow, "is the ensign of our anchor of trust that some day the grand old commonwealth may be cleansed and freed from this vile pollution. It may be a Herculean task, but 'if God be for us who can be against us?'"

On Kentucky Day at the World's Fair, a man, on one of the street cars, holding a morning paper in his hand said, addressing the occupants in general and no one in particular, "This is Kentucky Day and she will display in great profusion two of her famous products, her 'Old Bourbon' and her pretty women. Too bad she can not display her fine trotters, too." This remark was followed by a silly, rather sneering laugh, which, together with his flushed face and crimson nose, told that he was a liberal patron of "Old Bourbon." A modest little woman, seated just in front of him said quietly but firmly, "Sir, I am from Kentucky and I can assure you her daughters do not consider it complimentary to be classed with horses and whisky." The man wilted and throughout the rest of the ride seemed to be engrossed in the morning news.

Even the most casual observer cannot fail to know that Old Bourbon and her rival contemporaries have caused more sorrow and suffering in the world than all the other evils combined, destroyed more homes, sent more little children to their graves, robbed more wives of their husbands and sent more souls to hell. Yet the Christian voters, the men who hold the reins of our government, submit to all this. While they are discussing and agitating the questions of "Woman and the Ballot," "The Silver Bill," "The Tariff Bill," this radical cause of evil is allowed to go on unprohibited. You hear men say when urged to cast in their votes with the Prohibition party, "What is the use? My vote will be lost there." Do they ever stop to consider the homes that are lost, the lives that are lost, the souls that are lost because others think just as they do?

Major Premise.—That which is dependent upon a mental conception is ideal.

Minor Premise.—Value is dependent upon a mental conception.

Conclusion.—Therefore value is ideal.

Major Premise.—That which is ideal does not admit of a standard.

Minor Premise.—Value is an ideal thing.

Conclusion.—Therefore value does not admit of a standard.

"It is hardly correct to speak of a standard of value. The Constitution does not speak of it. It contemplates a standard for that which has gravity or extension, but value is an ideal thing. The coinage acts fix its unit as a dollar; but the gold or silver thing we call a dollar, is in no sense a standard of a dollar. It is a representative of it."

Major Premise.—That which must be received in payment of a debt is a standard of payment.

Minor Premise.—Money must be received in payment of a debt.

Conclusion.—Therefore money is a standard of payment.

Major Premise.—That which has a legally defined debt-paying value is a standard of payment.

Minor Premise.—Money has a legally defined debt-paying value.

Conclusion.—Therefore money is a standard of payment.

Major Premise.—That which has a value fixed and established by law cannot depreciate.

Minor Premise.—Money has a value fixed and established by law.

Conclusion.—Therefore money cannot depreciate.

Gold and silver bullion are money, or they are not money. If they are money they do not need the aid of the law.

The Supreme Court of the United States says: But gold and silver bullion need the aid of the law to make them money. Therefore gold and silver bullion are not money.

In support of the above conclusion we call attention to the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, in Parker vs. Davis and Knox vs. Lee, where the Court says:

The eagles coined after 1834 were not money until they were authorized by law, and had they been coined before without a law fixing their legal value, they could have no more paid a debt than uncoined bullion or cotton or wheat.

Major Premise.—When the seller offers to receive legal tender value for his property, and he is so paid by the buyer, the buyer has not violated any principle of right or equity.

Minor Premise.—In bargain and sale the seller offers to receive legal tender value for his property.

Conclusion.—Therefore, in bargain and sale, when the buyer pays the seller legal tender value for his property, the buyer has not violated any principle of right or equity.

The owner of the property may offer to trade commodity for commodity, which is known as barter and trade. He may offer it for sale, in which event he offers to receive in payment for his property its legal representative, or money, without any reference to the value of the metal in the representative. The law recognizes these distinctions and simply enforces them.

Money is a function of law which is used as a medium of exchange, a common term of comparison of value, a legal representative of value, and as a standard of payment, having no marketable or commercial value and its purchasing power varies inversely as its quality. The price of a commodity is its value in exchange expressed in money.

DO ALL THAT YOU CAN.

"I cannot do much," said a little star,
"To make this dark world bright;
My silvery beams cannot pierce far
Into the gloom of night;
Yet I am a part of God's great plan
And so I will do the best that I can."

"What can be the use," said a fleecy cloud,
"Of these few drops that I hold?
They will hardly bend the lily proud
If caught in her chalice of gold;
But I, too, am part of God's great plan,
So my treasures I'll give as well as I can."

A child went merrily out to play,
But a thought, like a silver thread,
Kept winding in and out all day
Through the happy, golden head—
"Mother said: 'Darling, do all that you can,
For you are a part of God's great plan.'"

She knew no more than the twinkling star,
Or the cloud with its raincup full,
How, why or for what all strange things are.
She was only a child at school,
But she thought: "'Tis a part of God's great plan
That even I should do all that I can."

So she helped another child along,
When the way was rough to his feet,
And she sang from her heart a little song
That we all thought wondrous sweet;
And her father—a weary, toil-worn man—
Said: "I, too, will do the best that I can."

A LITTLE GIRL'S ADVICE.

I am but a little girl,
Very small and weak;
But I'm going now to try
One small piece to speak.

Just a little tiny verse,
Maybe they are two—
Anyway I promise this:
I won't tire you.

This is what I have to say,
Do the thing that's right;
That which you believe to be Pleasing in God's sight.

Leave results to Him, He knows
What is wise and best;
Do your duty, do it now,
Trust Him for the rest.

STORY OF A PENNY.

BY MABEL L. SUDDUTH.

I am dull, soiled and marred by the use I have received from the many hands through which I have passed, though not to my discredit, since my age will testify to years of usefulness and wear. I was once fresh and new, and as bright and shining as gold.

My history is varied. Many are the scenes which I have witnessed in my journey to and fro from the palace of the rich and hovel of the poor.

One day while I was resting very comfortably with my companions in security at the bank, I was taken from my resting place and given to a lady, who put me in a very beautiful purse. I had not been in my new home very long before I began to explore my surroundings. As a result I found that my companions were many in number, and much larger and more valuable than I.

We soon rolled away in a handsome carriage on our shopping tour, and after several hours, passing from store to store, some of my companions leaving me, we drove to an elegant house, which was to be my home for a time. Every day we took a ride in the beautiful carriage in company with our owner and her little daughter, of whom we were all very fond.

On some of these trips some of my companions were taken away, new ones filling their places and in this way I made a great many friends.

I had been very happy in this beautiful home, until one day I overheard my owner and her little daughter talking of missions and the good the home missionaries were doing. I was very much interested, for somehow it seemed to me that I was to be concerned in the matter as the subject of money came up several times in their talk. I had spent many restful and delightful hours in that beautiful home and had begun to wonder when it would be my turn to be sent out on my mission, for everything and every one has a mission.

At last the day arrived when I could begin my work in the world. My owner's little daughter came to the drawer where I was, and took me from the purse. I was very anxious to know what she would do with me, but she did not keep me in suspense very long for she dropped me into a little box with the words "for home missions" written on it.

I was then satisfied for I knew, although I was only a little penny, I would do good to some one. That was the last time I saw the little girl, for I was soon taken away from her home and put in a large safe where I stayed for nearly a year. At last I was taken from there and wrapped up in a piece of paper with nine other pennies.

We ten went to make up the fund for home missions. I was then sent to a school for the freedmen in the South.

The journey was very long and tiresome, for I had always lived in New York and was not used to traveling, but finally we arrived at a pretty little village in Tennessee, where there was a school for the freedmen.

The scholars in this school were girls from the age of six to twelve, and the custom of the school was to give each scholar a penny a week as her spending money. The pupils always told one week what they had done with the penny of the week before.

I had the good luck to be given to the oldest girl in the school. This school was only a day school, and as soon as the session was over I, with my new mistress, walked proudly home. My new friend was very thoughtful on the way home, and I think she had me as the subject of her thought, for she held me very tight as if she thought I would run away.

The new home to which she took me was very different from the one in which I had lived so happily during my stay in New York. It was only a small log cabin very clean and neat, but showed that the family were very poor. As soon as my new mistress opened the door two little girls ran to meet her and asked her what she was going to do with her penny. When she did not answer they begged for candy and many other things. My owner made no promises but left the house and went in the direction of town, still holding me fast in her hand.

We stopped at a building that was called a bank. My owner hesitated at the door trying to decide what to do, but at last she went up to one of the windows and asked the man there if he would let her deposit money in the bank. She told him she would only have a penny a week to put in, but nevertheless the man was perfectly willing, and so I was put in the bank as the beginning of that girl's account there.

I soon found myself with a great many new friends, and hope I may stay here in this quiet place long enough to get rested up before I start out again on another mission.

THE "LETS" OF LIFE.

There were two little sisters at the house whom nobody could see without loving, for they were always so happy together. They had the same books and the same playthings, but never a quarrel sprang up between them—no cross words, no pouts, no slaps, no running away in a pet. On the green before the door, trundling hoop, playing with Rover, helping mother, they were always the same sweet-tempered little girls.

"You never seem to quarrel," said I to them one day. "How is it that you are always so happy together?"

They looked up, and the older answered: "Oh, you know, Addie lets me, and I let Addie."

I thought a moment.

"Ah, that is it," I said; "she lets you, and you let her: that's it!"

Did you ever think what a cause of discord not "letting" is among children?

Even now, while I have been writing, a great crying was heard under the window. I looked out.

"Gerty, what is the matter?"

"Mary won't let me have her ball," screamed Gerty.

"Well, Gerty wouldn't lend me her pencil in school," cried Mary, "and I don't want she should have my ball."

"Fie! fie! is that the way sisters should treat each other?"

"She shan't have my pencil," muttered Gerty; "she'll only lose it."

"And you'll only lose my ball," retorted Mary, "and I shan't let you have it."

A disobliging spirit begets a great deal of quareling.

These little girls, Addie and her sister, have got the true secret of good manners. Addie lets Rose, and Rose lets Addie. They are yielding, kind, unselfish, and always ready to oblige each other. Neither wishes to have her own way at the expense of the other. And are they not happy? Oh, yes! And do you not love them already?—Lutheran Observer.

TEACHERS DEFY THE LAW.

The victory for scientific temperance instruction won in the state of New York through the efforts of Mrs. Hunt and her coadjutors has evoked protest on the part of the state teachers' association, which is, to say the least, remarkable. At their convention in Syracuse last month the teachers of the empire state—represented by upward of one thousand men and women—unanimously denounced the temperance education bill as "an insult to the teachers of the state and a menace to the principles of free school teaching," and advised "all teachers and trustees to follow the plan of teaching physiology heretofore pursued until the next legislature shall have an opportunity to repeal the present law."

Now the law referred to is that known as the Ainsworth bill and is an act to amend the temperance education law enacted in 1884. This amendment, which was passed by both houses without a dissenting voice, provides that the study of physiology and hygiene with special reference to the nature and effects of alcohol and other narcotics on the human system shall be taken up as thoroughly as any other branch in the school course. It designates the minimum time to be devoted to the study each year, and is otherwise an improvement on the old law.

As Governor Morton says in his answers to objections, "The bill makes no change in the subject to be taught, but fixes the time during which this study shall be pursued." The governor also thus pertinently points out the reason why the bill commanded universal legislative consent, and received executive approval: "The fact that the legislatures of forty-one states, including our own, and the Congress of the United States have already passed laws providing for instruction in the subjects indicated in this bill shows that it is supported by a widespread public sentiment."

As the amendment simply reinforces the old law and "makes easier the work of the teacher without increasing the amount of study," it is not easy to understand the teachers' vigorous protest. It is difficult to see what good reason leading educators can have in withholding knowledge from the future citizen which contributes to the well-being of the individual and of society and of the nation. When we read that Mrs. Hunt was "backed by Dr. John Hall, Dr. C. L. Thompson and leading representatives of the different churches" and "opposed by Bishop Potter, President Seth Low, of Columbia College, the state superintendent of public instruction and all the leading liquor men of the city," we naturally wonder if these last named gentlemen really feel comfortable in the company in which they find themselves.

But surprising as it may be to find New York educators uniting with the liquor men to defeat a proposed temperance law, it is still more astonishing—the law having passed—to find the teachers of the state openly recommending its violation! It is hardly possible that these teachers comprehend the significance of their action; they surely do not realize the attitude in which it places them as citizens of the United States!

If there is one place above all others in this country of ours where the people expect a proper regard for law and order to be inculcated, it is in our public schools. We hear much about cultivating patriotism in American schools. But of what avail to float our country's flag over the school-house and offer prizes for patriotic essays when the teachers themselves in convention assembled openly and unblushingly combine to disregard law, and to trail its majesty in the dust?

There is a principle involved here which is far-reaching. No man or woman or organization, which countenances disrespect of law in any particular, can consistently denounce Tammany or any individual or organized expression of lawlessness. To say, "We will not obey this law because we, the minority, do not approve of it," is anarchy pure and simple, whether emanating from a teachers' association or from a band of red-handed desperadoes. White-ribboners, much as they hate the liquor business, do not "advise" lawless methods of getting rid of it. Saloon-keepers and gamblers themselves, whatever they may do behind "closed doors," do not venture publicly to advise their following to ignore the law of the land. We have the highest possible opinion for the public school teacher. We believe there is no more honorable and self-sacrificing individual in our Republic, but we deplore this defiant attitude of the Empire pedagogues and appeal to them for a reconsideration of their unwarrantable action.

"DO EVERYTHING."

A book that will be warmly welcomed by W. C. T. U. women the world over is Miss Willard's "Do Everything: A Handbook for World's White-Ribboners," recently issued by the White Ribbon Publishing Company, London, England, and on sale by the W. T. P. A., Chicago. It is a publication which will meet a general demand among our workers; one which even in this day when "of making books there is no end" may be truthfully said to "fill a long felt want."

It contains instruction and information upon just such points as white-ribboners, and especially new workers, are asking questions. Inquiries are constantly coming to headquarters for literature that outlines the history and purposes of our organization, especially something touching the co-relation of its different branches of work and the raison d' être of its "do everything policy."

Women who are to present our work before W. C. T. U. conventions and other public gatherings write to us for "helps" in preparing papers, and not unfrequently, to the amusement of the recipient of such requests, some zealous sister, anxious that the all-important subject should be properly presented, and distrustful of her own ability, seems to consider it one of the manifold duties of the editors to write the paper for her, and "oblige by sending promptly." To all such this handbook will come as a godsend. With this valuable help at hand, and aided by her own native wit and enthusiasm, no white-ribboner need hesitate to present the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union to influential bodies in conventions assembled or to the general public through the press, whenever it falls to her lot to do so. With this authoritative and suggestive little volume to aid her she may reply satisfactorily to all cavilers, within or without, concerning the much criticised "Do Everything" system of the W. C. T. U.

In "Do Everything" our World's president sets forth the declaration of principles and the purposes of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union; traces the history of the white-ribbon movement from Crusade days to its present magnificent proportions and world-wide activities, culminating in the immense Polyglot Petition now started on its significant journey round the globe; tells "how to conduct a public meeting" and "how to carry on a local union"; outlines the aims and methods of the World's department work, showing through all that the development of the "Do Everything" policy is the result of the conviction that "the temperance reform lies at the foundation of all reforms."

Indeed, any one familiar with the twenty-one years of W. C. T. U. history (and we should make as many people as possible familiar with it) comes naturally to the conclusion that as Miss Willard says in introducing this book, "The 'Do Everything' policy was not of our choosing, but is an evolution as inevitable as any traced by the naturalist or described by the historian"; also, "Everything is not in the temperance reform, but the temperance reform should be in everything," and "that every question of practical philanthropy or reform has its temperance aspect, and with that we are to deal."

Twenty pages are devoted to a "White-Ribbon Question Box," which containing as it does a fund of information upon numerous points of intense practical interest to the W. C. T. U. worker, is one of the most helpful features of this very handy handbook.

There is a chapter of "General Suggestions" and another on "How to conduct a convention." And what woman is there whose training and experience fits her to speak with more authority upon these topics than our World's President?

In summing up Miss Willard points out those characteristics of the W. C. T. U. which in her opinion have contributed most (humanly speaking) to the success of the organization, and indicates some indirect results of this organized work which have promoted in no small degree the development of woman herself.

The appendix to this book is not the least of its useful features. It gives, among other things, instructions for organizing a union; the constitution of the World's W. C. T. U., constitution for a National, a local and a Y union and forms of petitions. In fact when once a white-ribboner has become accustomed to refer to this handbook she will wonder how she ever did without it.

No W. C. T. U. worker will hereafter be fully equipped without "Do Everything." It is a paper covered volume of 191 pages and its price is, in the United States and Canada, twenty-five cents; in all other countries an English shilling. It is dedicated to our round-the-world missionaries and the motto on its title page is "The joy of life is doing good according to a plan."

A RETROSPECT.

It is well known that a preliminary committee for the purpose of organizing the Ohio Crusade into a National W. C. T. U. was formed at Chautauqua in August, 1874, by Mrs. Jane Fowler Willing and Mrs. Emily Huntington Miller. Eighteen states responded to this call, and the number of delegates was about one hundred and fifty. A large majority of those present were Crusaders from Ohio. Except the name of our President, there are but two names on the list of officers there chosen that still remain with us, and those are Mother Thompson and Mother Wallace. Five have died, and two have become "non-partisans" out of a total of sixteen on the list; many of the vice-presidents were elderly women, and thus for different reasons founded in the nature of things we have very few remaining who were with us at the first. Of the original committee of twelve organized at Chautauqua, nearly one-half are known to have departed to a better world.

That first convention made no allusion to the prohibition of the liquor traffic; in the use of technical terms the good women felt that they must be cautious and conservative, but in the preamble of the constitution they builded better than they knew, for they declared that they "believed it had become their duty under the providence of God to unite their efforts for its extinction," and many of us think that it would have been better if from the first the central word of all our nomenclature in relation to the liquor traffic had been abolition. Since those glad days of consecration we have marched by a long and narrow way, through a difficult country, building the road as we advanced, fording the streams, and sometimes we have traversed the desert of contention and the jungles of defeat. Some of us have been gibbetted at the crossroads of public opinion, and all have been wounded by the hurtling arrows from the enemies' camp and the galling cross-fire of harsh criticism from our own; but we have seen great victories, camped on beautiful heights, refreshed ourselves at many a pure spring, and rejoiced always in the wide and open sky of an unfailing faith. We have seen the movement that drew together a handful in Cleveland send out its roots and branches until it is the women's banyan tree whose pleasant shelter is in all nations. The watch-words and battle-cries, the banners and oriflammes of the white-ribbon host are equally well known among the temperance people of all nations. Home protection is a rallying call beloved in the best homes of the world. To forewarn and forearm childhood and youth; to bring the arrest of thought to voters and governmental leaders; to lift the standard of a white life for two and arm the home guards for the fray, is the unified purpose of those fit survivals who plead and pray and work in the cause of God and Home and Humanity.

THE UNIVERSAL SOLVENT.

English is now the language of well-nigh one-half the world's progressive peoples and they buy three-fifths of all the railway tickets. Christian books are largely written in our native tongue. The balance of literature relating to discovery and invention belongs to us; in works of science we are at the fore; and no writers can compete with us in novels of the home, hymns of the sanctuary and poems of the heart. The greatest Empire and the foremost Republic of the globe are English-speaking nations. The two countries in which the largest proportion of the people vote are ours; the great human questions of temperance and labor, woman and purity, freedom and peace have been cradled at our firesides and guided by our reformers and crystallized in law by our statesmen. They are uppermost in the people's purposes, alike in America and England, Australia and Canada, South Africa and Scotland.

A hundred and nineteen years ago the newer England declared that "taxation without representation is tyranny," and in that declaration stoutly maintained that newer England "fired the shot heard round the world."

But times have changed; Anglo-Saxon is the world's blood royal—and the greatest Republic and greatest Empire are both "born in the purple," and begin to realize that "blood is thicker than water." But for the wallowing of waves our very fields would meet and mingle, our forests wave under the wind together and our towns and cities abut upon each other.

Ours is the oneness of nature and history, language and purpose that "many waters cannot drown." The ultimate fibre that is in us had a common origin; the dust on our highways dates back to Hastings and Marston Moor; the Lord's Prayer is our mutual Magna Charta; our household poets and the songs that sweeten the sacred life of home are all the same. Why should we not clasp hands for that "Federation" that the laureate saw, for "hearts are near though hands are far?" Let not the unfriendly cables of Renter and Dalziel deceive us. That first message under the sea was the true one: "What hath God wrought?" And that other, which by our united love and faith may yet be translated into deeds: "Peace on earth good-will to men."

The greatest of American essayists, Ralph Waldo Emerson, says that "civilization is the influence of good women." Perhaps their growing influence, as testified by the great meetings held so recently in London, is a prophecy of that universal solvent for the nations—a federation for the people to whom English is the native tongue.

Women seem to catch the international spirit more readily than men. Doubtless this is because they have less personal interest to hold them from deeds of fraternity. The traditions, history and ambition of men are interwoven with "war's alarms." The acquisition of territory, the restrictions of the tariff, the personal element in the affairs of commerce. For this very reason it is the solemn duty, as it should be the highest pleasure of good women in every clime, to invest their gifts and work for the unification of nations having a common origin, a common faith and a common purpose, so to live and love that every soul may know he has "a God in heaven and a fatherland on earth."

THE LATHRAP FUND.

It is important that we should bestir ourselves to increase this fund, the object of which is to develop white-ribbon women among the colored people. Perhaps some of our English friends will attest their desire to help us in a difficult emergency, for we have always wished to work in this cause, but those who do so cannot, like most of our speakers and organizers, hope to receive any such returns from collections as would enable them to strike out for themselves; they must be supported, and where this support is to come from is the question. Nothing but a fund from which expenses can be met will make their work possible.

Another appeal is to those good friends who have manifested so deep an interest in this branch of our Christian Endeavor to send us the money that will enable us to pay the expenses of our gifted and earnest-hearted Mrs. Thurman as she goes forward in her work. She has already successfully organized several unions in Chicago, although at first she encountered much opposition, owing to the misrepresentations that had been freely made in quarters where we had occasion to hope for treatment more in accordance with justice and fair play. There is no test so trustworthy of the interest that one feels in any race as the expenditure of money that one makes in the interest of that race. The following letter is from Mrs. Marriage Allen, who has worked for years among colored people, and who is a thoroughly loyal and devoted Christian woman:

Dear Mrs. Thurman:—I am very glad to have made your acquaintance, and trust you may be much used of the Lord on your return to America. I feel so much may be done among your people, especially in the Southern states. I wish you could visit them and bring before them gospel temperance, social purity and all those high, ennobling principles which will build up true Christian character and make happy homes. I spent seven winters in the South, and know something of their difficulties, and that as a whole they are a God-fearing people, but they need just that help and inspiration towards a higher standard of Christian living which I believe you could, with God's blessing, bring before them.

If £100 can be obtained I shall be pleased to contribute £10, and can give you introductions to colored ministers and teachers on whose assistance you can rely, for with their help we obtained over five thousand signatures in two years to the total abstinence pledge, and established Bible bands and gospel temperance societies. This work needs following up, as well as fresh ground being broken.

Wishing you God speed and praying that means may be forthcoming for this work, I am,

Yours sincerely,

Mary A. Marriage Allen.

We hope this letter will stir the hearts of good people who have money to such a degree that they will write to our treasurer, Mrs. Helen M. Barker, and state what amount they are prepared to give to keep Mrs. Thurman going. We might add that a noble-hearted young woman in Providence, R. I., contributed the money that enabled Mrs. Thurman to undertake the work in Chicago, and just as fast as the means are placed in her hands she will go forward forming white ribbon groups both north and south. "He gives twice who gives quickly" in this sacred cause.

A writer in a recent number of The Woman's Column says that the people who want to let woman's suffrage wait until we get the temperance issue settled are like the man who was hurrying, in company with a woman, to a sick friend. The woman fell down and the man turned around and called out to her, "For God's sake, madam, don't wait to get up but hurry right along!" This shoe does not fit the Woman's Christian Temperance Union as its enemies will testify, for our organization has been carrying on the suffrage work these many years with an efficiency which has aroused the wrath of conservatives. Rightly understood, we have no quarrel with the above statement from The Column, or with the illustration. But we have good and sufficient reason to think that it is not "rightly understood" by some, but that through confusion of ideas all temperance workers are sometimes included in the category with the over anxious man quoted. We know woman's suffragists who make quite as serious a mistake in the opposite extreme. There are those who would have all other reforms wait for suffrage. To our minds, this is very like insisting that a child shall make no attempt to move around the room until it has learned to walk. The objections to this method are many and obvious; chief among them being that the average child would never learn to walk. We do not expect final victory without the ballot, but we are not sorry that we have agitated the temperance question until total abstinence has become recognized as the correct principle both morally and scientifically. We see no cause to regret that we have put compulsory temperance instruction into the public schools of all our land with the exception of those in two states. Nor do we consider the time wasted in which we have accomplished numberless other practical reforms which have made the temperance cause leap forward many years. If we have not waited to "get up" we have nevertheless succeeded in crawling with so much effect that we have made ourselves more feared and hated by the liquor dealers, on their own statement, than even the voting members of the Christian churches. In addition to this, we have done some most effectual training of our women, fitting them for the various duties of citizenship when all of its rights, privileges and responsibilities shall devolve upon them. Last and greatest, we have accomplished what the leaders of the suffrage associations have admitted that they failed to accomplish after years of strenuous effort, we have "induced women, in large numbers, to labor with enthusiasm for their own emancipation." What women would not do when their own "emancipation," considered in the abstract, seemed to be the sole issue, they have done when they saw in that emancipation their only chance to protect their homes and dear ones from the licensed evils of society.

Miss Willard writes us that the "folly" of the notice about her marriage impressed her so strongly that she felt it unnecessary and undignified to make any reply. She was sure that all sensible people would know it was a press canard. But as it keeps coming up she hereby authorizes us to say that it is teetotally false, root and branch, first and last, now and ever more, and she asks us to print the last paragraph of her annual address, which, while it shows the sacred and tender regard she has always cherished towards marriage and the home, is sufficiently conclusive concerning her personal history and future:

For to me who have no home, and never shall have in this world, the fullness of the Gospel bubbles up from the brimming chalice of the homes of other women the wide world through. They are life's living springs that turn the arid waste to fragrant meadow land. And I believe the mother-heart was given to poor humanity for purposes of wider blessing than we have dreamed as yet. It is deep and changeless as the tides of the sea, and no heart beats quite so close to God's as hers who through the sacrament of pain and danger alone can come into her kingdom, and whose face is the first one ever mirrored in the celestial eyes of a little child. And we "new women," "progressive women," "radical women," if so it please any to call us, are devoted altogether to that ideal home which shall equalize the twain whom God hath joined together, and so empower the mother-heart, that it may work its sacred will in winning the stormy heart of man into the safe and blessed harbor where the holiest experiences that life can know shall mellow and exalt the threefold nature which is yet one in the unity of the spirit and the bond of peace-husband, and wife and child.

While we are about it, we may as well reiterate that Miss Willard and Lady Henry Somerset have nothing whatever to do with the "Woman's Bible"; and thirdly, the Associated Press telegram stating that Miss Willard declared in her address (when Miss Balgarnie accused her of not taking the right attitude towards the lynching controversy) that "she regretted that Miss Wells had stirred up the black blood" was totally untrne. She said nothing about the black blood whatever. Indeed, she is of the opinion that all blood is of very similar color, unless it be "bad blood," and that is the phrase she used, viz., that Miss Wells, without wrong intention but from lack of judgment, had stirred up bad blood and alienated those who were really friends of the cause she advocated.

Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates and men decay;
Princes and lords may flourish or may fade,
A breath can make them as a breath has made;
But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
When once destroyed, can never be supplied.

We have had the Christianity of sentiment, of theology, of ecclesiasticism, but this age witnesses once more the rejuvenation that can only come under the Christianity of conduct.

All men think all men older but themselves. This is just as true as the well-known saying that all men think all men mortal but themselves, and is founded on precisely the same principle.

All that portion of their servants' weekly duties which is necessary for the well being of their employers, and for the rational enjoyment of their lives, should be done on Sunday by those members of the household who have spent the week largely in idleness or in pleasure, or if in work, in work of a quite different character from that of their servants. In doing this work, in helping each other, in sharing among themselves the various household occupations which during all the week have been undertaken by others, and in doing all this in order that those others may enjoy the full and unbroken rest which their six days' continuous labor requires and deserves, each member of the family will be doing deeds of self-sacrifice and of charity (in however small a degree) and such deeds do not constitute the "work" which is so strictly forbidden on the Sabbath day.

However we may try to bring forward those who with undoubted talent and honest effort have demonstrated that they possess unusual power, it still remains true that the head of any animal is the portion most observed, and we cannot, in the nature of the case, make this otherwise. In like manner the head of any association is sure to be the most observed. It is his misfortune rather than his fault, and may be his good fortune or calamity according to the spirit in which he meets the destiny thus meted out to him.

The burning bush that Moses saw has been brought nigh to us by the latest discoveries of scientific men. They find that light, heat and electricity are methods of motion, manifestations of force by whose correlations perpetual changes pass before our eyes, as yet but little understood, though our dim apprehension appears to perceive that by their action the universe is itself the burning bush of God, the radiant energy of Him whose centre is everywhere and whose circumference nowhere. There is a game which has been played for untold ages, every man and woman of us being one of the two players in a game of his or her own. The chessboard is the world, the pieces are the phenomena of the universe, the rules of the game are what we call the laws of nature. The player on the other side is hidden from us. We know that his play is always fair, just and patient. But also we know, to our cost, that he never overlooks a mistake or makes the smallest allowance for ignorance. To the man who plays well the highest stakes are paid, with that sort of overflowing generosity with which the strong delights in strength. And one who plays ill is checkmated—without haste, but without remorse. My metaphor will remind some of you of the picture in which Retzsch has depicted Satan playing at chess with man for his soul. Substitute for the mocking fiend in that picture a calm, strong angel who is playing for love, as we say, and would rather lose than win—and I should accept it as an image of human life.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR ECHOES.

It is much to say but it is true, that never were so many Christians together, and never was there so representative a gathering as at the Christian Endeavor convention, Boston, 1895. There were 56,285 delegates, representing seventeen nations, and a constituency of 2,473,740—a city, as computed, the size of New York and Baltimore. There are Christian Endeavor societies everywhere—almost. Not only in churches, but in prisons, asylums, forts, mission stations, etc., and also among traveling men. There are good citizenship activities, also missionary; and lively notes of reform. It augurs well for the temperance cause that temperance sentiments were applauded to the echo. John G. Woolley is a favorite and his scathing arraignment of the liquor traffic—or more truly the church and the government that harbor it—aroused enthusiasm most intense. "God bless John G. Woolley" was heard again and again from the hundreds who could not get near enough to thank him in person for his brave and fearless words. The tribute to the W. C. T. U. by our United States Congressman, Hon. Elijah Morse, was received with great favor. His allusions to the Polyglot Petition, to the champion leaders, English and American, and finally to Mary A. Livermore, aroused a remarkable enthusiasm. The latter is always finding out that nowhere is she more truly appreciated than on her native heath.

And not only temperance reform, but sentiments of equality in the promotion of good citizenship were received with equal heartiness, especially the answer from the Colorado delegation, "give the women the ballot as we have done in Colorado and you will be sure of good citizenship"—a response that was greeted with a storm of applause.

The church of the future will include the temperance pledge, will banish alcohol from the communion table, and will be enlisted in both soul-saving and soul-preserving Christianity. For once a convention has assembled too good for the saloons to profit by, but not too religious to ignore great and pressing reforms. A part of its formula runs after this fashion: "Christian Endeavor stands for Christian citizenship. It is forever opposed to the saloon, the gambling den, the brothel, and every like iniquity. It stands for temperance, for law and order, for Sabbath keeping and for a pure political atmosphere. It stands for the oppressed, and petitions the Queen of England that the wrongs of poor Armenia may have redress." And fifty thousand people, young men and women say, Amen! And the best thing about it is, they said it together. They represent, however fully they may realize it, the ideal effort in Christian reform work. The daily papers have been alive to the meaning of this great Endeavor movement, so that these instruments have, for one week anyway, subserved the highest interests of Christianity. The Transcript felt "unable to express with ordinary restraint the value of the visit to Boston of the Christian Endeavor body." Boston is nothing if not critical, but "the revelation of what the great mass of the plain and genuine American people are by these splendid types is an education in good citizenship." And, let it be said quietly, these choice specimens were largely women, ten to one! The Herald left nothing undone, or perhaps I should say unwritten, of the doings of this great army. Unlike most armies, all admitted that "the presence of this one raised the tone of manners and morals by their presence and by their contact." If all the good sentiment and applause are crystallized into towns and communities, every good cause is sure to be advanced and the influence felt to the utmost parts of the earth. In going up and down this earth, it is not altogether exceptional to find uncounted forces. If we are going to be able to reckon on this army of the Lord, and we are, how much nearer the victory!

There is another side to a mammoth convention, and the following illustrates: "July 10," says one, "five delegates came to our home at 11:30 p. m. From that time (to July 19) I have not seen my bed earlier than 10:30. Once I finished washing dishes at 11:30; again home at 11:45; again up until 1:30 a. m., and always up in the morning at 5:30. This is the first time I have been alone for five minutes." These statements of dissipation included no sort of complaint, as this was added: "It does not seem possible that a week ago these people whom I have learned to love so dearly were entire strangers. They are just as nice as they can be." The hygienic reformer wonders if results of great gatherings may not be greatly militated by the late hours, the excitement, the mental and nervous strain.

LOCAL NOTES.

Our Massachusetts president, Mrs. Fessenden, spent a week in July conducting an hour each day at the school of methods, Lexington, Ky. She writes of the cordial greeting received, of the success of the meetings, and of brief visits before and after with the beloved mother at College Hill, Ohio.

The state annual convention will be held in the Tabernacle church, Salem, October 1, 2, 3. Among speakers expected is Miss E. U. Yates, National lecturer in the franchise department; also a delegate to the World's Convention, London, about which some personal word is anticipated.

The "visitations" inaugurated last year in the counties have been continued, and, as a result, the unions are kept in closer touch with the work.

The Massachusetts unions propose to assist Mrs. Charpiot who has in charge the Home for Intemperate Women. Arrangements are making for a fair to be held next December, and a wide response is hoped for both from organizations and churches for this most deserving institution.

The state has been fortunate in securing, among new superintendents, Mrs. Mary G. Stuckenberg, of Cambridge for the department of labor. Her work in Berlin is well known, and it is a source of general rejoicing that we have her again in this country. Mrs. Helen G. Potter has the department of physiculture, a noted elocutionist, who greatly entertained the World's Convention by her impersonations. Mrs. Marion A. McBride is a leader in the realm of domestic science, and Miss Lettie S. Bigelow in the franchise department.

The riot in East Boston because native born citizens carried "The Little Red School House" in a procession, and tried to show their loyalty to the Bible, the American flag and the public school, still figures in municipal affairs. It was an American procession and a Roman Catholic mob. The exhibition of the school-house was the occasion of the riot and excited special animosity. The other day an alderman occupied the time of the council in a long speech against such exhibitions—such loss of self-respect. It would have been different had it been a saloon, although that is equally an American institution.

DISTRICT CONVENTION.

The convention of the sixth district was held at Ludlow, by far the best and with the best attendance they have ever held, and they feel the work has received new strength and that the workers have been drawn much closer together.

The ministers of the different denominations attended the convention and manifested great interest in the work (which is new in Ludlow), helping in every way to nourish the good seed sown by Mrs. Skelton. The reports from the unions were good and encouraging. One of the resolutions adopted condemning "Hires' Root Beer," opened the eyes of some of the members, who had considered it a temperance drink. In the evening, the Presbyterian church (where the convention was held) was crowded to the doors with a very attentive audience, to hear an eloquent and stirring address by Mrs. Frances E. Beauchamp, of Lexington.

SCHOOL OF METHODS.

The state school of methods held in connection with the Lexington Chautauqua, has just closed the most successful meeting in its history. Our own energetic and enthusiastic Mrs. Beauchamp, is superintendent of this department, and always has some competent person to assist her.

For two years we had Miss Mary Allen West, whom to know was to love. Then that other devoted white-ribboner, Mrs. Mary Woodbridge, charmed and helped us for two years. Mrs. Beauchamp was fortunate this year in the selection of Mrs. Susan Fessenden, president of Massachusetts W. C. T. U., thoroughly acquainted with the work in all its departments, and a woman of strong common sense and adaptability, she attracted many not white-ribboners to the meetings, and made a deep impression on people outside of our temperance host. She possesses, in an eminent degree, that quality so necessary to all public speakers, clearness. The parliamentary drill was particularly fine, and so appreciated she was asked by the Woman's Club to repeat it.

On Wednesday, July 10, a convocation of temperance workers was held. The subject for discussion, "What to do, and How to do it," brought forth responses from a number of both men and women, and the usual diversity of opinion. The speeches were limited to three minutes.

It was with a feeling of great regret we saw the school of methods close and Mrs. Beauchamp go to Alabama to conduct one there, Mrs. Fessenden returning home. But we hope we shall have her with us again next year.

IDAHO.

ALL ALONG THE LINE.

The Canyon county W. C. T. U. met in annual session June 13 at Middleton, with Mrs. Sarah Mitchell, of Parma, presiding and Miss Mary Gipson, of Caldwell, secretary. A cordial address of welcome was delivered by Mrs. Hadsell, of Middleton, and responded to by Dr. Stalker, of Caldwell. The evening was occupied by Rev. R. Pierce, of Fayette, who made a stirring temperance address, taking for his subject, "Watchman, What of the Night?" On Friday, following an excellent address by Mrs. Mitchell, the president, were timely and earnest papers by Rev. W. S. Gowen, Mrs. A. E. Gipson, Mrs. Willia Ross, Mrs. E. C. Shipley and a letter of greeting by Mrs. E. S. Mitchell. All of the papers were discussed by delegates and friends present. At noon a bountiful picnic dinner was served by the ladies of Middleton. The attendance was good at all of the sessions and much interest was shown in the proceedings.

The following officers were elected to serve for the ensuing year: Mrs. J. H. Barton, president, Caldwell; Mrs. Van Kirk, corresponding secretary, Nampa; Mrs. William Ross, recording secretary, Roswell; Mrs. Mary Neth, treasurer, Middleton; Mrs. E. C. Shipley, Parma, superintendent L. T. L. work; superintendent Demorest contest work, Mrs. S. S. Foote, of Middleton; superintendent social purity work, Mrs. Sarah Mitchell, Parma; superintendent of franchise work, Mrs. Mary Domskin, Boise City; superintendent of scientific temperance work, Mrs. Dr. Hall Star.

On Flower Mission Day, June 9, a few white-ribbon sisters went up to the penitentiary taking one hundred and nine bouquets, for there are that many poor, unfortunate men (and one woman) inside those walls. Miss Amanda Way, formerly of Kansas, and president of the Kansas state W. C. T. U. at one time, was present at Boise, and accompanied the ladies to the prison talking lovingly to the prisoners. Mrs. Kate R. McIntyre, the state superintendent, is very devoted and faithful in her work. She has succeeded in getting other Christian workers, aside from the W. C. T. U., to carry on the work. Mrs. Mitchell, our state president, began the work last winter. She preached every Sabbath to the prisoners, and the good seed sown has taken root, and many inside those walls are rejoicing in the love of a Saviour's redeeming power. Mrs. Mitchell could not be present to talk to the prisoners on Flower Mission Day, so wrote them a letter telling them that the flowers and the bouquets that were sent them were to remind them of a Saviour's love and God's gift to us. The ladies also carried bouquets to the prisoners at the county jail. They hold services every Sabbath afternoon.

The town authorities of Idaho Falls requested the ladies of the W. C. T. U. to take charge of the celebration on the Fourth of July. That they made a success of it is not surprising. The most beautiful part of the program was the forty-four young ladies dressed in white representing the states, each one reciting a verse composed for the occasion by our state president. The music was furnished by the "Glee Club," and the usual prescribed program was carried through.

Our president writes of drilling a class of boys for a Demorest contest at Idaho Falls. This is the first time a boy has won a medal in Idaho.

The state convention will be held at Idaho Falls.

NEW YORK STATE NEWS.

Having been away from home a great deal of late, my letter has been delayed for lack of time to write, and I must beg pardon of some of my county reporters, that the matter sent me is so slow in appearing, but the delay has been unavoidable.

My first report shall be of Delaware county convention which was held at Hobart, with a fine representation from the local unions. Excellent reports were given of work done by the locals, and the county president has planned to go through the county, strengthening the weak places, and organizing wherever possible.

A tender memorial service was held, not alone for those of their own county, but for Rev. Dr. Willing, who was an inspiration to this county, and for the three who belonged to us all—Mary A. Woodbridge, Mary T. Lathrap and W. Jennings Demorest, all of whom had in times past personally aided the work in this county.

A petition to our governor, asking him to sign the amended scientific temperance instruction bill, and representing over three hundred people, was sent from this gathering, and, indeed, from many other gatherings throughout our state. In addition to petitions, thousands of personal letters have been sent to Governor Morton asking him to sign this bill, which had passed both senate and assembly unanimously, and as nearly everybody knows by this time, he did sign it, and it is now become a law.

A very strong opposition was brought to bear by superintendent of public instruction, Chas. A. Skinner, but without avail. Mrs. Hunt worked nobly for this bill, remaining in Albany many weeks, giving her personal attention to the matter, and we rejoice that success has crowned her efforts.

Two important scientific temperance institutes have recently been held in the northern part of Wayne county, at Ontario and Wolcott, under the direction of Miss Mary J. Sanford. Mrs. M. M. Allen, of Newark, gave the address at Ontario and was helpful throughout the meeting, while Mrs. M. N. Van Benschoten rendered similar service at Wolcott. Several instructive papers were read and followed by discussion. Mr. Tift, principal of Marion Collegiate Institute, gave an address at Ontario, in which he made this statement which tells its own story: "For fifty years the valedictorians of Yale College have been non-users of tobacco."

Mrs. E. U. Burgess, of Highland, has recently filled several appointments in Wayne county, greatly to the satisfaction of all who heard her. Another interesting report from this same county is of a W. C. T. U. reception given in honor of the members of G. A. R. Dwight Post and their wives. Mrs. D. C. Hulett was toast mistress, and the first toast was "Dwight Post." This was responded to by Miss Orton, county president of the W. C. T. U., in an original poem. Others responded to "Our Silent Comrades," "The Ladies," "Our Country and Our Flag," "The Pensioner," etc. Music added its charms, and a social time followed which was greatly enjoyed by all.

Orange county held a most successful convention at Pine Bush. Mrs. Emily McLaughlin was present, and gave a Bible reading and the evening lecture. Papers on Sabbath observance and L. T. L. work were read, and an L. T. L. hour was conducted by Miss Margaret Sloat. A young woman's conference was a new and pleasing feature, led by Mrs. K. R. McKinney, of Pine Bush. There is a strong band of workers at Pine Bush, it being one of the oldest unions, and it knows how to entertain. The report of this meeting came from New Jersey, and a postscript added says: "You will notice I write from New Jersey, where my husband is pastor, and where we occupy the M. E. parsonage, but I belong to Orange county, N. Y." This is signed C. Agusta Goodale-Fairchild. We are all glad she still belongs to us.

Monroe county W. C. T. U. had a large attendance at their semi-annual convention. It was held in the beautiful new W. C. T. U hall of the Brighton union in that village. More than one hundred delegates were present, representing twenty-five unions. The hall was beautifully decorated, the day perfect, and all things worked together for a delightful convention. Brockport reported the purchase of headquarters, and Fairport reported that the ladies were to purchase and fit up a coffee cart to be used at fires.

A pleasant surprise to the workers was the presence of Mrs. Griffith, formerly the county president, but now of Chicago. She spoke very feelingly. Later on Mrs. Griffith donated ten dollars to the county treasury, making Mrs. Anna M. Kishlar a life member. This seemed to strike a popular chord, and the county treasurer called for other donations. The result was four more life members.

The convention lasted only one day and evening, but every moment was crowded full. Mrs. Parish, the county president, kept matters well in hand and everything came in its proper order. The evening meeting differed from the usual method, in that a service of song by the state corresponding secretary took the place of the usual lecture. The hall was packed to the doors. Arrangements were made for the entertainment of the state convention in September.

Dansville union sends a glowing account of the work of Mrs. Ellen D. Blair, the chalk-talker. The opera house was engaged for her meeting and was well filled—all under fifteen being admitted free, others paying ten cents. The meeting was a success financially and in every way. The speaker was introduced by Father Dougherty, a Catholic priest, in a charming manner.

Columbia county held a very pleasant and profitable convention in the beautiful village of Kinderlook. Four new unions have been organized in the county—the largest having a membership of forty-nine active and eleven honorary. These were represented for the first time in this convention. Mrs. Emily McLaughlin was the speaker of the evening, her subject being "Reserve Forces."

Madison county reports an enthusiastic semi-annual convention at Georgetown. An increased membership was generally reported, much legislative work done, and renewed interest in mothers' and parlor meetings. Mrs. Nellie H. Hutchinson was present and spoke in the interest of systematic giving. A gold medal contest was held in the evening, awakening much enthusiasm and also adding a nice sum to the treasury.

Dutchess county met in convention at Moore's Mills. The report as sent me does not give a detailed account of the meeting, but we who know of Dutchess county workers, led by Mrs. H. A. Nelson, as president, can testify that much good work was done.

Onondaga county held its eighteenth annual convention in Skaneateles. About fifty delegates were present besides many visitors. The address of the president, Mrs. Mary D. Ferguson, was excellent, and plans of work, broad and hopeful, were presented. The report of county organizer, Mrs. A. S. D. Bates, showed much faithful work done in many ways. Mr. C. J. Hall, of Buffalo, has given about five months' constant labor in Syracuse and surrounding towns, doing grand service for our cause. Nearly eight thousand signed the petitions and total abstinence pledge; over five hundred dollars raised for expenses of the meetings; many new members and several new unions; one no-license victory. These are some of the results of his labors. Mr. Hall gave his closing address at this convention. He is a faithful and fearless worker. The past year has been one of the best for successful work in this county.

Among the resolutions passed was one against the "Root Beer" fraud, denouncing it most emphatically as a dangerous and alcoholic drink, and adding that "temperance papers advertising it should take for their motto, 'No saloon in the nation, but a brewery in every home.'" A memorial service led by Mrs. Bates, and a consecration service, led by Rev. Anna Rathbun, closed the convention.

DELAWARE.

TEMPERANCE INSTRUCTION IN SCHOOLS.

In the last Delaware letter mention was made of the Grand Temperance Jubilee of the public school children, under the auspices of the W. C. T. Union, held in the opera house of Wilmington in June. Since then a more detailed account has been received.

The front of the stage was decorated with potted palms and ferns and the banners of the W. C. T. U. of the city, but the great attraction was the chorus of three hundred children seated upon raised benches draped in white in the rear of the stage, each child wearing a peach blossom, our state emblem. The chorus singing was exceptionally fine and was heartily applauded. A small table held the tray containing the gold prizes and on either side were ranged the authors of the prize essays.

Mrs. J. R. Milligan, superintendent of the department of scientific temperance instruction, said in regard to the work that the children had done nobly and were deserving of encouragement. That she hoped to have a prize offered for every grade next year. The object of the movement is to interest parents in work of children and teachers and the schools in temperance. Miss Margaret S. Hilles, in behalf of the union, extended most hearty thanks to the friends who had aided the enterprise. It was as she said, a good investment and will bring interest. In the competition for prizes, school number four was banner school, ninety-one pupils having written essays. Thirty-one prizes, of which eight were five dollars and the others two and a half dollars gold pieces, were distributed to the schools. After the exercises a vote of thanks was drawn up by the children to the donors.

The last state executive committee meeting of the W. C. T. U. was held in Smyrna at the home of Mrs. Kate E. Smithers, and the committee unitedly say that it was a most enjoyable meeting, made so by the Delaware hospitality of their hostess. Lunch was served and all in her power was done to mitigate the excessive heat of that warmest of June days. In the afternoon they proceeded to the M. E. Church in Smyrna where the president, Miss Margaret S. Hilles, conducted a very interesting "parliamentary drill." The audience was very enthusiastic. At the committee meeting many plans were laid for the summer's work and for the state convention to be held in Milford on Oct. 2, 3 and 4.

Flower Mission Day was held as usual in our three counties. At New Castle, the president of the W. C. T. U. with several members visited the county jail and distributed about a hundred bouquets with text cards attached. Rev. V. S. Collins held a short services also read from Union Signal the account of the instigation of the flower mission movement by Miss Jennie Casseday. The service was impressive and the flowers were gladly received. There are one hundred and eight prisoners. The committee appointed by the W. C. T. U. visit the jail once in two weeks and hold services.

The day was observed by the ladies of the W. C. T. U. of Dover visiting the jail and almshouse. The prisoners at the jail and the inmates at the almshouse look forward with pleasure every year to this day. The exercises at the almshouse were entertaining and impressive and were thoroughly enjoyed by all present. Good things to eat were distributed, speeches made, songs sung and words of cheer spoken in the endeavor to bring a little sunshine into the lives of these unfortunate ones and to point them to a land where chill penury is not known. Among the ministers present were Rev. Mr. Tusner of the Presbyterian church, who spoke feelingly, and Rev. Mr. Stengle of Armory M. E. Church, who presided.

Never did day more auspicious dawn on the flower mission movement in Georgetown. Early in the afternoon white-ribboners, the majority of the ministers of the town, and citizens interested in the moral and spiritual needs of the inmates of our jail and almshouse, began to assemble at the former place. The religious exercises began with singing followed by prayer by Rev. A. D. Davis. Another hymn was sung and Rev. J. H. S. Ewell gave heartfelt words of advice. After singing another hymn, Rev. C. A. Grise and the ladies of the W. C. T. U. distributed flowers and literature among the unfortunates. Judging from the tears shed and the hearty thanks expressed by the inmates, the attentions shown were gratefully received.

In a short time the visitors at the jail were joined outside by many others, and all drove to the county almshouse. As is their wont the W. C. T. U. found the way to the hearts of the almshouse inmates by a liberal supply of iced lemonade and cakes. Here the religious exercises were: Hymns, prayers by Revs. J. H. S. Ewell and W. R. McFarlane and helpful addresses by Revs. McFarlane, Ewell, Davis and Grise, all ministers of the town. Since the union has been making its weekly visits at the jail, a difference on the side of good has been noticed in the Sunday behavior of the prisoners. On a recent Sunday one of them said, "Let's play cards," and another said, "No; I am tired spending my Sundays that way. Let's get some papers and read them." And so they did. This we see, but we hope for even better things, "after many days."

The W. C. T. U. of Nassau celebrated the Fourth by a picnic in the grove at Yellow Hill, near Nassau. Mr. David Hazzard was chairman, and exercises opened with singing of "America," accompanied by the orchestra. Rev. Mr. Stranahan, of Harrington, was the speaker of the afternoon.

Owing to the inclemency of the weather the evening exercises were conducted in the school-house. W. W. Fisher, of Harvard, was introduced, and made a very encouraging speech. Following it was the medal contest. Mrs. Ida Lank, of Nassau, received the medal.

At the June meeting of the Milton W. C. T. U., Mrs. Annie Fisher, of Nassau, county president, Rev. W. T. Valiant and Rev. Mr. Hodge, gave the union interesting talks. The pastors expressed a willingness to assist the ladies in any way possible for the good of the cause of temperance. Mrs. Fisher gave good advice and made helpful suggestions, by which the union hopes to profit. Action was taken upon the cigarette question. Posters were ordered containing the law against selling cigarettes to minors, and doubtless, ere this, are in public view. Announcement was made from the pulpit that such action would be taken, and already a marked difference has been noticed in the amount consumed.

GRANITE STATE TEMPERANCE WORK.

It was with great pleasure that the Field reporter visited the Mercy Home at Manchester last week. This is one of the greatest works for good which the New Hampshire W. C. T. U. has in hand, and many girls have found here a refuge from the evils of the world, and made a new start in a Christian life; there are now seventeen girls in the Home, with an average age of sixteen years. The matron, Miss E. C. Hurd, is a wise, capable woman, well fitted for the place. There is a laundry connected with the institution, well equipped with modern machinery, which affords employment for the girls, and from which an income is derived that assists in supporting the Home. Much credit is due Mrs. Hatch, the first matron, during whose service of five years the pioneer work was done, and the Home firmly established as a power of good.

At the meeting of the state executive board a cordial invitation was received from the Franklin union for the state to hold its annual convention at Franklin, the invitation was gladly accepted, and the date will be October 1, 2 and 3. John G. Woolley has been engaged for the occasion.

At the Baptist grove meeting held at the Weirs this month the W. C. T. U. of New Hampshire held two sessions on July 17, under the direction of Miss C. R. Wendell, state president. The Workers' Conference was conducted by Mrs. Helen G. Rice, of Boston. Much good work has been done in the state by Mrs. Rice and Mrs. Gleason, of Massachusetts, the first making a lecture tour of seven weeks, the latter of two weeks.

The Manchester union have great cause of congratulation for their good work in providing such delightful reception and reading rooms in the Kennard Building. The rooms are in charge of Miss Helen Melvin, whose graceful courtesy makes welcome any weary shopper or travel stained W. C. T. U. woman from out of town.

The Hillsborough county convention held at Peterborough was of unusual interest. The president, Mrs. Adelaide Jones, presented to the county a beautiful banner (her own handiwork) to be given each year into the care of the union making the greatest gain in membership. The banner is of electric blue satin, and bears the inscription, "Hillsborough County W. C. T. U. The love of Christ constraineth us." The floral emblems are a cluster of water lilies representing the W. C. T. U. and ivy clinging to a cross as emblematic of the Y. W. C. T. U. Through the courtesy of the Methodist conference the Sullivan county convention will be held at their camp grounds at Claremont. Mrs. H. G. Rice will be the speaker.

From the Granite State Outlook I glean the following items:

South Newmarket gladly reports increasing interest in scientific temperance instruction. The teachers are members of the union, and in the recent annual school exhibition part one on the program was devoted to temperance. Somersworth union rejoices in a successful Demorest contest, the contestants, eight in number, all being young men. As a result of Mrs. Rice's work new unions were formed at Hudson and Rindge; under Mrs. Gleason unions were formed at Plaston and Laubourville, with good seed sown in many other places from which we look for greater gain in the future.

Temperance hotels are so rare in New Hampshire that I cannot close this article without mention of the pleasant Bradford Springs House under the management of Mr. and Mrs. Henry McCoy, the latter a long time president of one of the first unions formed in Massachusetts and their state treasurer for eight years. This is a strictly temperance house, filled to overflowing every year by a pleasant company drawn there by the virtue of the waters, the beauty of the surroundings and the quiet and comfort pertaining to a hotel where no intoxicants are sold.

WORKERS IN COUNCIL.

Should any one take the trouble to investigate the matter it would be found that the W. C. T. U. of Louisiana are more energetic in doing good work than in reporting it. This is not as it should be for it is a conceded fact that when a success is not heralded abroad by those who have worked for it, those who have opposed remain ominously silent on the subject.

Though no work has been reported from this state the unions have not been idle. At the annual convention of the third district it was shown that there was an increase in membership and a growing interest in public sentiment in regard to the reforms advocated. The sum of seven hundred and seventy-five dollars was collected and spent for work in this district during the year. This district has for its president, Mrs. H. C. Pharr. Her whole hearted generosity and true devotion to the work combine to make her a potent factor of much good.

The seventh district has been favored by a course of lectures by Mrs. Tomlinson who did good work in organizing new unions, giving a new impetus to the work of others. Mrs. Tomlinson's addresses were received with favor, and one more name has been added to the list of popular women speakers who have won for themselves and the cause they represent, the golden opinions of the best of our citizens. This district is fortunate in having for its president, Mrs. Lily Blanks. She belongs to the new order of nineteenth century women, believing in the "do everything" policy.

The district is composed of seven parishes. In all except one the sale of liquors has been prohibited by vote, yet it is still sold by the "blind tiger" system. In Monroe the "blind tiger" is bold in violating the law, and while arrests are frequent, the fines are occasional. The friends of the saloon claim that the laws are inadequate to reach and punish those who see fit to violate them. If this be true then why do not our Christian voters send men to the halls of legislature who have true moral courage and sufficient brain to enact laws that can be used to enforce the will of the people? What a lot of sham there is in laws that pretend to favor all legitimate measures for the suppression of the saloon, yet in reality afford no protection, and only impose a petty fine when violated. It is said by the men who violate the prohibition laws, that they make enough by their sales in one hour to pay any fine imposed.

The fifth district convention convened in Jennings on the 25th of June, with a large attendance of delegates and visitors. There were many able addresses both by the white-ribbon women and by members of the clergy. A silver medal contest was held, with six contestants. Another interesting feature was a ministers' and citizens' meeting, in which were ably discussed such subjects as "The woman of yesterday and to-day," "Woman in the pulpit," "Woman in public caucus," and "Woman in business." Mrs. Kate Wilkins, the president of this district, is an earnest Christian and zealous worker for the cause of temperance reform.

The white-ribboners held a reunion day at the Boston Chautauqua, July 20. The Chautauqua is a popular resort, and a fine opportunity was afforded the W. C. T. U. for acquainting the public with its far-reaching plans of work, for the peace and perfecting of the sons and daughters of Eve.

The W. C. T. U. of Louisiana are recognizing the fact that the press is to-day one of the most influential agencies under heaven, and may be made our motor of progress. The official organ for the state is the American, published at Lake Charles. The interests and purposes of the W. C. T. U. are most ably looked after in this journal; each week a page is devoted to temperance literature. Many other papers throughout the state are giving a column to the use of the local unions.

The Central W. C. T. U. of New Orleans has recently passed a resolution opposed to indorsing the suffrage question. A little later the fifth district convention passed a resolution indorsing the equal suffrage movement. Thus every thing in the world that is worth a thought must enter the seething cauldron of controversy, and "survive or perish" as it is proven to be good or bad. It is amusing to listen to the wordy warfare upon this subject. To some it seems a promise of joy, the fruition of which will be an all-pervading good. To those who oppose it, the very term suffrage has assumed the proportions and attributes of a demon without heart or soul, whose mission upon earth is to introduce disaster and confusion into the affairs of men and women. Neither side of the controversialist is to be blamed, as certain powers of perception are developed in each individual beyond which it is powerless for them to advance. Yet each side finds fault with the other. A grows wroth that B should see so far ahead of her own limits of perception, and B grows impatient that A should not at once recognize the use and propriety of what comes so easily and naturally to the more expansive vision.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

LOCAL NEWS.

Muskogee W. C. T. U. hold their meetings every two weeks. There is much interest manifested and all work with a will. They held a birthday social at the home of Mrs. Laura Harsha's Friday evening, July 26. Quite a number were present and the proceeds were good.

They have had one lecture by Rev. Freeman, of Muskogee, this quarter in their hall. Their object is to hold a public meeting of some kind every month; either a literary meeting or a lecture. They are looking forward to the coming convention in October with great expectations.

The Y. W. C. T. U. is doing good work; they have close on to thirty members, and still increasing. They are all, both young men and ladies, very much interested in the work.

Vinita union meets every Thursday afternoon at four o'clock. They devote the first Thursday mostly to business, the second, a mothers' meeting, third, a prayer-meeting, and the fourth a social meeting. Thursday, July 25, was lead by Mrs. Wightman, of Evanston, Ill.

The mothers' meeting Thursday, August 1, was led by Mrs. Stunard, of Chicago. These ladies are visiting in Vinita and we have enjoyed meeting with the sisters who are interested in the same grand work we are and wearing the white ribbon.

Talhequah union has not held a meeting since the convention. There have been protracted meetings all the time that have interfered with their meetings. I hope to have a report of them in my next letter.

Claremore union is doing good work. There is much interest taken since the convention held there in May. They have a good attendance. They intended to hold a public meeting Sunday night (July 21) but rain interfered. They will hold it later.

I have not received a report of the other unions. I have written to each of them for a report, but all have not responded.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

NO SUMMER'S REST.

Brookland, a pretty suburb of Washington, is within the mile limit of the national Soldiers' Home, therefore under prohibition. The Brookland auxiliary invited the W. C. T. U. of the District of Columbia to hold its quarterly meeting there in the Baptist church. The invitation was joyfully accepted and at the appointed time delegates from nineteen unions as well as many visitors wended their way (by electric car) through fields and groves to the place of meeting, each one carrying a lunch box or capacious hand bag, containing literature, pledge cards, credentials, reports, etc. The bright, new church was well filled with devout and earnest women, while now and then the friendly face of a brother-in-law enlivened the scene. The District president, Mrs. M. E. Griffith, presided and gave a Bible reading. Prayers and appropriate hymns followed. The address of welcome was by the pastor of the church, Rev. R. R. West. The response was by Mrs. L. A. Williams, president of Northwest union.

The reports of work at this meeting, like those of the past, breathed a story of consecrated effort, of progress and of blessing. The Y branch was well represented, and brought for our encouragement a full report of work satisfactorily done, and hopeful plans for the future. The indefatigable superintendent of literature brought supplies and samples, which she described and recommended in a fine address. Our superintendent of unfermented wine is ever active, for her field is varied; her reports are interesting. It would be impossible to delineate each one of our twenty-three departments; it is sufficient to say that each superintendent stands at her post, each is a capable and valued worker, true and tried.

When the vestry was thrown open for the noon collation a social hour was enjoyed after Mrs. R. R. West (the president of the entertaining union), had conducted the devotions of the "noontide hour of prayer."

To show how alert the W. C. T. U. of this district is, I will mention a piece of work undertaken at a moment's notice which has already shown good results.

Mrs. Emma F. Shelton, the faithful secretary of the district union, learned that a resort upon the lower Potomac, which is noted for its extensive bar, as well as attractive grounds, was endeavoring to add to its prestige by securing the attendance of Sunday-school excursions. Five hundred free complimentary tickets were being issued to each of the various Sunday-schools of the city. These tickets included a ride down the river upon a steamboat provided with a bar and a day spent upon the shady lawns of the resort, where dancing, bowling and various games are indulged in. Three years ago this resort was thrown open to public patronage in a "Grand Opening Free Excursion," to which only young men were admitted. Every young man in the city received an invitation; thousands went. The "new and elegantly stocked bar" did a thriving business. At that time the W. C. T. U. lifted up its voice in protest against such wholesale temptation to youth, and now when this same resort is trying to build up its respectability by securing Sunday-school excursions to its grounds, we are on hand to sound the note of warning against bringing innocence to add to the popularity of such a place. Mrs. Shelton sent out postal cards to the unions, and that evening led a meeting of those who the next day went to the officers of the Sunday-schools in all parts of the city, requesting them to consider well the intent of the offer of those free tickets and to refuse them.

News in a Nutshell.

The scientific temperance lectures given by Rev. Taylor, in North Dakota, are reported as unique and powerful for good.

Miss Adelaide M. Kinnear, former state president of North Dakota W. C. T. U., has gone to Boston, her former home, for recuperation.

The Carondelet, Mo., W. C. T. U. was entertained upon its eleventh anniversary by the wide awake L. T. L. of that town, a very interesting program being enthusiastically carried out.

The Y. W. C. T. U., of Ohio, held its annual conference at Lakeside, Ohio, July 10 and 11. A program of choice numbers testifies to the beneficial gathering so sure to have been held by these valiant Y's.

A state worker writing from Trumbull county, Ohio, speaks in terms of highest praise of the president of that county, Mrs. Minnie H. Pierce. She says, "In all my travels I have never found a more faithful and efficient county president." Oh, for more like her!

A bit of practical work done by the Lathrap union of New York state, through the department of prison work, was securing the release from a six months' sentence on the Island, of a woman whose crime was drunkenness. She was returned to her home where father and husband welcomed her.

Miss Jessie A. Ackermann has gone to Iceland, and for three months will be beyond the reach of mail. She makes this trip as special correspondent for the Ladies' Home Companion, of Springfield, Ohio. Miss Ackermann is accompanied by congenial friends, and without doubt this change of scenes will prove most beneficial.

Dr. O. B. Bird sends a correction of figures which appeared in his recent article upon "Fermented Bread." He now gives as correct authority the following: Glucose consists of 6C, 12H, 6O; in consumption the eater uses 3C, 6H, 3O, or half of each of the component parts. Of the remaining half, 1C, 2O is breathed out as carbonic acid gas, and the balance 2C, 6H, 1O is excreted as alcohol.

Mrs. Frances W. Graham, corresponding secretary of New York, writes: "There is considerable stir made over our new scientific temperance law, and some say an effort will be made to repeal it. When we consider that the law passed both senate and assembly without a dissenting vote and was signed by the governor, we wonder upon what grounds any one can expect a repeal."

Last year the W. C. T. U. of Summit, New Jersey, erected a drinking fountain which was received with great favor. This spring, it being out of repair, the township committee voted to put it in order at public expense. For this purpose they appropriated one hundred dollars from the liquor license fund. The women very decidedly objected to having their work carried on by the use of saloon money and the council finally drew from the dog tax fund the necessary amount.

PURITY DEPARTMENT.

Dear Sisters:—The corresponding secretary of the National W. C. T. U. has written the superintendent of departments that their reports must be at headquarters by September 15 at the latest. That means that state and local superintendents will be obliged to send in their reports at once. Will they do it? The state superintendents cannot report unless local unions report, and the superintendents of these unions will often fail, for various reasons, and so the work will not be rightly detailed to the National Convention. Will you not, therefore, as a union instruct your superintendent to report the actual condition of department work among you? If you do not work in the especial department in question, say so. All National superintendents desire to know where work is not done as well as where it is done. As superintendent of the department of purity I wish to ask, if you do no work in this department, why you do not? I am very anxious to learn the mental feeling of local unions in regard to the work, and I most earnestly request you to discuss the matter in your union and report, What, in your thought, constitutes purity work? Is it work that can be taken up in small unions, in villages or country communities? Please see that your reports reach the state superintendent by the last of August. Your earnest co-worker,

Mary Wood Allen,

Cor. Secy's Notes.

Mountain Lake Park, Md., July 30, 1895.

From the beautiful "mountain top" I am looking out over the field to-day in a few moments snatched hastily between the meetings of the Mountain Lake Park school of methods. The very breath of God this wonderful air seems to be and the spirit of God has been manifested in our meetings in a large measure from the first moment until now. I will try to give a full report of both Bay View and Mountain Lake Park in The Union Signal for August 15. I had hoped to give the former in this week's issue but press of duties here has prevented. Some one has told me that in the last issue of The Union Signal the date of the National Convention was given as October 15. I had not noticed the error, and if it occurred, it must, of course, have been purely typographical. The dates are October 18–23 as has been so often stated. The official call will appear in a very short time and will, I hope, be read in each local union. Please emphasize this year, as never before, the Day of Prayer for the Convention that we may come up to it in the strength of the Lord of Hosts. Our meeting will be in vain if, back of the Convention, there be not the prayers of our great army of women.

Those of you who have read the full accounts of the World's Convention will note the creation of the new department of Christian citizenship and the appointment of our dear sister, Mrs. Sarah D. La Fetra to its superintendency. It was a happy appointment both as regards the personality of the superintendent and the point from which the work is to be carried on. Washington ought to be the head center of Christian citizenship, shown forth in a truly democratic form of government. It is a move in the right direction and so we not only congratulate Mrs. La Fetra and the District of Columbia union upon the honor conferred, but we congratulate the World's union upon its new department and new superintendent. We shall await with interest Mrs. La Fetra's plan of work.

The good news of the safe arrival of our delegates from the World's Convention, has already come to you all. They return filled with enthusiasm, as we knew they would, and the result will be seen in increased interest and better work all over the country. Miss Clara Parrish, who was among the number, is already engaged for several Eastern state conventions, and would be glad to make a sufficient number of other engagements to warrant her remaining East until the time of the National Convention. Address her at Paris, Ill.

Between now and September 1, I am hoping to secure about three weeks of rest, the first I have had since becoming your secretary. After that the conflict will thicken as October 18 approaches. It has grieved me more than I can express to be obliged to refuse so many kind invitations to state conventions, but the early date of the National has made it absolutely necessary that I should, especially as the calls have come from points widely separated from Chicago. Please believe, sisters, that it is not because I do not want to go to you, for I feel that in no other way could I so closely come in touch with your needs. But if I am to be ready to do your behest on October 18, I must have from September 1 almost uninterruptedly at my desk. The loss will be mine rather than yours; please believe that I realize this fact. May we not hear from all along the line "the best state convention we ever had"? And will you not in the remaining months work with might and main, that each state may report an increase in membership? We must have it. Membership Crusade Day is near at hand. Let no local union fail to observe it.

Katharine L. Stevenson.

Treasurer's Corner.

A GREETING.

After what seems a long absence in attendance upon the World's Convention in London, the treasurer is glad to be back in her busy Corner in the Temple and occupy once more her corner in The Signal, and here is a loving hand shake to every white-ribbon reader and may I whisper in your ear that we all came back more in love with America than ever before.

The meetings in London were inspiring and helpful in many ways. Miss Willard's address to the World's Convention was in her best and most vigorous style. She read it at length, with her old time energy, inimitable expression and touching pathos. Lady Somerset won completely every heart, not fully her own before. We all realized as we never had, what she is to our great work, what she has done for our beloved leader in her illness and how instrumental in her restoration to health, and hence the great obligation under which our own National has been placed to this magnificent woman, sister and friend. Helen Hood is like a major-general in her activity, and her intelligent supervision of details and her unrivaled ability to bring things to pass.

The British association is developing and bringing out many good speakers among the English women. But Miss Jennie Stewart has given The Union Signal such clear and concise pen pictures of our meetings in London and Switzerland it would be out of place for me to say all there is in my heart in praise of the women and the work. Clara Hoffman had already found her way easily into the hearts of English men and women. Her strong words are winning for her golden opinions everywhere. The executive committee are anxious to send her around the world, but I protest that we need her at home.

Now, sisters, to business. Three-fourths of our fiscal year is gone, and several states have not paid one dollar of dues into the National treasury, others have made one small remittance in the nine months, and a few have sent liberal installments, but it has been necessary to borrow money to pay appropriations to superintendents and the running expenses of the office, which necessity would have been obviated could the dues have come in quarterly. Ohio still keeps easily to the fore in her promptness in sending dues every month. Will presidents and treasurers bear in mind that our National Convention meets one month earlier this year than usual, and great energy and promptness will be needed in order to get in our full dues by September 20, and have them properly prepared, printed and reported at Baltimore. If dues are withheld our membership, instead of showing an increase, as we hope, will indicate a falling off, as we, unlike many great societies, only count paid-up memberships. In my next letter I will give credit where credit is due for receipts during June and July.

Helen M. Barker.

Organizers' Corner.

My Dear Organizer General:—The individual has been so completely lost in these great cities and the Alps that I had entirely forgotten that August 8 was to be the date of my next letter to the column, until dropping into National headquarters here to-day, I found your message in The Union Signal of the 20th ult. Never before had our paper seemed so precious. Can you imagine with what eagerness we read? All the "sights" were as nothing compared.

Now a few items about our work. The spring months were given to Indian Territory, Kansas, Illinois, New Jersey and New York. Few unorganized places were visited, but those that were were ready and anxious to join our great army. It is the most hopeful sign of the times. If only some temperance man or woman of wealth would put a few thousand into the treasury for organization purposes, we would "take the world for Christ and temperance some sweet (early) day," we would, truly. Everywhere we found the faithful ones hopeful and determined. The presidents of the states named never look backward, and so inspire their women continually.

The Indian Territory seems to us the best place for work the coming autumn. The territorial officers and many workers in towns that have been organized for a few years are as capable and earnest as can be found any where. Realizing the possibilities and needs of their own women, the secretary wrote us that they had taken a big step in advance at their last convention in May. We explain the plan, hoping to benefit some one else. Each white-ribboner is asked to give one entire day to a personal canvass for contributions, the fruit of her labors to be turned into the treasury for organizing new places, every woman throughout the territory to give the same day if convenient, knowing such an arrangement would bring added zeal and courage. Unions preferring will contribute the proceeds of an entertainment instead. Would not this be an excellent method for co-presidents to adopt? It should be considered the highest privilege of the members of one union to set another band of women to work. Thus is our own influence doubled, yea, perchance, quadrupled, for we may be enlisting a Frances Willard. Beloved comrades, "think on these things."

Others will tell of the delights of our weeks abroad, so we need not enumerate them, only give our personal testimony. We have lived on the mountain tops spiritually, as well as materially. "Praise the Lord, Oh, my soul."

Ever faithfully,
Clara Parrish.

A wee resident has been taught to save a piece of everything nice for "papa." When castor oil was being administered a bright thought struck the youngster. "I dess I'll save the rest for papa."

Mother—"I wish you would go on an errand." Son—"My leg aches awful." "Too bad. I wanted you to go to the candy store, and—" "Oh, that isn't far. I can walk there easy." "Along side of it you will see a grocery store. Get me a bar of soap."

She: "Professor, did you ever read Martin Luther's commentary on the Diet of Worms?"

The Professor: "No, I have not. I am a strict vegetarian, you know."

"I wonder what a man's sensations are when he is struck by lightning?" said Dawson.

"I should think he would feel more or less thunderstruck," said Hicks.

Twynn: "Bunting is very superstitious about numbers."

Triplett: "Which is his favorite?"

Twynn: "He's always looking out for number one."

Architect: "And on these panels you wish, I believe, the double convolute." Mrs. Nouveau: "Oh, no, indeed! I said I wanted just a plain wiggle running down each side."

"What have you named your baby, Rastus?" "Sam Pro Tem Johnson, sah." "What is the Pro Tem for?" "To show that the name is only temporary, sah. We kind o' thought Sam might like to choose his own name when he growed up, sah, so we put the Pro Tem in as a warning to de public."

A five-year-old boy, who was engaged in some mischievous doings, on being remonstrated with by his father with, "Why will you do so, George?" replied: "Oh, I expect I am too little to know better!"

A little boy, while playing, fell down the steps and bruised himself severely. His mother scolded him for his carelessness, and he sobbed out, "Mamma, please don't scold me till I get done hurting."

Kittie was walking down street with her auntie one day and her big, blue eyes were wide open to all the curious things in the world—a new world to her. Suddenly she espied some tempting-looking pears before a grocery store.

"O—oo, auntie!" she cried, "See all vose little cunning, long-tailed apples!"

"Johnny, do you know that it is very wrong for little boys to throw stones? Never let me see you do it again." Johnny looked into his mother's face with that calm assurance which comes of a sense of innocent intent and said: "Mamma, s'posing David's folks had been so particular, wouldn't it have been a bad thing for the Israelites?"

A large order.—Happy Bridegroom: "Waiter, I want dinner for two." Waiter: "Vill ze lady and gentleman haf table d'hote or a la carte?" Happy Bridegroom (generous to a fault but weak in French): "Bring us some of both and put lots of gravy on 'em."

A few Sabbaths since, when little Phil returned from Sabbath-school, his mamma asked him if he remembered the golden text. "Oh, yes," he quickly replied, "The hoer went forth to hoe."

Horton Ballard is a little flaxen-haired boy nearly three years old. He had often watched, with much interest, his grandpa stirring his coffee before drinking, and one morning thinking that grandpa had forgotten to do this, he said: "Why don't you wind up your coffee, grandpa?"

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

Home Hints.

Cocoa is now much used as a substitute for chocolate for icing cake. Beat the whites of two eggs to a firm froth, add nearly a cupful of powdered sugar and two teaspoonfuls of cocoa.

Small brass curtain rings, such as are used for crocheting over, make servicable and convenient "hang-ups" for dresses, jackets, etc. They can be sewed on at the arm-eyes or what is better for bodices, at the lower edge of the collar, as this keeps them in better shape. Crocheted over with silk to match linings the rings are much neater than tapes.

Washing soda is an indispensable thing in the kitchen. Use it in the water to clean paint and glass instead of using soap. Dip a damp cloth in it and rub your tinware. It will brighten up so as to well repay your labor. Always put a little in the dish-water, not too much, as it is not good for the skin.

One of the secrets of success in making really fine pastry aside from ice cold water and shortening, is perfectly dry flour and baking powder. Keep a small box of flour on a high shelf sifted ready for immediate use and it will be as light as dust. Soda, baking powder and cream of tartar, which easily absorb moisture, should be thoroughly dried out before using, as when mixed while damp they lose much of their strength by effervescence.

Here is a suggestion which recommends itself. To prevent the seams in a new tin pan or pail from rusting, grease them well with fresh lard or sweet oil, and set on a stove shelf or other warm place for twenty-four hours before they are washed. They will not rust after this simple treatment.

Doesn't this sound good? For dainty sandwiches for a lunch or afternoon tea, cut thin slices of brown bread, spread with very little butter, then with a layer of finely chopped English walnuts and almonds. The nuts should be slightly salted.

If you can get your laundress to put the sheets and tableclothes through the wringer selvege first, the edges will not be stretched or curl up and they will be much easier to iron.

An exchange gives these directions for making a novel hanging basket. Take a medium sized sponge, dip it in water, squeeze it a little so the water will not drip on the floor. Hang it in the window by a small cord. Take some seeds, grass, cress and other kinds, and sow in all the pores of the sponge. Dampen your little garden every day and very soon it will break out in the very finest verdure. Many pleasant experiments can be tried with different plants and seeds which will prove a daily delight. Would not this be a pretty thing for the room of a "shut-in"?

As the "dog days" approach extra care will need to be taken to prevent any accumulation of decaying fruit or vegetables in the cellar or store rooms.

Keep a bucket of lime in the cellar to absorb the moisture.

A well blacked stove and pipe will not gather dampness and rust.

Turpentine cloths placed inside a piano will prevent moths destroying the felt.

A nice way of preparing pineapple for the table is to pare it, and with a fork pick off the substance from the core in fine pieces. It can then be eaten with the same comfort as berries.

The following directions for canning tomatoes are by one who says she has been successful for more than a score of years. Use only sound, fresh tomatoes; pour over them boiling water, which will cause the skin to peel off easily; cut away all unripe parts and quarter; drain in a colander. Cook in a porcelain-lined kettle, letting them come to a thorough boil; have glass jars well cleaned sitting on a thickly folded cloth, kept very wet with cold water; by dipping into each a spoonful of the hot tomato and turning the jar around so as to heat the whole surface, there is no danger of breaking. When the jar is full run the spoon around the inside to remove all air bubbles, and add every drop the jar will hold. Wipe the rubber and neck of the jar clean, and screw the covers on tight. When cold tighten the covers, if possible, and store in a dark closet. It is not a good plan to add fresh tomatoes to any left over, as extra boiling makes them dark and destroys the flavor.

Wash your hair

and head with Pearline, and see how refreshing and comforting it is. A Pearline shampoo, even if you don't take it very often, will keep the scalp beautifully clean and healthy. Don't use too much. Not that there's any harm in it, but it'll take too long to wash the suds off, and you might grumble about that. Use your Pearline in the bath. You'll feel invigorated after it. It's very much like a Turkish or a Russian bath—except that it costs almost nothing, and that you take it at home, without any trouble or fuss.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled; if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back. 441 JAMES PYLE, New York.

MONUMENTAL STRUCTURE

ERECTED FOR A GREAT BUSINESS.

The Product Manufactured Under Its Roof Goes Into Nearly Every Home in the Land.

James Pyle of New York, the manufacturer of the celebrated Pearline washing compound, is now erecting a handsome and towering warehouse on the N. W. corner of Washington and Charlton Streets, N. Y. City. This building is a magnificent monument to the power of advertising skilfully directed, in connection with an article of real merit.

Although James Pyle established the firm over forty years ago, Pearline has been its staple trade for little more than 18 years. Mr. Pyle was at that time convinced that he had a meritorious article and believed, that by putting it before the public in a proper manner, a need for its use would be recognized and a fine business built up in consequence.

A limit was set, with the idea that should the sales of Pearline reach a certain amount he would be thoroughly satisfied. This limit of satisfaction was so far from being too high, that at present and for years past, from twelve to fifteen times the expected volume of yearly business has been done by Mr. Pyle.

The need for larger space and greater accommodations to fit this wonderful growth has been felt for a considerable time past and this new building is designed to meet the want. It is ten stories high, of granite, brick and steel, the lower three stories being of granite, and the upper seven of brick with granite trimmings. The building is absolutely fireproof, floors throughout being of asphalt and the roof of gravel and tile. Five elevators will supply ample facilities for passengers and freight. It would be difficult to find a structure so admirably adapted for the uses to which the owners have decided to put it. Nearly eight city lots are covered by the building and it is visible from Sandy Hook, Yonkers, Jersey City Heights and points between.

When Pearline was first put upon the market, soap makers throughout the country laughed at the idea of any washing compound however good, supplanting the old fashioned soap. Events have however proved them in error for Pearline has become a household word throughout the length and breadth of the country, and most soap makers are now striving for a washing compound trade.

In the course of a year nearly forty millions of packages of Pearline are consumed in the United States. Such figures as these stun the imagination in its efforts to realize them.

For the last few years Mr. James Pyle has been assisted in the business by his sons, James T. and W. S. Pyle.

Publisher's Notes

In ordering literature from our publishing house two things should be regarded as essential: first, a knowledge of the needs of the people among whom it is to be distributed; second, a knowledge of the W. T. P. A. catalogue of publications. The first women readily and naturally acquire in the pursuance of W. C. T. U. work. But we wish all white-ribboners, especially all superintendents of departments, would realize more than they do the importance of the second. Every mail brings us evidence of the fact that many, even if they possess a catalogue, do not take the trouble to consult it. "What literature have you on such and such a subject, and what the price?" is in substance the question we are continually answering—a question which the writers with a catalogue at hand could readily answer for themselves.

And, dear women, when you have sent for a catalogue (inclosing two cents postage) and order from it do, we pray you, read and follow the instructions on pages 72 and 73, "How to address letters," and "About Remittances and Letters." Much unnecessary labor and delay would be avoided if those ordering supplies would adhere to these very plain and simple directions.

Next in importance to the catalogue to those who would be familiar with our publications is the "Bound Sets of Leaflets." These include our entire list of leaflets neatly bound in brown paper covers and classified for easy reference in ordering. See catalogue page 67.

The money question is the one that is uppermost in all sections of the country just at present, especially in the minds of voters. The financial side of the liquor problem will, in many cases, arrest thought when other phases of the subject cannot get a hearing. Hence, it should be "worked" to the utmost by temperance reformers. A list of leaflets touching the economic side of the liquor question will be found in another column. We think it would be a wise move on the part of local unions to circulate these extensively.

We will also compile a list of leaflets specially adapted for distribution at state and county fairs. Watch for it in our advertising columns.

Remember that THE UNION SIGNAL of August 22 will be the fair number. To our minds this is, for many reasons, the most important issue of the entire year. It is specially designed to appeal to the great agricultural interest throughout the country, and hence becomes a mighty temperance weapon in the hands of white-ribboners. We urge unions all over the land to put forth every effort to secure a thorough and judicious distribution of THE UNION SIGNAL at state and county fairs. Let us see to it—we on our part and you on yours—that the fair number fulfills well its mission. It will be a twenty page paper and one, we can promise, that W. C. T. U. women will be proud of. It will be seen from the very low price at which we offer it ($2.50 per hundred instead of $3 as in previous years) that it is published not for our profit but for the profit of the people; not because there is "millions in it," but because we want millions to get it!

The time for the fall conventions approaches, when state and district unions will be preparing for the musical part of their programs. For good and appropriate music send a two-cent stamp to the W. T. P. A. and obtain its complete list of temperance and prohibition music.

THOMAS BOOBIG, a new character in fiction. This strange story depicts the incidents, accidents, etc., in the life of one who, from a shy and delicate lad, grew to such proportions and so rapidly that his parents were puzzled to know what to do with him. Soon after his twenty-first birthday he disappeared quite suddenly and while engaged in an extraordinary work which he had undertaken to do. He was very tall, singularly handsome and still growing. The story suggests that Boobig was related to the Titans. The story is written by the strange man's "scribe," Luther Marshall.

THE LADY OF SHUNEM. By Josephine E. Butler, author of "Catharine of Siena." The name of Josephine Butler is beloved and sacred to thousands of women in America and across the seas. As she is climbing nearer and nearer the summit of that hill just over whose summit is the City of God, she can speak from a clearer vision to those who press hard after her of Him who is the Light of the World. THE LADY OF SHUNEM is a spiritual gem that will be precious to many an anxious mother and tried worker in God's vineyard. Mrs. Butler's great, womanly, motherly heart, pervaded by the light of the Holy Spirit, beats in understanding sympathy for all mothers and daughters. She opens the teachings of the Word as one who has authority, and has she not? The Spirit of God guides those who will be guided "into all truth." "The Lady of Shunem," "Abraham as a Father," "The Bar Sinister," "The God of Families" and "Every Good and Every Perfect Gift" are the titles of the brief, strong chapters of this little but helpful book. Mrs. Butler looks at the women of the Bible with eyes that have spiritual discernment; thus she makes no quarrel with God and finds reason and righteousness as she interprets.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN. Tributes From His Associates. Special articles by Soldiers. Statesmen and Officers. Introduction by Rev. Wm. Hayes Ward, D. D.

The forty-two articles contained in this volume appeared in the New York Independent, April 4, 1895. They were contributed by personal friends and acquaintances of Mr. Lincoln to commemorate the thirtieth anniversary of his assassination. Their permanent historical value was instantly recognized and numerous requests were made for their publication in book form. It was a happy thought on the part of the publisher of the Independent to group these "Tributes from His Associates" in one issue of that paper, and a good stroke of enterprise on the part of Messrs. T. Y. Crowell & Co., to secure them for republication. The array of contributors includes United States senators, generals, governors and ex-governors, judges, editors, former members of his cabinet—in short, men of every rank and station in life who personally knew and loved this most picturesque and noble character in American history. To quote from Dr. Ward's introduction: "All these together supply a grand composite picture, the separate parts all blending in one harmonious whole and supplying such a complete, many-sided view of the man as has never before been given to the American people."

Signal Notes.

The Catholic Total Abstinence Union, now numbering 63,500 members in 865 societies, announces the celebration of its silver jubilee on August 7 to 11, the civic demonstration to be held at Carnegie Music Hall, New York city.

The Countess of Carlisle has been using her influence from the platform against the introduction of drink into the working men's political clubs. She realizes that this is even a worse menace to homes than the attractions of the public house, there being no early closing law for the clubs. They can keep open all night.

Again there is a very decided movement on the part of the news agents of London to enlist active public sympathy, including the Christian press, in favor of the abolition of the Sunday morning newspapers. Their suggestion is that a Saturday night issue take the place of the Sunday paper. The Weekly Dispatch has already generously responded.

The rescue work in Edinburgh is sufficiently successful to be very encouraging to the workers. The chief of police strictly enforces a law forbidding importuning on the streets and offenders are promptly and severely dealt with. The Episcopal church, the Roman Catholic church and the Salvation Army are all actively engaged in helping women to better lives, caring for them in their several shelters and in many cases finding permanent situations for them.

New York city is being stirred from center to circumference in these days over the Sunday closing of saloons. Commissioner Roosevelt is proving very satisfactorily that law can be enforced even in New York. The work is spreading to other cities and a great hue and cry goes up because "the poor man" cannot get his beer on Sunday. It would not be surprising if a wave of temperance reform should follow this work. The lines are likely to be closely drawn in this state on the question of whether law shall be enforced or not. A prominent public man has recently written a letter opposing enforcement of law, and Commissioner Roosevelt is glad that Mr. Hill has given him an issue.

Dr. Barnardo, who is perhaps best known in connection with his homes for destitute or homeless children, has just celebrated his fiftieth birthday. For thirty years Dr. Barnardo's homes have never closed their doors on any waif, orphan or destitute child, "without distinction of age, sex, creed, birthplace or physical conditions." Over 26,000 children have been rescued from lives of misery and crime, and educated and trained for useful lives. Seven thousand five hundred have been sent out to the British colonies where good homes have been found for them, many having grown up to fill positions of influence. Nearly five thousand boys and girls are now under training in the institutions.

Bishop Tugwell, writing to the London Times, says that gin and rum are being poured into West Africa in great quantities "and that almost without let or hindrance." Traffic in strong drink has almost wholly checked the advance of civilization, and is ruining the black man body and soul. The ladies of the church missionary society are unable to visit the native women in the compounds, because of the prevailing drunkenness. Drink is actually destroying some of the mission settlements. The natural products of the country are very rich; the people bring to the coast from the interior great quantities of palm oil, sheep, goats, fowls, yams and rubber. There is almost nothing of European manufactures or products brought to Africa in exchange for these aside from rum and gin.

Earnest efforts are being made by the Lovejoy Monument Association, to raise $12,500 by the 1st of January next in order to ensure to their fund the provisional appropriation of $25,000 made by the state of Illinois. Elijah Parish Lovejoy was murdered November 7, 1837, for his fearless utterances with voice and pen against slavery. He was a young man with promise of a brilliant future before him. For twenty-five years his grave was unmarked and for thirty or more years a simple stone has defined the resting place of this hero. It is the purpose of the association to raise a fine monument of granite and bronze in the Alton city cemetery, overlooking the Mississippi and Missouri rivers, and they ask all who are interested to send their contributions, without delay to John E. Hayner, Alton, Illinois, treasurer of the association.

NATIONAL CONVENTION, 1895.
Baltimore, October 18-23

Now is the time to enroll new members and report to state and National treasurers. The watchword of the year has been ORGANIZATION. The seed has been carefully sown and now is the harvest time. Gather in the dues and report promptly. The books of the National Treasurer, Mrs. Helen M. Barker, close September 20.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

The negro miners at Spring Valley, Ill., have resumed work.

Later reports confirm the terrible massacre of English and American missionaries near Ku Cheng, China.

A dispatch from Foo Choo, China, announces the death of Baby Stewart, the eleventh victim of the terrible massacre.

The Christian Alliance, in session at Old Orchard, Me., raised seventy-five thousand dollars for foreign missions, August 11.

The Pope has requested Emperor William of Germany to take the Roman Catholic missions of China under his protection.

Ex-Governor St. John of Kansas and ex-Governor Tillman of South Carolina debated upon the dispensary system at Prohibition Park, N. Y., August 9.

Mr. Moody announced at the Christian Workers' Conference, August 10, that a scholarship would be founded at Mount Hermon school as a memorial of Dr. A. J. Gordon.

Judge Smith, of the fourth district court, Utah, handed down a decision, August 10, to the effect that women in Utah had a right to vote for the ratification or rejection of the new constitution, and also for the officers of the proposed state.

George F. Root, America's most gifted song writer and composer of war songs, such as "The Battle Cry of Freedom," "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp, the Boys are Marching," and "Just Before the Battle, Mother," died near Portland, Me., August 7, aged seventy-five years.

ONE of the old time arguments against woman's suffrage was, "If women vote they will have to be blacksmiths and sheriffs." The validity of the argument never impressed us, but it has now transpired that women can and do perform the duties of both offices, without the power of the ballot. More than one village smith has been recorded and now comes the announcement of the appointment of a woman sheriff in Green county, Missouri,—Mrs. Helen C. Stewart, to succeed her husband who died in office a few weeks ago. The press report voluntarily remarks: "She is amply qualified to fill the position." There are countless cases where women have performed the actual work of their husbands, when disqualified by sickness, but only the "new man" is generous enough to appoint her to the honors of the position when death removes the husband.

RIGHT always wins, sooner or later; it is God's eternal truth. For years the W. C. T. U. has labored to remove fermented wine from the communion table. It has been successful here and there, but more often it has been repulsed and told, politely, perhaps, "to mind its own affairs." Without doubt the Presbyterian church has been the most conservative on this matter, but last spring the General Assembly advised a change from alcoholic to non-alcoholic wine, and now the local assembly of Chicago, one of the most influential in the communion, unanimously recommended last week the use of pure grape juice at the Lord's Supper. The statements of some of the ministers agree with the sentiments of the W. C. T. U. precisely. Rev. Leroy Hooker, pastor of the Fifth Presbyterian church, said, "I believe it only proper that every means should be taken to keep temptation from a man. The very fumes of the fermented wine in the communion cup have been known to start a reformed drunkard to drinking again and the losing of a good man to his family and society." The decision of the Chicago Presbytery rejoices our hearts, because we have long made earnest personal effort to effect such a result in one particular church of Chicago, and did not realize how fast the leaven was working.

THE Catholic Total Abstinence Union, in session at New York city last week, committed itself squarely on one important question—censuring the insertion of liquor advertisements in Catholic papers, but failed to adopt the resolution condemning the making of beer by monasteries. The discussion was spirited and developed two sides, but the resolutions, which always show where the majority stands, failed to record the earnest protest of the minority, voiced by Rev. Ross, of Ohio, as follows: "Recognizing the inconsistency of declaiming against Roman Catholic laymen in the liquor business while passing over in silence the unseemly spectacle of religious and clergy managing and encouraging the unbecoming traffic, the union deplores the continuance of this unedifying example, and hopes for its speedy suppression." The monastery referred to is St. Vincent, located at Latrobe, Penn., and not only does it brew beer, but places it upon the open market for sale. Delegates objected to the resolution, not because there was any doubt as to the facts, but because it would "put the convention on record as saying that priests were engaged in the liquor traffic!" Would this convention have done the Catholic church more harm by "putting itself on record" against this monastery brewery, than by recording its failure to meet an issue which threatens to undermine its very foundation as a temperance society? But while we deplore certain signs of church domination, we do rejoice in this twenty-fifth anniversary of the C. T. A. union and in the spirit which promulgated the resolution: "That we coöperate with our non Roman Catholic fellow citizens in every legitimate effort to restrict the evils of intemperance."

IT is a fact that the temperance reform has as yet had no historian or rationale in permanent form; that all books are apt to be written in a hurry and hence to be fragmentary, one-sided and confused by personal feeling. For instance, in what is called in England "The Standard History of the Temperance Movement," by Dr. Dawson Burns, the dates of Mrs. Wittenmeyer's presidency of the W. C. T. U. are given but no mention of her successor who brought in a more liberal, and as the author thought and has publicly stated, a disintegrating policy, therefore he did not even mention when she came to be president, but that was a simple part of history all the same! The Rev. Mark Guy Pearse, one of the most gifted and celebrated pastors in Great Britain, frankly acknowledged to a white-ribboner who asked him to write about Neal Dow, that he knew nothing of him and could find no allusion to him though he went to several book stores; and as intelligent and well informed a lady and temperance worker as exists in England, stated the same. This was her language: "I will try to send a few words about General Neal Dow, but I really know nothing about him. I never, at least I think not, heard his name until his celebration was proposed, and I shall be glad if you will send me any account of him that has been published, if there is such a thing in pamphlet form." And yet General Dow had given five hundred temperance addresses in Great Britain, and his movement was the procured cause of the formation of the great United Kingdom Alliance. But such is fame, and more particularly such is temperance workers' fame—great billows engulf more than they reveal.

To the Methodist ministers of Chicago are due the thanks of the lovers of religious liberty everywhere for their persistent efforts in behalf of Protestants in South America. In the republics of Peru and Ecuador and Bolivia a citizen to be legally married must be a Roman Catholic, and "having every reason to believe," as stated in their resolution, "that the influence of the pontiff of the Roman Catholic church would be immediately decisive if heartily exercised through the clergy of the countries above named in favor of legislation establishing such religious freedom as is so warmly approved by their colleagues in this republic," the ministers set about securing that influence in the removal of this oppressive disability, asking that "the same liberty of conscience enjoyed by Catholic citizens of this country" be extended to Protestants in South American republics. After repeated attempts to obtain some pronunciamento from the Vatican on this most important subject, through appeals to Catholic prelates in this country and to the Pope himself, involving a correspondence of fifteen months, a communication from the Holy See finally elicited through the influence of Cardinal Gibbons during his visit to Rome, announces that the "apostolic delegate" in these republics has been instructed to investigate. This is a significant victory, but the ministerial committee has evidently a good deal of work yet before it, and the Christian world will await developments with much interest. Liberal-minded Catholics—Christian Catholics—no less than Christian Protestants, will heartily rejoice in a movement so in harmony with the growing spirit of religious tolerance in all nations—a spirit without doubt intensified by the Parliament of Religions and of which that notable gathering facilitated the expression. Civil and religious freedom should be secured to Protestants in Catholic countries, however, not on the ground that it is accorded to Catholics in Protestant countries, but because it is in the line of Christian progress. Christian brotherliness should be the basis of our demand for Christian liberty, and every step gained for the free exercise of religious convictions, whether Protestant or Catholic, whether in a South American or a North American republic, is a victory not for any form of religion but for religion—for Christianity.

SAFE.

BY LUELLA CLARK.

Thou whose eye is over all,
Thou whose ear hears every call,
Morn and noon and eventide,
Thou our guard art, and our guide.

Strong our love is as Thy might,
Thou whose dwelling-place is light,
Who in sorrow givest cheer,
Who deliverest them that fear.

Thine are all our works and days;
Thine the appointing of our ways.
Shielded by Thy gracious arm,
None can hinder, none can harm.

If the sun our sky depart,
Thou our sun and solace art;
Heat nor tempest make afraid;
Thou our shelter art and shade.

Nearer than our dearest thought;
Thou, our keeper, slumbering not;
Safe are we on sea or shore,
Safe with Thee forevermore.

MARGERIE DOUGLAS.

BY LOUISA A. NASH.

"Who could oppose
When deadliest hatred fired its foes,
The vengeful Douglas hands."

"You look very sad to-day, what's the matter, mother?" asked Margerie, as her mother inadvertently let a tear drop on the sewing she held in her hand.

No answer came at once, but the tear was hastily brushed away, and an attempt at a smile took its place. It was hard to give her daughter a true, straight answer, and her mind was ambling round in search of a good subterfuge.

Margerie interrupted the mental quest by saying softly, "Is it about father that you are worried little mother?"

"Why, does he seem ill to you, that you ask that?"

"No, he doesn't seem sick exactly—although it may be something of that sort that is the matter—at least one of the matters; you see I am not woman enough to disentangle the way people are mixed up inside of them," she answered lightly, although apparently in real earnest. Her face, sensitive as was her spirit, flushed up suddenly, and she looked the question, Shall I venture on forbidden ground?

The ready tell-tale sympathy between them told her mother that concealment was useless of what her daughter, she felt, already knew perhaps by intuition—perhaps by her quick observation. Still, it was a subject that would not, with her, lend itself to words, and she simply said: "Margerie, how can we help him?"

She stood leaning against the window-sill, with a pensive expression on her face which was not its wont—with its roundness, and brightness and piquancy, and presently answered softly, "Poor little mother, let's do some planning."

"What kind of planning do you mean, childie? Castles in the air, I expect will be about your build, the same as I used to plan when I was your age."

It is always hard for a parent to realize when a child has arrived at mature and independent thought, and capable and independent action. The eggshell of childhood is sometimes so suddenly broken and deserted at an exact moment—if it could but be known and appreciated—I expect the less reference made to this old eggshell with certain of our young people the better.

This mother, Mrs. Douglas, had had some experience with older daughters, and thought she might know, but it seems none are just alike.

"Well, let's persuade father to go to another place; never mind his position;" he was a railroad engineer; "it's not fit for him, anyhow." And, gazing out of the window, she added: "Look! there are the mountains beckoning to us. One can be safe up there, anyway!"

Involuntarily Mrs. Douglas raised her eyes, as though she expected to see a hand high up in the heavens, kind and gentle, waving an entreating "Come!" There was the gray ridge she knew so well, with a snow cone on its shoulders, melting away into the warm afternoon light. Marjerie began to hum a favorite sacred song of hers,

"Oh, the mountains of the Lord," and, hearing herself called by one of the younger children ran quickly out of the room.

"Lovely from this distance," thought Mrs. Douglas, "but how could we bear the privations of the backwoods, and with no salary, what could we all live on?" and she cast her eye over her cozy little sitting-room with its many comforts and out at the window at a lower plane, where she could see some of her friends' homes, in which she was always a welcome visitor, and where she could temporarily forget the troubles of her own.

. . . . . .

"Come, Bob, our time is almost up; we had better be off from here; 'tain't a safe place, no how!"

"Just wait while I wet my whistle, my boy; a man's throat dries up aboard an engine, don't you know it?" answered the elder man to his mate.

"Guess I do that; poking up that red-hot fiery furnace every few minutes mine is throat-dryer work than yours Bob, but the same tipple that's good for No. 4 engine is good enough for No. 1; that fiery tipple of yours is likely enough to play the devil with No. 4, to say nothing of No. 1."

So saying Charlie Marston touched his superior officer on the right shoulder, just as he was raising the glass to his lips, hoping some of the drink might be spilled on the floor. It was swallowed however, and the two men quickly wound their way to No. 4 engine, puffing and blowing, as if with impatience at their delay. The conductor looked a little stern as they passed his way, and taking the younger man aside he whispered, "Look after Douglas, he does not seem quite fit, and mind the up express."

"Right, will I," was the cheery answer, and in a few minutes they were speeding through the brisk, clear air, full of life and motion, leaving no footprint on the earth, but one more cloud in the autumn sky that told the tale for a few minutes, and that was gone.

Each time Charlie Marston threw a log into his furnace, he looked at his watch, for that express was ever on his mind. She had the right of way, and being but a freight, No. 4's place was a side-track, at a certain point to wait for her majesty to pass.

"The side-track," whispered Charlie in the engineer's ear. "She's due in three minutes and a half." And for the hundredth time he examined his watch.

"Not there yet, my man," growled Douglas. "Why are you in such a brutal hurry?" And they went hieing on under the evening breeze.

Hearing a softer rumbling than their own, Charlie's heart leapt into his mouth. "Reverse her, sir, or you're a dead man," shouted he in Douglas' ear.

"That's what I'm doing, you fool," came the answer, while the same speed was being kept, and the rumbling that was soft became that overpowering, defiant whirr of gigantic motion that carries all before it or perishes in the attempt. Another moment, which seemed an eternity to the one man who saw the inevitable draw near, and the two giants were locked in each other's death grasp, with a titanic thud that drove them simultaneously apart apparently, but piling up desolation, wreck and ruin in commingled promiscuity.

Some weeks after this disaster Margerie said to her mother: "Father is able to bear talking now; let us tell him our plans and see whether he will fall in with them."

"Better wait a little, daughter, he is very weak yet."

"Yes, but he keeps thinking all the time and he is not strong enough to think out any way of escape for all of this. It would be a kindness to point my little easy one out to him; seeing some kind of haven in the distance will help him to get well quicker, don't you see, mother?'

"Well, child, it is your plan, so you do the unfolding."

Nothing loth, with the fresh strong hopes of eager youth astir in her heart, Margerie told her father what a lovely spot she had found in yon gray mountains for a homestead; a level bench already carved out by nature, raised a little above the valley—grazing upon it even now fresh and green—tall, straight cedar trees right at hand to build with, an easy Indian trail from the nearest village that could be readily widened into a wagon road, a settler or two in the valley so they would not be quite alone.

"And mother would like the children to be in the country, especially now that scarlet fever and diptheria scares are forever cropping up. Father, you will soon enjoy making a garden and looking after stock; besides we want you to be right away from the saloon scare," she added, "it is far worse than scarlet fever or diptheria or both together."

"My dear, you take my breath away. What are we all to live on while the grass grows?" said Mr. Douglas, faintly, for he was still weak from the effects of the train disaster, and from distress of mind at having brought it on by his own nerveless hand.

"You have a little money, mother says, to start in with, and I am going to teach school. I have got one promised already, not very far away so that I can come home for Sundays."

"Margerie, you have surely the old Douglas blood in your veins—Dhu-Glas"—he mused as it were to himself—"Dhu-Glas,—the dark, blue stream, as the reading goes. The Douglas always fought for independence in the good old days, but I am afraid your homestead plan will be like the old, leaky boat that James Douglas found after the battle by Loch Lomond."

"Leaky, or no leaky, you know, father, it managed to save many old soldiers from Bruce's army."

"But it was no good afterwards for anything."

"That did not matter after it had done its work. If the homestead helps you that is all we want, father!" said the girl gaily, giving her auburn head its usual little toss, as those pretty little movements circled round her expressive mouth like the circles on a placid lake, when the stone had gone down. Margerie's little speech had gone down and she was waiting for its effect. Mr. Douglas was as kind-hearted a man as ever lived, easy to get on with, if he could have got on with himself! And right away where the "devil in solution" could not find him out Margerie thought he would be just perfect!

. . . . . .

All went well according to her dearest wishes. The little carving out of the green wood gradually enlarged its borders; sleek cattle grazed on the rich sward; blue smoke curled up from a snug cedar home; the children grew rosy from the mountain air; the mother's brow lightened of its care, and the father's sturdy arm made the "welkin ring" as he handled the ax, and enjoyed the handling. As Margerie neared the homestead one Saturday evening, her mind taking in the whole at a glance, she hummed to herself the lines from the old minstrel:

"Beneath the crest of old Dunbar,
And Hepburn's mingled banners come,
Down the steep mountain glittering far,
And shouting still, 'A Home! a Home!'"

She met her mother at the threshold of the mountain home, and the smile went out of the landscape, for there was none on her mother's face, instead the puckered brow of panic. "Margerie, what shall we do? Smith, the old bar-tender, has actually followed us up here and pitched a tent-saloon right above us on the knoll. He came after your father, asking him to lend a hand at a shanty, making believe he was taking up land. When he got him there he just plied him with the old vile stuff, and father has not been himself since. How to conceal it from the children much longer I don't know. At present I am telling them he is sick, but they already think it strange that being sick, he is able to go away from home every evening." And the poor, little woman gave way to a torrent of pent-up tears.

Putting her arm round her mother, Marjerie said in as cheery a voice as she could command, "Never mind, little mother, it will be all right yet. The old rascal has not got a license, and so he is breaking the law every time he fills a glass."

"Yes, but he brags to your father that no officer will catch him. He has spies about who will let him know when one is in the neighborhood; in five minutes he says he can draw stakes, pack up his wares in cases he has made on purpose, and, with the help of his old pony, he will be far away in some hiding place-before any officer can be on the spot. What can we do?" moaned the distressed woman.

"I know what I shall do, at any rate," answered the girl, "I will go up to the knoll myself right away and tell him if he is not gone by to-morrow night I'll make it too hot for him to remain."

And Marjerie was as good as her word.

On the following evening, just at the time when the quiet country folks were all busy over their respective suppers, a sudden flash of fire might be seen bursting through the bonds of green that wreathed the mountain side, shooting up the giant stems that stood like sentinels in every hollow, stretching their bare and gaunt arms as if to protect the younger green at their feet; dried lichens, leaves and twigs crackled and snapped in the sudden heat; while smoke curled up above the tongues of fire, thickening the air and spreading a lurid glare over the atmosphere. It all came with the suddenness as of an explosion, although there was no explosive sound to the sight that met the view.

Every backwoods-man came running from his homestead towards the knoll, from whence the flames emerged; it was no clearing-burn such as they saw every day, and those who had timber claims farther up the mountain trembled for their property.

The Douglas family were interested watchers with their neighbors, but the father was sick, and could not leave his couch; so Marjerie stayed with him, going in and out that she might bring him news if the flames spread their way. They smouldered quietly down, however, leaving blue smoke only to tell the tale.

As her mother came in, showing by her face that she knew all, Marjerie went up to her, saying, "That was a Sabbath day clearance of vile merchandise, wasn't it, mother? Smith won't bring any more up here, I guess."

Whereat the small Dick chimed in: "I saw Mr. Smith ride off on his pony as fast as he could tear, for fear he would get burnt too with all his tent—full of whisky."

Douglas, who had a trick, when he was sick, especially when his nerves were upset with bad spirits, of living in the past and calling up the old legends of his clan, called Marjerie to him and stroking her auburn hair, that the rays of the setting sun had given a rosier hue, said, "The old saying of four centuries ago has come true; the Red Douglas has put down the Black. Thank God, I am safe again, and my little maid with the auburn hair has made me safe."

SOME TEMPERANCE WORKERS.

No. I.

Cardinal Manning.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

The central figure of this century in the Catholic church, so far as temperance is concerned, is Cardinal Manning (born 1808, died 1892). He was preëminently the peoples' cardinal, for he threw himself heart and soul into every measure that he thought would benefit those on whom the stress of life lies heaviest.

In 1866 he formed a temperance association; in 1867 he organized a society which pledged men and women not to enter a public house on Saturday and Sunday; in 1871 he made his first speech in favor of local option, and in 1872 he took the final plunge and signed the total abstinence pledge. He did this on the only true ground for every "moderate," that he had no right to ask a man to do that which he was not ready to do himself. In his eightieth year he used these words: "I have for years, I say it openly and boldly, been a fool for Christ's sake in the matter of intoxicating drink, and so I hope to die." On his death-bed he charged his doctors to give him no alcohol.

The example of the great Father Mathew had great weight with the Cardinal. In a speech at Exeter Hall, October 10, 1876, at a meeting to celebrate Father Mathew's birthday, he said:

"In April, 1858, he (Father Mathew) made up his mind to found our first temperance society. He called a meeting, but not many attended. He said to those who came, 'I have called you together here that with me you may renounce the use of all intoxicating drinks. These drinks are not necessary to health; no man needs them, and for the sake of those who perish, and as we would save our souls and give glory to God, let us renounce them altogether.' After a pause he added the words you all know, 'Here goes in the name of God!' and he wrote his name down first. There were sixty names written down. That night had been a discouragement at first, but Father Mathew's heart was too full of love and of God and of souls to be discouraged. Within three months twenty-five thousand persons had taken the pledge. Within nine months two hundred thousand had taken the pledge, and after passing over the whole face of Ireland there were two million of persons who had taken the pledge. He went to his old college at Maynooth, and there eight professors and two hundred and fifty students took the pledge. He was appealed to by many priests to come and help them in this matter. There was no coldness, no jealousy, no suspicion, no distrust; they implored him to come and help them to save souls that were perishing in drink. . . . . Upon his death-bed Father Mathew received the first tidings of the founding of the United Kingdom Alliance, and when he heard of it he said that his soul rejoiced. 'This I know,' he cried, 'that this work is beyond the power of any individual; it can be done only by the organization of multitudes.' . . . . About ten years ago it chanced to me that certain men whom I did not know and had never seen came to lay before me this whole question of temperance. A long conversation convinced me that it was my duty to make myself acquainted with the facts. I did so, and having become thoroughly persuaded that it is the duty of every Christian and every Catholic and every man who loves his fellows to do all that in him lies to put down the curse of drink which reigns over the fair fields and the happy homes of our country like a dominion of sin and death, a curse and pestilence, from that day I have feebly done what in me lies."

Cardinal Manning was not a one-sided temperance reformer. He took the all-round view that law and gospel must go hand in hand. I wish that those who object to law and politics, as weapons, would read the following from one of his addresses:

"I heartily congratulate the United Kingdom Alliance on the work that it has done. I said some years ago, when it was my first happiness to take part in its proceedings, that I looked upon the United Kingdom Alliance as a great Nasmyth's hammer which has struck a dent into the conscience of England, and that no less mighty agent could have done it. I do not believe that any man, or any number of men, without organization, without local establishments and centers, without a perpetual agency in word and in writing, could by any manner of means have roused the conscience of this country to know and to acknowledge the real curse which is upon us—I mean the multiplication from year to year of centers in which intoxicating drink is sold, and the increase in every year of that enormous capital by which intoxicating drink is produced. . . . .

"The name of Sir Robert Peel will be remembered by the people of England for that one act, when the names of financiers and diplomatists and statesmen will be forgotten; and I am firmly convinced that the name of any man who shall obtain for the people of England the legal power of the local option whereby Englishmen and Irishmen and Scotchmen shall be able to preserve their homes with all their sanctities, their families dearer to them than their lives, from this curse which desolates in the darkness, and this pestilence that destroys in the noonday, the name of that man will be loved and venerated; and as long as the English speech is spoken, and the British empire shall endure, his will be a name that will never be forgotten."

In summing up the argument for total abstinence none of our famous orators have made the point more clear or convincing than Cardinal Manning. He says:

"In conclusion let me say that we have been created in the image and likeness of God. He has given us an intelligence which reflects the divine reason, we have a heart given to us that is capable of love to God and man, we have a will given to us whereby to originate our own actions. Satan will tempt a man to commit all manner of sins, but so long as the reason is clear and the conscience is tender and the will is firm, he will not prevail—the grace of God will prevent him. He will not tempt at first to any great or gross sin; he is too crafty to frighten the soul; he is often successful because he is stealthy and cunning. But of all the temptations which were ever devised was never any found so potent or universal, so irremediable, as that which man has manufactured for him in a poison which will darken the understanding, deaden the conscience, inflame the passions, weaken the will and reduce a man to a state in which he is capable of breaking any law of God and committing any imaginable sin. Happy then, are they who, when they come to lay their head upon their dying pillow, are able to look back and remember that their reason was never darkened, their conscience was never deadened and their will was never weakened by their voluntary fault. Happy will they be who have trained their little ones—their boys and girls—from childhood to walk in the same footsteps; for when their last hour is come they will be able to commend their offspring to the loving care of our Heavenly Father, with the consciousness that they, on their part at least, have done all that in them lay to preserve them from this danger."

THE BRAHMIN'S SURPRISE.

BY R. P. S.

[The following is from the pen of a gentleman who has closely followed woman's work in America, Europe and elsewhere, from the time of its inception.]

One can imagine the surprised wonder of a holy Brahmin at the great June gatherings of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union in London.

The time for the annual meeting has come. Nearly a thousand women delegates—one vessel alone bringing a hundred and fifty from America—have traveled, untrammeled by any surveillance, many of them from the most distant parts of the earth. Australia, New Zealand, India, China and the Isles of the Sea send their best women.

They meet in halls holding two thousand, three thousand, and even ten thousand seats, and thousands seek in vain for entrance to the evening meetings. They are presided over by a lady of rank from the innermost circle of the English Court, and by a lady from America, who has gathered under her presidency a quarter of a million women, earnest in every good way and work. About five hundred pulpits are placed at their command for Sunday services in this city of five million inhabitants, for which, however, they can supply but two hundred competent women speakers.

Great publishing offices in Chicago and London, issuing many periodicals, send showers like the autumn leaves in number, leaflets, tracts, books, around the world by scores or even hundreds of tons. In Chicago their gathering-place is the "Woman's Temple," built at a cost of a million dollars. State legislatures feel their power, and at their entreaty pass enactments restricting or abolishing the drink traffic, and enforcing systematic instruction as to its evils in the public schools. The government of Great Britain also is feeling the power of this vast combination for the protection of the home and the country.

To the Oriental observer, these great annual meetings may at first seem but for "talkee-talkee"—speeches, votes, resolutions, the expenditure of a little breath. But when its members separate, it is to carry to thousands of communities around the globe the sacred impulse to works of mercy and beneficence received at the central meetings. It was the saying of George Fox, the first of the Quakers, that "one man of faith must always shake the community for ten miles around him." Then what may we not expect from the united, systematized and well directed efforts of these thousands of women acting systematically under the experienced guidance of this society?

Of one unit of this great company—a woman not above the average in ability, a tender and faithful mother, a loving wife to an excellent man—I would say a word, as giving an example of the effect upon and through the individual of this admirable organization of which I have spoken.

She was quiet and retiring. She had brought up her children with a mother's exclusive and excluding devotion. Ecclesiastically she lived in the silence-through-the-centuries (for woman) of the Presbyterian Church, which "suffered not a woman to speak," however great her gift, however full her heart. The wave of the woman's temperance crusade reached the town of her residence. As a preliminary step, women were called together to hold meetings for conference and prayer, each attender being expected in succession to preside. So terrible was the ordeal that for a fortnight before her turn came this strong and healthy matron would find herself an invalid, and, on the prayer-meeting day, scarcely able to walk. Gradually she lost the terrible diffidence of self-consciousness, and found the courage of self-forgetful enthusiasm for the work laid out for her.

About her, as everywhere, were the wrecks of once happy homes, pathetic scenes of degradation of the man and of the misery of the wife and children. The cause lay in three taverns and a score of even less respectable drinking saloons. Guided by the impulse and instructions of the central society, she and a few other women prayed, persuaded, protested, persevered, and placed at length a complete restriction on the sale of liquor. The now courageous leader had been formerly the timid, over-diffident woman, to whom speaking aloud in the presence of a few other women had once meant a fortnight of previous nervous indisposition.

The granting of licenses was at the option of the city council. One by one the electors were persuaded to vote for non-license councilors, until at length the deciding vote lay with a single member, a butcher. The woman waited on him and told him that if, by his casting vote, he opened the drinking houses to their husbands and sons they would buy no meat of him. Naturally he absented himself from the council meetings, and licenses were withheld from all but the three large taverns. Curiously the tavern keepers had joined the women in closing the score of smaller competitors. The following year the owners of the drinking saloons, in revenge, joined the women in gaining a refusal of license to the three taverns, and so the work of temperance was accomplished by the aid of its enemies.

So complete was the exclusion of liquor that boys grew up into manhood without having even tasted or seen intoxicants. Confirmed drunkards went to neighboring towns to carouse, and, coming home, protected their sons by voting against license. In one year ninety-five thousand dollars were spent in freehold homes for workmen's residences. Later, this temperance matron opened evening schools and amusement rooms for the boys of the town, and soon, by the gift of one of the principal owners of the town, a building costing twenty thousand dollars was placed at her disposal, with its lecture, reading, library and bath rooms.

This romance of philanthropy, the story of one of five hundred thousand members of this woman's society, is a solitary instance or type of numberless matrons whose best faculties have been awakened and directed by this "W. W. C. T. U.," presided over by two able and consecrated women, one American and one English, who receive a well-earned loyal devotion, obedience and affection, perhaps unprecedented in the history of associations for philanthropic ends.

What must be the feelings of our Brahmin onlooker, as he returns to lands in which one-half of the communities are mothers at twelve, old women at thirty, life-long prisoners, the helpless young wife-slaves of men oftentimes the half of a century older than themselves; and when he compares their degradation with the emancipation of Anglo-Saxon women? But, leaving this extreme case aside, may we not beg men, everywhere, to ask themselves whether they are not the enemies of humanity, and of their own offspring, in so far as they deny their rightful position to the women of their own communities.

WILLARD HALL NOONTIDE LINKS.

The tide is rolling in at Willard Hall, and on each day's crest I see a sign of victory. Singers and gifted men and women are offering themselves for work, and among those who have given of their talents are the Chicago Temperance Quartette, who sang sweetly and helpfully, and that means much, for I hold that souls can be sung into the kingdom of God as well as talked in.

. . . . . .

Our audiences increase in numbers from day to day. Thirty-five people have stood for prayers, and eighteen professed conversion, and ten signed the pledge within the last six weeks, and then when the leader was tired the Lord sent us a man after His own heart, A. H. Kaylor, and if I should say very many excellent things about him he would deserve them all.

. . . . . .

He is a man thirty-eight years of age, wondrously consecrated, and possesses leadership in a remarkable degree.

Learning that he was to be in the city for a time, I asked him to come to the noon meetings and help. "What will be your terms, Mr. Kaylor?"

"Oh, I never mention terms. I left those things with God when I gave all to Him."

Educated for the law, he brings to his work a well trained mind, in addition to his eloquence and Irish wit. I have secured him for six weeks, beginning September 1, and only wish the way was clear to keep him all this winter. Here is one of his thought gems:

"I don't know what being born again is, neither do you. This I know, where once I was blind, I now see, and if you were to take the Bible from me, leaving me only the third chapter of John, I would pin my faith to that chapter, and meet you at the gate when 'the King comes in.'"

. . . . . .

Oh, if all who read this would send a gift for the noonday meetings quick, the load would be lifted from the woman bending beneath it, and God's name be glorified.

Beloved, steady your faith in the woman who built the Temple, and hold up her hands.

Marion B. Baxter,

BAY VIEW AND MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Dear Union Signal:—It is not possible within the brief space of this report to give an adequate idea of the wise things that were said at Bay View, and the enthusiasm with which they were received. Mrs. Grout's address on "Our Relation to Other Reforms" was a fine presentation of our many-sided work and the underlying causes of its many-sidedness; Miss Brehm's "When, Where and How to Work" was crowded so full of practical suggestions that it left the audience in no doubt as to what had made her so successful a district president; Mrs. Earle's two papers, on "Effective and Defective Methods" and "The Rights of Children," showed great depths of thought as well as wonderfully felicitous expression; Mrs. McWhirter, in "The Local Union and its Needs," roused all her hearers to an enthusiasm well-nigh commensurate with her own; Mrs. Hollister's parliamentary drills proved her an adept in that most exacting of sciences, while Dr. Mary Wood Allen's addresses were what might have been expected from the author of "Teaching Truth." The symposiums were exceedingly interesting, and there was great freedom in discussion from first to last. The presence of Mrs. P. J. Howard, district president, was of invaluable assistance. She cared for the music, was a most interested and interesting participant in the discussions, as well as a gracious dispenser of hospitality at the well-appointed Howard House. Many other Michigan women were present, and among the number must be mentioned Mrs. Helen M. Woodruff, whose contribution on "What has the W. C. T. U. done for Woman?" was of the most helpful nature.

The school of methods, or institute, as it was named last year, held from July 18 to 24, July 22 being W. C. T. U. Day, with an address at two p. m. in the Auditorium by this chronicler on, "The Mission of the W. C. T. U. to the Church." The other sessions were held in beautiful Evelyn Hall at 9:10 and three each day. The attendance was large throughout, and the interest continually increasing. There were attendants from ten different states and our good brothers lent us their kindly presence at nearly every session. Chief among the latter must be mentioned Mr. F. T. McWhirter, chairman of the Indiana State Prohibition Committee, who was quite as invaluable in his services as his beautiful little wife herself. The reports in The Daily Assembly Record were very full and of a most appreciative nature. Altogether, from the genial superintendent, Mr. John M. Hall, down, we met only kindness and consideration, and I am very sure that the beautiful resolution of thanks to the conductor and workers, which was offered by Mrs. Howard, could have been duplicated by us each one in thanks to those whose sympathetic presence and helpful words have been such a constant inspiration. Bay View is an ideal spot; I shall always see it, I think, as it looked at the Sunday evening vesper service on the shores of that beautiful bay—with the glory of the sunset reflected back from two thousand earnest faces, and the peace of God over all.

In going from Bay View to Mountain Lake Park, I tested fully the truth of the old saying, "the longest way around is the shortest way there," for I had to return to Chicago and start afresh in order to reach the mountain top in time for the first meeting of the school, July 26. Mrs. A. S. Benjamin was my compagnon de voyage and no journey could be tedious beguiled by her wit and wisdom. Mrs. Stevens had preceded us by twenty-four hours and was ensconsed at Grace Hotel—our dear Jennie Smith's home—and thitherward we turned our steps

The program of Mountain Lake Park has already been given in these columns, so it is not necessary that I should refer to it now, other than to say that the realization more than fulfilled the promise, even though there were promised three General Officers, four state presidents, one World's and one National superintendent, one round-the-world missionary, a live Hindu, Eva Shontz and John G. Woolley!

There was no failure from first to last and all were at their best. I wish there were space for quotations from the minutes so well kept by Mrs. Morrow and Miss Palmer, but I can only say in passing that, in Mr. Woolley's three addresses there was a splendid progression of thought apparent from first to last. He began on Saturday with "Wine is a mocker"; on Sunday he held the church up before God and its duty in a way that made one feel as if the judgment day were at hand, while on Sunday evening he gave the tenderer side—the infinite love which seeks out the fallen, in a discourse upon the poor blind man by the wayside whom Jesus "saw." Never was the pathos of his own life-story given with more telling effect and never was it more clearly manifest that he was God-called and God-commissioned for this especial work.

Mr. Rutnam delighted all. He is an exceedingly interesting speaker, handling the English language with fluency and fire. He ought to have many calls while in this country and can be addressed for dates and terms at 128 E. 23d St., New York city.

Miss Palmer's addresses were exceedingly interesting and gave us a feeling of kinship with South Africa which was good for our souls. She will tell her story at the Baltimore Convention and will, I hope, be given a wide hearing all over the country.

To praise Mrs. Benjamin's parliamentary drills is to gild refined gold, while her all around ability as shown in her bright, piquant speeches, answers to questions, etc., was quite as striking as her parliamentary skill. Miss Shontz's evening was a delight; it could not be otherwise as she is unquestionably the queen of recitationists. Mrs. Stevens was her calm, capable self—equal, one constantly felt, to any emergency; wise in word and deed and kindly as wise. Mrs. Beauchamp's unusual platform ability was very clearly manifest as well as her fine power of imparting her own intense enthusiasm. Mesdames Griffith, Haslup, Morrow and La Fetra formed a corps of workers rarely equaled, as was manifested in all that they did, while the white-ribboners in the school itself were quick with questions and suggestion alike.

A pleasant surprise came to us in the presence of Mrs. Emily L. McLaughlin for over Sunday on her way from Moundsville. She conducted the 9:30 testimony meeting in her own charming way. Jennie Smith was to have led it but she was praying for us from her bed of pain. She has been very ill but was slowly gaining when we left so that we had the benediction of a glimpse of her face, filled with the divine peace even in suffering.

I must not fail to speak of the constant kindness which attended us from the moment of our arrival until our departure. The cordiality of Rev. Dr. Baldwin's words of greeting gave the keynote to the days, and from every one with whom we came into contact we met a consideration and a helpfulness which can never be forgotten. Even in that greatest test of kindness—the pocketbook—the audiences responded to our need with a generosity which left us almost breathless. We should especially chronicle our gratitude to Mr. Rudisill, the superintendent; the Rev. John Thompson, of the board of directors; Mrs. Hayden, president of the local union; Mrs. Belle C. Harmison, who cared for the music; Miss Harris and Mr. and Mrs. Dunshill, but indeed, kindness came from so many sources and so constantly, it is impossible to give credit without seeming to discriminate.

At the closing service on Tuesday evening the following resolution was enthusiastically adopted:

Resolved, That at the last meeting of this school of methods, we, its conductors, teachers and members, extend our heartfelt thanks to the Mountain Lake Park Association for the cordial invitation which brought us to this beautiful place; for the warmth with which they have welcomed us and the kindly consideration constantly accorded.

To the local union, for the enthusiasm with which they have thrown themselves into the work of preparing for and carrying forward the school; for their cheerful zeal and unbounded kindness.

To the friends who have attended the meetings, taken part in the discussions, furnished the music and decorations, and especially to those who have contributed so liberally to the financial support of the school. The memory of the days spent in this beautiful spot will be an inspiration to us throughout the entire year, and we shall continue to pray that this mountain top may become more and more glorious because of the presence of God.

Mr. Rudisill then offered the following which was adopted by the entire audience:

Resolved, That we, the citizens of Mountain Lake Park desire to express the pleasure and gratification we have enjoyed by the presence of the officers of the National W. C. T. U. and their associates in the white ribbon movement in our midst.

That we express our gratitude for the most excellent program of the school of methods.

That we request the continuance of the school of methods for the season of 1896.

Mrs. Beauchamp announced that the general officers had decided to accept the invitation on behalf of the National W. C. T. U. It seemed to be a good night for resolutions for two followed immediately from Miss Palmer and Mrs. La Fetra which were adopted by a rising vote, the latter asking for the interference of this government in the matter of the Armenian atrocities and the appointment of a Christian governor; the former giving as the opinion of the assembly that a missionary department should be adopted by the National W. C. T. U.

So closed a most delightful and most helpful school of methods. No place could be more perfect than is Mountain Lake Park for such a gathering. So high above the world in its height of 2,800 feet; so bracing in its wonderful mountain air, so restful in the calm majesty of its glorious oaks. We were glad as we sang in closing, "God be with you till we meet again" to feel that there was hope of that meeting for another year.

I am resting, or trying to, for a few days in my own home before going on to Chautauqua, August 14 to 19, and after Chautauqua I hope to have two weeks of solid rest before going back to Chicago for the Convention campaign which already seems so close at hand.

Yours in the joy of service,
Boston, Mass., Aug. 7. Katharine Lente Stevenson.

OUR INTERESTS AT CHAUTAUQUA.

Dear White-Ribboners:—I wish you might all be transplanted into this center of culture and delight. In three hours you would feel like an old Chautauquan.

Let me take you for a walk across the grounds in the quiet morning hour. Down in the gymnasium dozens of students, young and old, are busy with their exercises, drills and lectures. In the great tent near by, the Boys' Club are enjoying a pleasant hour, perhaps studying under wise leadership, the flowers and leaves they have collected, perhaps listening to the music or remarks of some of the numerous great men who entertain Chautauqua audiences. It is a well known fact that not every great lecturer can address boys, and one lad very frankly remarked, after having listened to a talk by one of our great college presidents, "H'm, he's no 'big gun.'" One must have the "wisdom of a serpent," and the heart of a boy to address the Boys' Club.

Coming up the hill we will visit the Woman's Club, conducted by Emily Huntington Miller, where questions of vital interest to women are discussed. Sometimes you may hear a talk on "First Aid to the Injured," or a delightful home story by Pansy, or discussion of the question, "Why do not children reverence the Sabbath?"

As the chords of some old Handel chorus drift through the trees you hasten to Higgins' Memorial Hall, where the bright and attractive girls of Chautauqua meet every day to hear little informal talks on Books, College Settlements, Y. W. C. T. U., etc. This club is under the leadership of Miss Agnes Tathe, a graduate of Smith College and a teacher of English in the Woman's College, Baltimore. The club is divided into circles, the girls of which are companions in work, study and good times. One circle is named after our own dear Lady Somerset. On last Saturday I attended a reception given by this club. The room was beautiful with a profusion of ferns and flowers and tasteful furniture. A number of mothers were present, enjoying the courtesy of their daughters as they followed them with eager eyes about the room. I had such a pleasant talk, while I enjoyed my cup of tea with a Baltimore Y, who spoke in glowing colors of the preparations being made for our National Convention.

It has remained for Chautauqua to give a new meaning to the word club. Here it stands for social life, and for all that is best in a good club and a great deal more. There is a small woman's club where their little ladyships have lessons in swimming and gymnastics. The boys, too, swim, camp out and have great fun, all in the wise Chautauqua way. There is also the ministers' club, where the grave divines meet to exchange ideas and to enjoy each other's society in a social way.

We should be so happy to welcome you to our noonday prayer-meetings held in our beautiful national parlor. It is such a pleasant, cozy room. One of the college professors said one day as he was leaving, "This room is one of the brightest spots in Chautauqua." The college professors occasionally drop in to study or read a few minutes, and I sometimes suspect that they are not so absorbed in their books as they appear when some lively W. C. T. U. woman is discussing suffrage or Temple Wheels or scientific temperance instruction. We have disposed of nearly fifty Temple Wheels. More members have registered so far this year than for the whole season of 1894. We have a national flag with a bow of white ribbon flying before the door (unless it rains). Don't fail to visit your W. C. T. U. room when you come to Chautauqua; it is in Kellogg Hall.

You would have enjoyed hearing Mrs. Gehrhart, whose son is the greatest all-round athlete of this country, address the meeting on social purity, or Bishop Vincent, who led the meeting on Saturday. He said: "Only eternity will show the work of the W. C. T. U. I differ from Miss Willard on some points, but we should rise above all differences for the great end toward which we strive. Let us fight the saloon, and at the same time train our boys and girls to be virtuous. True safety comes only from within. We are glad to have this organization on our grounds; we are proud of you."

Monday we will hold a W. C. T. U. round table. This is not a five o'clock tea nor an "experience meeting." It is a reasoning together. How shall we interest people in our local work, how win new members?

The Sundays at Chautauqua are not to be compared with anything unless it be the great eternal rest day. The gates are locked and we almost forget that there is a busy, restless world beyond the hills. The best of all is the vesper service held in "the hall in the grove." The peace of Chautauqua is upon us. Scarcely a sound is heard and then the great audience sing as with one voice, "Day is Dying in the West" and we seem to feel once more among us the sweet presence of our white-ribbon sisterhood.

The anniversary of the original assembly of 1874 was celebrated to-night. Chautauqua has reached her majority and old Chautauquans shook hands, congratulating themselves upon the success of their beloved child. "Who will ever forget the wondrous rainbow divinely presaging the noble future of the child so admirably matured?"

President Lewis Miller's greeting was, "Chautauqua for liberty of thought; for a higher outlook for all the people; a more liberal spirit between the churches; greater sociability in the churches; for using all God's material for His upbuilding; for placing more emphasis on the second commandment and in so doing lifting higher the first; holding to the assurance of the Book that all people are aiming for the same heaven."

Bishop Vincent said: "We from the beginning sought to impress upon the minds of the people that this was not a camp-meeting, but our Chautauqua life is prosecuted with a view to the life spiritual and the life eternal. May we never forget the keynote in the beginning, and with all our gain never lose the high ideal of Christian living which we have sought to present from the very first."

Dr. W. W. Wythe: "I had the honor of entertaining at the second assembly Miss Frances E. Willard as my guest. I shall never forget a conversation I had with her one morning when she told me how she had spent almost the entire night previous in wrestling with God that she might have a clearer conception of what her life's work was to be. She had the revelation. It came as the revelation came to Jacob, and she came out of her room that morning with her face all radiant with the conviction of what she was to do for God and for humanity. There in that little cottage she received the anointing that sent her forth throughout the civilized world as the nineteenth century apostle of reform and purity. Blessed things have been cradled here at Chautauqua. I know of scarcely anything that touches humanity that has not been, not only discussed, but promulgated and sent forth from this great centre."

This is Chautauqua! O beloved birthplace of our organization, white-ribboners love thee, our work is one.

NEW YORK NOTES.

Dear Union Signal:—For nearly two months the Sunday excise law has been thoroughly enforced in this city. It is needless to say that the brewers and saloon-keepers have made a great deal of noise about it and have fought the police board, who is responsible for the enforcement, with all the ability that their paid attorneys possess. Their first move was an appeal to the mayor to override the action of the police board. This the mayor refused to do. Governor Morton was next urged to call an extra session of the legislature to repeal the Sunday closing clause of the excise law. Governor Morton, too, refused. Then one effort followed another to weaken the enforcement of the law, but all without success. President Roosevelt, of the police board, is generally regarded as responsible for the determined enforcement of the law, although the entire board is a unit on the matter.

This period of enforcement has been attended with several very interesting object lessons. The first was the personal appeal of about fifty public officials, politicians and influential public citizens, to the mayor to issue an order to stop the rigid enforcement of the law. President Roosevelt rightly denounced these advocates of Sunday saloons before the mayor in their presence, as the "allies of the lawless." The next deplorable exhibition was made by the daily newspapers. Not one of all the morning and evening papers championed the Sunday closing of saloons. Several mildly supported President Roosevelt on the ground that as the law was on the statute books it should be enforced. More, however, took the indefensible position that the law is unjust and should be disregarded. One of the leading dailies has gone so far as to declare that the situation justified mob insurrection. It is gratifying to know that the efforts of the politicians and the press have been unsuccessful.

But there is a brighter side. The liquor dealers have lost their strongest argument at Albany. For years it has been claimed that Sunday saloon sales could not be suppressed in New York city, and this has been time and time again advanced as the chief reason why the front doors of ten thousand saloons should swing wide open on a portion of each Sabbath. This argument can no longer be used with effect. The law has been thoroughly enforced for two months and will continue to be as long as the police board is determined that it shall be. No one now claims that the law is a failure; on the other hand its success is generally conceded and this means a good deal for law and order, for if Sunday saloons can be closed in cosmopolitan New York they can be anywhere. Again, it was predicted that the enforcement of the law would result in the "laying in" on Saturday of a stock of beer and stronger liquors and in the end more would be sold than under the old system, and consequently intemperance and crime would increase. The brewers and wholesale liquor dealers bear evidence that the sale of beer and distilled liquors has decreased enormously. President Roosevelt has produced the following official figures to show that drunkenness and disorderly conduct have decreased on four Sundays under the new board compared with the old:

| | April 7. | April 14. | April 21. | April 28. |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Males | 45 | 78 | 63 | 63 |
| Females | 28 | 13 | 26 | 26 |
| Total | 73 | 91 | 89 | 89 |
| | June 30. | July 7 | July 14. | July 21. |
| Males | 35 | 29 | 61 | 46 |
| Females | 4 | 9 | 7 | 5 |
| Total | 39 | 38 | 68 | 51 |

Grand Totals—First four Sundays, 342; second four Sundays, 196. Decrease under enforcement, 146.

These statistics must have influence even at Albany.

Mr. Charles R. Skinner, state superintendent of public instruction, has pursued a most extraordinary course toward the present mandatory temperance educational law. When the bill was introduced at Albany he lobbied against it. After it had passed both houses and was in Governor Morton's hand awaiting his signature to make it a law, Mr. Skinner went before the governor and besought him to veto it. Governor Morton signed the bill, but Superintendent Skinner did not cease his opposition. At the late meeting of the state Teachers' Association he is said to have inspired a series of resolutions against the law which was passed by the association. The resolutions denounce the new law as "contrary to all principles of correct teaching," as an "insult to the teachers of the state and a menace to the principles of free school teaching" and a call for the appointment of a committee of fifteen "to organize and make all honorable effort for the repeal of this vicious and obnoxious law." The most extraordinary of these resolutions are the following which practically counsels disobedience to the law:

Resolved, That as the provisions of this law call for the perfunctory teaching of the subject for ten weeks of the school year, we advise all teachers and trustees to follow the plan of teaching physiology heretofore pursued until the next legislature shall have an opportunity to repeal the present law.

Resolved, That we advise the teachers and trustees, while awaiting the result of the efforts for repeal, to purchase no new textbooks on physiology; and if such purpose become necessary at the beginning of the last ten weeks of the school session, we advise the purchase of those books only on which no royalty is paid for certain so-called indorsement.

These resolutions were introduced by a friend of Superintendent Skinner. It is evident that the friends of the present law cannot watch the state superintendent too closely if they wish to retain on the statute books and secure the enforcement of the law that they have struggled so hard to obtain. Mrs. C. B. Hopkins.

Dear Comrades:—I find a question before me that covers so much territory, I am sure we will be warranted in spending some time in consideration thereof. It is this: "What books and papers do our local superintendents of the evangelistic Sunday-school and scientific temperance instruction departments require for their instruction?" First, let us help out the EVANGELISTIC SUPERINTENDENT.

Her work as outlined in the Annual Leaflet is: "To keep brightly burning upon our altars the sacred fire which was kindled in the Crusade. To train spiritually the individual worker. To permeate, by its devotional services, Bible readings and consecration, all other departments with the evangelistic spirit. To arouse the church. To reach the masses by visitation, Gospel missions and conferences, Crusade Bands, wayside services in jails, halls, cottages, depots, etc. To enlist more women who shall preach the gospel, and to train the workers."

First, last and all the time—the Bible, though this "goes without saying." But, perhaps, while the private reading and study of the Bible by our workers is not slighted, are there arrangements made by the evangelistic department to furnish copies of the Bible to newly converted men and women? I would say to the sister who asked the question, obtain a fund from the union, if possible, whereby she can supply Bibles when needed.

Our National superintendent of this department, Miss E. W. Greenwood, 151 Remsen street, Brooklyn, N. Y., has a book of Hints and Helps for Evangelistic Workers. Write for it. The W. T. P. A. issues a set of Evangelistic Leaflets at the low rate of fifteen cents per hundred, as well as many others, valuable for instruction or distribution. Send for a catalogue and study it.

Aside from your Union Signal and state W. C. T. U. organ, you should read carefully one or two leading religious periodicals, so as to keep in touch with the evangelistic movements of the day outside of the W. C. T. U.

Keep on hand Gospel tracts for judicious distribution. Correspondence with our W. C. T. U. evangelists—the Annual Leaflet gives the names and addresses of seventeen—will elicit helpful replies, and your state, district and county superintendents doubtless have helps of which they will be glad to tell you.

Familiarize yourself with the Gospel Hymns and own two or three copies, that the songs of Zion may not lag as far as you are concerned.

Have you a copy of the White Ribbon Hymnal? You can secure it of the W. T. P. A. for thirty-five cents.

DEPARTMENT OF SUNDAY-SCHOOL WORK.

Get Anna Gordon's "Questions Answered," which will tell you all about Loyal Temperance Legions, how to organize them, etc. Get a W. T. P. A. catalogue and study the lists of leaflets, "Little Folks' Leaflets," and "Picture Leaflets" for distribution, fifteen cents per hundred.

For your own use buy a copy of "Bible Temperance Studies," by M. Josephine Griffith, for sale by the W. T. P. A., price forty cents. This has been adopted as a textbook in the W. C. T. U. evangelistic course of study, and is indispensable in almost any department.

Add to your Union Signal your subscription to The Young Crusader. This little monthly for the children publishes a quarterly temperance lesson supplement, designed to aid teachers and superintendents, and the unions are glad to recommend it to Sunday-schools. The Young Crusader is only twenty cents a year in clubs of ten or more, and twelve cents in clubs of fifty. Every superintendent in the department of Sunday-school work should be familiar with the dates and topics of the quarterly temperance lesson. Become familiar with The Young Crusader so that you can recommend it and its supplements to Sunday-schools.

Mrs. Stella B. Irvine, National superintendent of this department, 300 the Colonnade, St. Paul, Minn., issues very helpful circulars and circular letters, which you could secure through your state superintendent. Mrs. Irvine especially recommends the use of National Leaflets, Nos. 20 and 21. (W. T. P. A.)

SCIENTIFIC TEMPERANCE INSTRUCTION.

In The Union Signal you will find news and notes from time to time of victories and plans for victories in this department. Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, 23 Trull Street, Boston, our National superintendent, furnishes "Monthly Advices." You can doubtless secure these through your state superintendent. Get a cut of Mrs. Hunt's map, a copy of your state school laws, the printed minutes of local Board of Education meetings, so that you can study state and local conditions. Again!—consult the W. T. P. A. catalogue.

To one and all I would say, as I have said many times in one form and another, study the National Minutes, State Minutes, Union Signal and state organ, the Annual Leaflet and the W. T. P. A. catalogue. Each of these you must have to be an efficient worker. Besides this, besiege book stores, borrow your rich neighbor's helpful books and magazines, ransack the public library and read the newspapers.

Dig for information, and you will be sure to find it.

Mother Experience.

"What stands it for—this building wrought of tears,
Of hopes and aspirations? Ah, it means
The voicing forth of every high ideal;
The living out of every hope inlived
By the All-brooding Mind. It means the sure
Opening of prison doors to all who're bound;
The healing of sad eyes now blind in sin;
It means the reign of righteousness and truth—"

The readers of Temple Items will miss Mrs. Carse's inspiring words in this column for a few weeks, but we sometimes appreciate our blessings more if they are removed for a time. Mrs. Carse is having a much needed rest in a quiet spot in Michigan. I send her a daily account of the Wheels returned and money received. Will you not make it possible for me to tell her that the amount is constantly increasing? Fill your Wheels as rapidly as possible. Our yearly financial statement for the Convention will be made up to the first of October this year, and between now and then we ought to receive at least ten thousand dollars. It means a small effort on the part of each one and such a wonderful help to Mrs. Carse.

The following unions have sent the amounts credited to them to be applied on their pledges: South Bend, Wash., $20; Yardley, Pa., $20; Cuba, N. Y., $20, and two Temple Wheels; St. Joseph, Mich., $25; Menominee, Mich., $25. Catharine B. Boswell, the treasurer of Menominee union, writes: "We are but a weak handful; none of us rich in this world's goods, but, oh, how rich in faith that the Lord rules and will have compassion, and in His own good time will not let our work done in His name come to naught."

Mason City, Ill., sends $30.10; Putnam, Conn., $50; Waldoboro, Maine, $25. The treasurer, Emma T. Potter, writes that they will send the balance as soon as they can, "for we realize how much need there is for us to be diligent in business and help Mrs. Carse. She is in the right and we must hold up her hands and comfort her heart." Mrs. Martha Keighley, of Vineland, N. J., sends fifty dollars, making seventy-five on her hundred dollar pledge. Fifteen dollars has been received from the Florence, N. J., union, completing $100, to put Mrs. Ella M. Thacher's name on a tablet in Willard Hall. The full amount was raised by the L. T. L. children and the union. Seventeen dollars and seventy-five cents is received from the fifth district, Michigan, to be applied on Mr. Benjamin's tablet.

A good W. C. T. U. woman in New York state writes a beautiful letter accompanying a gift of $100. She does not want her name published. She says: "I am doing it for the dear Lord's sake and not for show." Maude McLennan, a little girl seven years old, sends us a wheel which she filled in about half an hour. She asks for the game of checkers which we have sent her. Our stock of Pixie games is exhausted and we shall not be able to get any more. Please bear this in mind when ordering your premiums. We have only a few more checkers left so little people who want this game must send their wheels in very soon.

The following persons have forwarded their July coupons on the Temple Trust Bonds as a gift to the Temple: Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, Mrs. Cornelia E. Moorhead, Margaret A. Phelps, Mrs. Lucy C. Nichols, Mrs. J. M. Abrams, Miss Mary C. Abrams, Miss Hattie E. Abrams, Mary E. Niny, Alice Caldwell, Mrs. Emma E. Call, Mrs. H. B. Chambers, Mary E. and Ruth H. Hammond, Mrs. M. J. Work. Miss Cornelia M. Dow, the daughter of our "Grand Old Man," Neal Dow, sends her July coupon and says: "I do wish that every white-ribboner would take hold of this matter and clear off the debt by January, 1896. It might easily be done if each would do her part, and I believe it will be done. I feel sorry for those who hold back because they will not have the satisfaction of knowing at the end that they did what they could. I am sure you will live to see the completion of your desire in this great enterprise." Mr. B. F. Leeds not only sends his coupons, but adds eight dollars to the amount in order to make $44, which completes the $100 promised by Miss Sarah Arletta Packard, the good woman who travels about the country and had secured $56 toward what she calls the "Erratic W. C. T. U." Mr. Leeds' gift, according to his wish, completes the amount.

The following resolution was passed at the late state convention of the Michigan W. C. T. U.:

Whereas, We believe the Temperance Temple as National Headquarters and as a source of permanent revenue to back the National and state unions is an enterprise worthy of our great society, and

Whereas, The question in regard to management and its ultimate ownership by the National union has been satisfactorily answered,

Resolved, That this convention express its hearty indorsement of the undertaking.

All orders for Temple Wheels, mite-boxes, and Baby Band lists, and everything pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, The Temple, Chicago. Send two-cent stamp for either the Temple Wheel or mite-box. Money orders and checks should be made out in the name of Mr. G. B. Shaw, treasurer, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson Room 1111, The Temple, Chicago.

MY OTHER BOY.

BY MARY HUBBARD HEATH.

My boys know not that while they stand
  Expectantly beside my knee,
Between their heads of black and brown,
  Another sunny head I see.

And when their eyes look up to mine—
  Black eyes and blue, so full of joy,
My eyes, though dim with tears, can see
  The brown eyes of another boy.

The sweet brown eyes in which the light
  So suddenly had ceased to shine,
When God had harshly seemed to say,
  "Daughter, he is not thine but Mine."

. . . . . .

The heads of black and brown rise higher,
  As year by year speeds on its way.
Black eyes and blue more thoughtful shine
  As life grows wider every day.

And as I mark each change, I see,
  The sunny head lift higher, too,
The brown eyes sweeter, wiser, gleam,
  As heavenly visions greet their view.

Dear hearts! Come, let us closer lean,
  Learning our lessons line by line;
Now I have learned at last to say,
  "Dear Lord, the boys are Thine and mine."

THE PROBLEM OF DISTRIBUTION SOLVED.

BY FAITH TRYON.

Mrs. Rayburn sat with perplexed face holding twenty-eight leaflets in her hand. She had just come home from the W. C. T. U. meeting. "I am afraid I was foolish to take these. How am I ever to use them," she said, "and how am I likely to do a 'world of good' with them?" She glanced at their unfamiliar titles with a doubtful shake of her head. "I don't believe I was cut out for a tract distributor anyway."

So she tucked them carefully out of sight lest her fun loving husband should find them, and find a fund of amusement over her prospective "tract peddling."

The Priceville union was blessed with one of those troublesome comforts, an enthusiast, and this one's whole soul flamed with zeal to put temperance papers, books, leaflets—any thing that would tell a temperance story—into the hands of the great "everybody" as yet unwakened on this subject. For she felt certain, this Mrs. Dyckman, that reading the gospel of temperance is only a prelude to believing it. Thus it had speedily come to pass that she became the superintendent of literature for the union. The president saying hopefully, "I am glad you have this work, you are so exactly suited to it. I hope you will push it as earnestly as you can."

So Mrs. Dyckman began to study catalogues and consider conditions, and at the next week's meeting said, "In looking over the work I find the first need in the matter is money with which to buy literature. To buy much will take more money than our treasury can well give at present. Speaking of this to several of our friends they have said: 'Why, here! I'll give you something to help buy literature if the union wants to distribute it.' And so I already have two dollars. Shall I go on and gather a fund for this special purpose, as much as I can, and then buy literature for us all to distribute as widely as we can?"

Two weeks later this enthusiast had a neat little package of twenty-eight leaflets ready for each member.

"One a day for four weeks," she said, "and you can have more for the asking any time. I have thought of this for a trial plan, and I do hope every one will work at it earnestly that we may see how much it is good for. And here is a catalogue for each one of you, so that in future if you make your own selections, I can order for you just whatever you prefer."

Mrs. Rayburn's package proved to be "all sorts."

"I think I had better read them all so as to know whether they will fit the case any and everywhere," she said, and this careful, conscientious thought was not only the key that solved her first perplexed queries, but turned the work into a positive pleasure and service for the Master.

Three in her package were "Loyal Leaflets." They went one by one to the little boy that brought her milk every day, and after each one they had a lively talk about the story and the truth it contained.

"The Teacher Helped," and "Safety for School Children" was enclosed in a letter to a niece, teaching in another state. "Is Cider Harmless," helped her boy Ralph to respect and believe in that part of the pledge better than ever before. Ralph carried it around in his pocket to use, whenever the subject came up, to convince other boys. A half-dozen leaflets on tobacco were eagerly appropriated by a teacher in a mission Sunday-school. "I've the nicest class of boys," said this teacher; "dreadful boys, all of them, but I think the world of them. They all use tobacco, and I want to get everything I can on this subject to convince and persuade them of the evil of it. Poor fellows! They have been brought up to it almost."

A leaflet upon non-alcoholics in medicine went into a doctor's hands, with a request for his opinion as to the soundness of its statements, and "Bible Wines" in the hands of her pastor became the basis of a talk for temperance in the mid-week prayer-meeting. The kind-hearted, round-faced German who brought her vegetables took back with him a "Picture Leaflet" for his children, and one couched in friendly but convincing terms about beer, printed in German, was given to him for himself.

"Liquor on the Congo" and "A Modern Devil's Mission" were eagerly read by the president of the missionary society, who straightway brought out their ideas at the next meeting. Mrs. Rayburn's next door neighbor, a grocer, and an earnest Christian man, said, as he examined the few leaflets that still remained in her leaflet-box, "I tell you, the thing that don't get done is to scatter these seeds of truth among the country people. The town is preached to or worked upon in one way or another all the time by you good women, and these leaflets would be new and interesting to lots of country people who trade with me, I am sure. Why can't I help you about this a little? Give me fifty of the 'Drummer's Story,' for instance, and I'll wrap one up with the sugar or tea for each country customer next Saturday, and my word for it, they'll get read."

Thus in various ways, by simply knowing well what that leaflet-box contained and having her "thinking cap" on, Mrs. Rayburn found her opportunity of "not only planting the seed, but hoeing around the hill now and then to encourage growth," as her husband declared.

At the fourth union meeting after beginning this work space on the program had been made to allow members to discuss from experience the working of this plan. There was one member, who, with charming consistency, usually opposed aggressive work. "I never agreed to canvass the town with literature," she said, "and I could not think of any way to poke it at people that would not be sure to offend them. A good many that I know of seem to be hardened with a continual din of temperance talk, and I don't think it best to irritate them all the time."

Said the easy going member, "Why, I did not regard it that way, but I've been so busy with my painting and embroidery that I forgot all about it when I might have distributed any. I'll try to do better next month." But another was a dressmaker. Her testimony was on this wise: "I kept mine tacked up all over one side of my room, and whenever any one was waiting for her work I pointed there, and told them they were free. If they liked anything, take it and keep it. They all disappeared long ago,—not my customers, but the leaflets!"

Another, a school teacher, had exchanged and secured twenty-eight adapted to children's comprehension. Each Monday she put seven on her desk and allowed pupils to take and read them, and, if they wished, to keep and carry them home. "I could have used seventy instead of seven, if they had been there, I think."

Mrs. Mather had been off on an extended journey, and had taken her package and scattered its contents by giving them to lonesome-looking fellow travelers.

"My boy Hal helped me out," said Mrs. Horton. "He thought it was a fine idea to get people to reading these tracts. He is a 'born' temperance worker, anyway. He proposed to give them to the strangers on the streets the day the circus was in town. He made short work of it, and wished there had been more."

"But how are you coming out financially?" asked Mrs. Rayburn. "Suppose fifty of us keep this thing up at this rate for a year, what is it going to cost?"

"From fifty to a hundred dollars, if so many as that really do good service," replied Mrs. Dyckman. "But we can find the money. There is nothing our honorary members and friends more readily give to than this fund, I find. Try for yourselves the work of soliciting for it when you have a chance, and see how quick is the response. Help me gather the funds, and together we will do a good year's work in educating by means of these leaves."

"'Nothing but leaves,'" said the president, "but if we scatter them thick and fast, each with a prayer for blessing, they will be 'mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds.'"

"It's just lovely to learn how to work," said Mrs. Rayburn, as she went home from that meeting with twenty-eight more leaflets.

THE INFLUENCE OF A BIT OF WHITE RIBBON IN EUROPE.

BY CAROLINE RIEHL HUMPHREY.

When the writer was making preparations for a trip abroad with her daughter, the thought, "It will not be necessary to take a supply of white ribbon," suggested itself, for we were going to a wine-drinking country and in all probability after leaving London would find no sympathizers with the movement which it represents. Then the thought, "All the more need of it" decided the matter and we fastened on our little knots of white ribbon.

We boarded the good ship Mobile the 22d of April. Among the guests at our table was the second officer who occasionally drank, an English doctor who had his Scotch whisky, beer and wines brought on regularly, and a lady from New York, who enjoyed the contents of her claret bottle at each meal.

Opposite the array of bottles the two knots of white ribbon seemed to be preaching a sermon, for upon the second day out one of the guests alluded to the pretty little pin, asking an explanation of it, and then the conversation turned upon the movement of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. During the ten days that we were on shipboard not a day passed without one or more temperance discussions at table.

I would not have believed that bows of white ribbon worn by two women could have exerted such an influence in so short a time. After the third day all the bottles but the doctor's disappeared from the table.

One day I made the statement that the Beer and Wine Gazette had published an article advising saloon-keepers to locate as near as possible to public school buildings and to entice the boys in by giving them free soup and crackers, and a bit of sugar soaked in beer; at first they did not like the sugar very well but in time they became customers. When we arose from the table a gentleman from the table near us said, "I have been very much interested in the discussions at your table, but surely you don't mean to say that such advice was actually published?" His eyes were filled with tears as he added, "Terrible, terrible." He was an actor going to London to rest for the summer. His blood-shot eyes and florid complexion told plainer than words what his experience had been and the thought of enticing innocent boys to become what he was seemed to him indeed terrible.

At Furchhausen in Alsace, we spent considerable time at the home of our cousin, the minister of the village. Wine as usual was the beverage at meals. After a few days water took the place of wine except when there were other guests, and then apologies were always made for us by pointing to the white ribbon as our excuse for declining to "drink the health with wine."

We had always been told that the wines of Europe were pure and therefore harmless, but the fallacy of that assertion was clearly proven by the effects plainly visible on those imbibing the deceptive drink.

One afternoon we made a little excursion to an adjoining village, another parish where our cousin ministered. We called at the home of one of his elders, and as usual, wine was brought out. Upon our cousin explaining our temperance principles, pointing to the white ribbon, the good woman exclaimed: "And you, madam, have the appearance of very good health!" We replied that in our opinion that was the very reason why we were so well and could endure so much. In the course of conversation the woman spoke of having attended a funeral the week before, and that this was the third death in the same family within two years. We enquired what the disease was, and she answered, "Stomach trouble." Then she added: "During these last years the wine has been his strength."

Wherever we went it was a matter of astonishment that we drank water. Why, people washed their hands, faces, and clothing in water, but to drink it was "bien malsain!" We spent some two months in Andlau, a most picturesque town among the Vosges mountains. Sometimes on returning from an excursion to the mountains, or a visit to the jardin fruitier, where we had feasted upon the luscious fruit which grew there in abundance, we would call for a glass of water, and it was with great misgivings that our charming cousin would consent to our having it. In time, when she saw that we drank it with impunity, she seemed to take great interest in our discussions. She had never heard of the W. C. T. U., of Frances Willard or of Lady Henry Somerset! Before our departure we noticed that the wine began to be mixed with water, and, after our return to the homeland we sent her one of our best physiologies, having special reference to the effect of alcoholics and narcotics on the human system. Later we received a letter from her in which occurs this sentence: "I have ceased drinking wine."

My experience during the past year has convinced me that in no other way can we make our strength so felt as by the constant wearing of the white ribbon, and by being fearless and true to our convictions on all occasions.

BE THOROUGH, BOYS!

Whatsoever you find to do,
Do it, boys, with all your might!
Never be a little true,
Or a little in the right.
Trifles even
Lead to heaven,
Trifles make the life of man.
So in all things,
Great or small things,
Be as thorough as you can!

Let no speck their surface dim,—
Spotless truth and honor bright!
I'd not give a fig for him
Who says that any lie is white!
He who falters,
Twists or alters
Little atoms when he speaks,
May deceive me,
But, believe me,
To himself he is a sneak!

Help the weak, if you are strong;
Love the old if you are young!
Own a fault, if you are wrong;
If you're angry hold your tongue.
In each duty
Lies a beauty,
If your eyes you do not shut,
Just as surely
And securely,
As a kernel in a nut!

Whatsoe'er you find to do,
Do it, then, with all your might;
Let your prayers be strong and true—
Prayer, my lad, will keep you right.
Pray in all things,
Great and small things,
Like a Christian gentleman.
Fail you never,
Now or ever,
To be thorough as you can

MEG.

A True Story.

BY EMMA HARRIMAN.

Bertie's papa was not well. He looked pale, and when he walked his shoulders drooped. He coughed a great deal, too.

"You must go up in the mountains awhile," said the doctor. "Take your horse and buggy and go as slowly as you please, and camp out nights."

"I want to go, too, papa," said Bertie. "Please let me go."

"I believe I will," said papa. "It's going to be pretty lonesome work up there."

So one day they started. Bertie was delighted.

Squirrels ran about on every hand. Little owls sat beside their holes, for squirrels and owls lived together in the ground, and there were pretty pebbles in the arroyo, or dry bed of the creek.

When they began to climb the mountains there were pretty flowers, crisp water cresses in the clear brooks and great cacti higher than the horse's head. They had very many blossoms on them, red, yellow, orange, and Bertie's papa got out and picked some.

"Let's stay up here a long time, papa," said Bertie, "it is so nice."

But that night they camped near a pasture where there were a great many horses.

They put up their little tent and made a bed of dry boughs. Bertie fell asleep immediately, but waked suddenly in the night. The horses were running in the pasture, neighing and making a great deal of noise.

Some of them came and huddled up close to the bars and whinnied as if they were frightened.

"Oh, papa, papa, what is that, where are you, papa?" cried Bertie, for though he felt all around on the boughs, he could not find him.

"I am here," said papa outside, "don't be afraid. The horses are running about."

He did not tell him there was a mountain lion chasing them. Bertie was very much afraid and began to cry.

"Don't cry, my boy, be brave," said papa, coming into the tent, "I'm going to stay by Meg a little while."

"Let me go, too," begged Bertie, "I'm so dreadful 'fraid."

So papa wrapped him in the blankets and put him up in the buggy and stayed by him till the noise quieted. The horses stayed there putting their heads over the bars and trembling.

"Let's go home when it gets light," said Bertie.

But when it got light he wanted to stay as much as ever.

Papa got better after awhile and they started home. They would come again some day he said.

"I don't see what ails Meg," said papa, as they were going down the mountain, "she acts as if she didn't know what she is about."

"Meg is a good horse, papa," said Bertie.

"Yes," said papa, "a very good, kind, gentle horse. I don't know what makes her act so to-day. She never acted so before."

They were at a very narrow and dangerous place in the road and suddenly Meg started to run down the steep grade. Papa drew her up and she cramped the buggy so sharply they came near rolling down the side of the mountain.

Bertie screamed but papa got her back onto the road quickly.

"There's a lake just below here," said papa. "I'll unhitch and we'll eat our lunch and let Meg rest. I don't understand it."

They came in sight of the lake very soon and got out to rest and eat their lunch.

Papa tethered Meg out and began to build a fire.

Suddenly Meg began to whinny wildly and to run furiously around and around the stake pin.

"She must be stung by something," said papa. "I noticed her neck was swollen a little when I unhitched her. I'll put some ammonia on it."

He began to search for his bottle which he had with him for snake bites or centipede stings.

"Oh, look, papa," cried Bertie, "the rope's broken and she's running away."

"Whoa! Meg, whoa!" called papa, "whoa!"

He ran after her as fast as he could but she did not stop. The lake was very near. She ran down the bank and plunged into the deep water. She swam about a little, then turned and looked toward them, whinnying pitifully, and sank out of sight.

Bertie screamed when the gentle face with its good, kind eyes went down. "Oh, papa, papa, get her out, get Meg out!"

"I can't, my boy; I have no boat," said papa, sadly.

"What made her do that way, papa?"

"I don't know, Bertie."

They turned and went back to their fire. A man with a span of mules and a buckboard, had stopped in the road to watch them.

"Horse drowned, eh?" said he. "What's the matter?"

"I don't know," said papa, and he told him how she had acted.

"Hain't been hyer long, have ye, stranger," said the man, pushing his broad hat back onto the back of his head. "She's pizened, pizened with loco weed. Makes 'em drunk, crazy as a loon; I 'low you'd say so if you'd seen one o' mine, staggerin' drunk."

Bertie and papa took the train home, after papa had got a Spaniard to draw poor Meg out of the water and take off the harness. Then he got another horse and went back for the things.

"You see, my boy," he said to Bertie, "all the trouble and expense a little poison has made me. Poor Meg ate a weed that served her as another poison serves men and boys sometimes."

"Oh, I know," said Bertie, "it's alcohol, and I'm never going to touch it; I've signed the pledge in the Loyal Legion."

"God help you to keep it, my boy," said papa, folding him closely in his arms, "all the horses in the world are not worth as much as my boy."

"Sir," said a boy, addressing a man, "do you want a boy to work for you?"

"No," answered the man, "I have no such want."

The boy looked disappointed—at least the man thought so, and he asked, "Can't you succeed in getting a place?"

"I have asked at a good many places," said the boy. "A woman told me you had been after a boy, but it is not so, I find."

"Do not be discouraged," said the man in a friendly tone.

"Oh, no, sir," said the boy cheerfully. "I still hope on, because this is a very big world, and I feel certain God has something for me to do in it. I am trying to find it."

"Just so, just so," said a gentleman who overheard the talk. "Come with me, my boy; I am in want of somebody like you."

We may all feel certain, as this boy was, that God has something for each one of us to do.—The Sunny Days of Youth.

IMPORTANT FAIR WORK.

Among the numerous duties which fall to the share of W. C. T. Unions, all clamoring for attention, there is usually one whose claims for the time being are more urgent than any other, one line of work which has, so to speak, the right of way. Sometimes it is legislation or petitions, sometimes scientific temperance instruction, sometimes evangelistic (though we consider all our varied lines of work essentially evangelistic), sometimes flower mission or any other department work which is the need of the hour; but just at this time of the year W. C. T. U. energy should be concentrated upon state and county fairs.

By this we mean not that other departments should receive less attention, but that this should receive more. Agricultural fairs afford opportunities for the sowing of temperance seed such as no other occasion can equal. Here we have an immense gathering of people of all classes, town and country folk, such as no "cause," religious, philanthropic or political, can call together—a "field," indeed, of magnificent proportions ready to our hand and in splendid condition for the sowing. Here we may reach, if not the "world and his wife," at least the state and her husband or the county and her sons and daughters.

On page 12 of this issue will be found a communication from the National superintendent of state and county fairs, Mrs. Clara Vinson Weaver, which we trust state and local workers will note carefully, discuss in their meetings and, as far as practicable, follow its suggestions. We hope that at many fairs the prohibition orator will be as much in evidence as the politician, the gold champion or the free silver advocate, but if all cannot have a John G. Woolley or a Samuel Dickie or a Clara Hoffman to speak for temperance, there is one prohibition pleader which may be present at every state and county fair throughout the land—a pleader whose eloquence may reach not one thousand, or ten thousand, but hundreds of thousands, and whose voice is always potent and untiring. This powerful speaker is the printed page.

We hope that white-ribboners of America will utilize tons of temperance literature in "seeding down the field" which state and county fairs provide for their using, and on another page of this paper is given, for the convenience of workers, a list of W. T. P. A. leaflets of special interest to farmers and the agricultural interests generally, and containing the best thought of well-known leaders in the temperance reform.

But above all we would urge that unions make an extended (and at the same time judicious) distribution of the Fair number of THE UNION SIGNAL—which is the issue of August 22. THE UNION SIGNAL is always a thought-awakener, but the Fair number will be especially so. Men and women of national fame will give through its columns their freshest thought upon the great dominant issue of the day, presenting particularly the prohibition reform in its relation to the farmer and the farmer's home. It will aim to be a Prohibition light-giver and therefore a Prohibition vote-maker.

We do not, as an organization, sufficiently appreciate the importance of reaching the farming communities with temperance propaganda. The agricultural interest is the backbone of this nation and the men and women who represent it are, we believe, the ones to whom we must look to free our land from the rum curse. The country must come to the rescue of the city. And for the sake of the boys and the girls who are leaving the farms and flocking to the cities, it should not be difficult to persuade farmers and farmers' wives to join the prohibition forces.

For this reason we urge our women to send the Fair number into as many country homes as possible at a time when this can be done with a minimum of effort and expense. It will be a twenty-page paper with artistic cover and both in matter and in manner a worthy representative of the great W. C. T. U. organization and of white-ribbon enterprise. The price per hundred is $2.50, fifty cents lower than in former years, and a large extra edition is to be printed in the expectation that the number of orders sent in will break all previous records.

Let every union which has not already done so instruct its superintendent of literature to coöperate with state and local superintendents and push this matter with all the emphasis it is possible for words (reinforced by example) to convey—to the end that the Fair number may nobly fulfill its mission.

One of our bright W. C. T. U. speakers used to say, "I wish I had a thousand tongues to speak for prohibition, but seeing I have but one I am glad it is a woman's tongue." And, changing the phrase somewhat, we wish we had a thousand pens with which to set forth the claims of the printed page in general and THE UNION SIGNAL in particular, but seeing we have but one (and that a pen whose eloquence consists solely in its earnestness) we are glad that it speaks to W. C. T. U. women. We are glad that our appeal is to an army which never fails to respond to any special call to duty. Loyal to the cause and to each other, white-ribboners are quick to perceive and to utilize every opportunity for service whether it is presenting the Great Petition to the governments of the world or exploiting THE UNION SIGNAL at state and county fairs.

PUBLICAN, PARSON AND PEER.

To the White-ribbon Host:

First of all, let me congratulate you on the magnificent success of the Third Biennial Convention of the World's W. C. T. U. Our associate editor, Miss Jennie A. Stewart, has given you a full description, and the daily and weekly press throughout the English speaking world has made the public acquainted with the proceedings more thoroughly than it has ever heralded those of any other temperance gathering since the great reform was undertaken.

Probably the most significant service was that held in Westminster Abbey on the Sunday following the Convention, at which the Bishop of Dover preached a temperance sermon, in which he advocated total abstinence, and spoke strongly against the liquor traffic; he also spoke of the presence of the World's W. C. T. U. delegates from foreign countries, to whom reserved seats had been given, and said that their presence emphasized the significance of a reform that was sacred to every thoughtful mind, and concerning which only the frivolous could speak lightly.

Two days after the demonstration in Royal Albert Hall, with which our Convention closed, the government dissolved. For this reason the Polyglot Petition was not presented, and the election cyclone that immediately followed has prevented up to this time, and for aught we know may effectually prevent the presentation of the Petition to the new government. For it is perfectly understood that while Home Rule has lost its hold on the enthusiasm of the English people, while the cry, "Down with the House of Lords," arrayed the aristocracy against the Liberal party, while the disestablishment of the state church in Wales has aroused the hostility of the parson and his followers, the crux of the situation is the united power of the publicans against the local option bill. The beerage and the peerage joined hands to kill that measure, and they succeeded. The placards in the public houses declared that if the bill were passed the workingman would lose his pot of beer, and the door of the only place in which he could meet his friends and enjoy his hours of recreation would be closed. In the worst slums of London the white-ribbon women and Mrs. Ormiston Chant were grouped as the enemies of that "good time" that the publican promised to them who paid for it. The low amusement halls and questionable theaters made common cause. Letters from the people that are now appearing in the London daily newspapers reflect the common sentiment. They say in effect: "If the control of the liquor traffic were placed in the hands of the people, the women who would have a right to vote would be sure to vote to shut up the public houses, and then where should we go?" This is the gist of the argument put forward by the liquor people for their own ends, and accepted by their victims—the crowd.

Compensation is again a popular cry and for the present a strong reaction has set in. The Westminster Gazette, the leading evening paper of the Liberal party, publishes from time to time what are called "Letters from a Publican's Radical," that is a member of the Liberal party who professes to reflect the sentiment of the public house. The following quotation from his latest utterance reveals the "true inwardness" of the situation here more thoroughly perhaps than any other that could be given:

Sir, I was the only Liberal in England who had the slightest glimmering of prescience or common sense as to the fate which the party was providing for itself. In season and out of season I have preached in your columns that the party was steering straight for the rocks. Plenty of people told me in private that I was quite right; but no politician or public writer had the courage to depart from the tone of insincere subserviency to the teetotaler. They affected to believe the monstrous untruth that the teetotaler had "in hand" a huge reserve of force with which he would sweep the country for us, if only we could stick to the Veto Bill and go "bald-headed" for the cause. What has actually happened can only be compared with what happened at the restoration of Charles II. We are in face of a great carnival of carnality, which, like the former, may last for a century. The "Social Purity" party have ruined the cause of temperance, and it will serve them right if they see the C. D. Acts revived. The subject is already under discussion at the military clubs. This kind of thing must ever happen when the Puritan minority attempts to bounce the nation. The elections have been largely influenced by the belief that the Local Veto Bill was not the bill that was meant to be passed; and that if the Liberals won it would be replaced by a measure of Prohibition. There was much to justify this belief because Sir William Harcourt, in his references to his Home Office experience, has been arguing on lines which have no force as applied to his own bill, but do apply to total prohibition; and it is noteworthy that at many meetings of teetotalers, nominally in support of the bill, they have wound up by a rousing resolution declaring that they will never rest until every public house in the country is closed. There is a general feeling that Liberals are a feather-headed people and largely under petticoat government. Men dispute whether Sir William Harcourt or Lord Rosebery is the real leader of the party. It would be more pertinent to discuss whether Lady Carlisle or Lady Henry Somerset is its ruler. The Tories suppress or ignore their extremists; we gush over ours, and give journalistic prominence in our journals to their silly sayings and doings. What an immense amount of harm has been done by the recent congress of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and the parading of the old lady from America, known as "Mother Stewart," who has spent years of her life in invading licensed premises and annoying American citizens by going down on her knees and praying in their midst. Was that the sort of thing to which John Bull was to have been treated if Liberalism had triumphed?

It is undoubtedly true that in a country where forty millions of people are gathered within a space not larger than that covered by the state of Georgia, any great demonstration is felt throughout the mass with a force far beyond what we, with our scattered population, can possibly conceive.

The wage-worker knows that the Conservative party is likely to take up those progressive measures by which the Liberal party sought to improve his circumstances. Mr. Chamberlain outlined with great astuteness just before the elections a program that pronounced much for the betterment of the poor and they have believed that they should get these measures from the Conservatives.

But it is well known that the Conservative party is more favorable to the ballot for women than is the Liberal party. It was the Conservatives who voted in favor of giving women the ballot under the Parish Council bill, and although the government stood out against it, the women won the day. The "Primrose Dames," whose great political society (Conservatives) has for many years been a most important factor in the elections, desire the ballot, and the Conservative party believes that under a property qualification a majority of women in this country would vote with them; for this reason it is quite likely then that the Conservatives will give the full ballot to women, and I console myself by the expectation that the final outcome of this election will not be so bad as many fear, but that the slow lift of woman to her rightful place as an active participant in all the affairs of government will carry with it the banishment of the public house and the purification of the people's amusements. However, it remains true that "for the present distress" some of our plans must be revised.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson has been reëlected by a majority of 241. The success of our grand champion, when so many of his associates have gone "under the sickle" of the liquor traffic, is especially gratifying to his temperance coadjutors. Sir Wilfrid had the advantage of having been born and bred in the county that has sent him to Parliament for well-nigh thirty years, almost without a break. His character and word are perfectly well known there, and there is no flaw in his record. It means more than can be told to the temperance cause for us to have Sir William Harcourt on the front bench, and Sir Wilfrid Lawson in his old place as leader of the forces of reform. I have just sent him the following telegram:

"Millions of men and women will rejoice in your victory throughout the English speaking nations. God bless you."

In sending this message I felt that I had expressed the thought and feeling of my temperance brothers and sisters in every land.

It must be apparent to all white-ribbon women that this is a propitious time in which to emphasize the work of organization, inasmuch as the direct legal propaganda in England has received a temporary check. The opportunity to work up local unions in strategic points, especially on the continent of Europe, is better now than at any previous time. France is greatly stirred over the question of increased drinking of spirits; the women of Germany are massing as never before; the work in Scandinavia is opening admirably, and in Australasia, South Africa, India and Japan the outlook was never brighter.

It is therefore most desirable that Lady Henry Somerset and I should have a free rein as to the best manner in which to take up our route, and we may be obliged, in the interest of the work, to modify that already intimated. In a few weeks we shall know definitely what it is best to do, and will report the decision of the general officers of the World's W. C. T. U. promptly in The Union Signal.

As a matter of course, Anna Gordon and I shall go home in the autumn and participate in the Baltimore Convention. The Polyglot Petition will be presented in the course of time to all the governments that have furnished signatures to its ever extending roll, but this presentation will not be as rapid as we had hoped. Will not our friends who feel that their representation on the petition is hardly what they could wish it to be when it arrives in their respective countries, put forth renewed efforts to raise the total number of names contributed by them? And please remember that Mrs. Rebecca C. Shuman, of Evanston, near Chicago, Ill., is still "at the old stand," and will receive the signatures for us. She is an expert in her work, and I learn from her that names are continually coming in. We are now determined that no fewer than two millions of actual signatures shall be secured, but I think we are now about four hundred and fifty thousand short of this number. Let us remember that every added name means a stronger cementing of those forces which must be solidified and extended far beyond their present limits in the sacred peaceful war that has now become international, and the motto of which is, "Down with the dramshop and up with the home."

Believe me, yours, bating not jot of heart or hope, but believing always that, though "God moves in a mysterious way, His wonders to perform," He always keeps on moving, and His wonders never cease among the ways of men.

THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVORERS' APPEAL.

For many reasons we have a peculiar interest in this body of young Christians as representing in many important respects some of the leading characteristics of the new era upon which we are entering and as constituting one of the mightiest forces in the myriad-sided conflict of the present day. In more than one regard, too, the army of Endeavorers manifests strong affinity in its spirit and methods with our own white ribbon host.

To our mind, one respect in which this body of young people specially commends itself and one in which it most truly represents the increasingly liberal and progressive spirit of the present is in its ignoring of denominational lines. Like the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Christian Endeavorers make much of Christianity but they know nothing of sects. The time is rapidly approaching when all Christians will recognize that this is the only true attitude for Christ's followers, that for positive, aggressive Christian work the whole Church, disregarding sects, must stand as a unit. The time is at hand when Christians will marvel at the unseemly denominational strife which even yet disgraces Christianity. The spectacle of four or five different denominations crowding themselves into one little town, where there is work enough indeed for the Church of Christ, but neither room, support nor usefulness possible to a number of sects, will be regarded, as it truly is, a division of Christ.

The following communication from the board of trustees of the United Society of Christian Endeavor is so dignified and full of Christian courtesy and unity that we gladly give it in full and pray that it may meet with an equally kindly response:

An Appeal for Fellowship.

To the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church:

Dear Fathers and Brethren:—We, the Board of Trustees of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, representing nearly thirty evangelical denominations in a world-wide brotherhood, in view of the fact that your church and the Methodist Episcopal Church South, are the only churches in the world in which the number of Christian Endeavor societies are lessening, and in the name of the already widespread and rapidly growing fellowship, fraternity and coöperation, address to you this appeal:

The Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor is, and is only, a federation of Christian young people within various evangelical churches. Each individual society is under the exclusive control of the denomination to which it belongs. Neither the United Society nor any state or local union demands or requires any allegiance, levies any taxes or at all controls the action of any society. The board of trustees of the United Society and their officers are but servants of the interests of all the churches; are merely a committee for general suggestion and a bureau of information.

The Christian Endeavor movement is a practical illustration of the gracious fact that Christian spiritual unity is possible without absolute uniformity or centralization of authority. But spiritual union can gain, not by the cold touch of finger-tips through formal fraternal resolutions, but only by heart-to-heart and face-to-face contact.

We regard the Methodist Episcopal Church as one of the foremost in the proclamation of Christian spiritual fraternity, and we greatly desire to welcome the Methodist Episcopal young people, with their glorious fervor, to our delightful interdenominational fellowship.

But Christian Endeavor cannot be simply a mass of miscellaneous societies. Every great movement must necessarily have unity of purpose and some common channels of work along which such purpose can flow. Christian Endeavor took at least general shape, and evinced its equal adaptability to varying ecclesiastical politics several years before the beginning of similar movements, and since our name has never carried a merely denominational color, and since Christian Endeavor is a distinctly spiritual movement, we have asked that only such societies as are willing to accept our principles and main ways of work and are under the control of the evangelical bodies to which they belong, take upon themselves our name. Thus, and thus only, can we maintain the peculiar felicity of Christian Endeavor, at once its denominational devotion and its large and beautiful interdenominational fellowship. Can there be any peril to denominational loyalty, for which Christian Endeavor, by its essential principles, has always stood, and must stand, in adding to the distinctive denominational name of a denominational society, as has been done in various Methodist bodies throughout the world, the unifiying name of Christian Endeavor?

Cannot the real longing for spiritual interdenominational fellowship, which throbs in the hearts of all young Christians, be thus given a chance of expression in Christian Endeavor, while every denominational conviction and interest shall be at the same time carefully guarded in the name of the one Christ whom we all love? We respectfully ask you to take into consideration this most important matter.

Signed by the following trustees:

The mistakes of the people are honest mistakes, and far less dangerous in character than the mistakes of any kind of oligarchy or despotic ruler. It is entirely probable that no reformer has found the solution of the financial problem which confronts us, but so far as we are concerned, we are willing, if need be, to risk some experiments. Admitted that "free silver" is fraught with all the evils of which its bitterest opponents accuse it, it is the harbinger of blessings infinite compared with the untold miseries which "free whisky" daily entails upon us. It may be that the "single tax" is the craziest idea which ever emanated from the brain of a lunatic, yet the country would thrive and prosper as it has never prospered since we became a nation could we adopt the "single tax" and dispense forever with the blighting, desolating tax of the liquor traffic. But there is no serious danger that any wild scheme will ever be adopted. In the agitation which must go on before any of the ends sought can be attained, there will inevitably be a weeding out and modification, which will greatly lessen the dangers to which we might be exposed by crude, unwise experiments. In this lies the strength of our Republican institutions. Because this is so, the affairs of state are safely trusted in the hands of the people as a whole, and "in the multitude of counsellors" we find our surest safety!

It is needless to say that no line based on sex, race, creed, color or "previous condition of servitude" is recognized in the World's W. C. T. U. If it were, the word would be a misnomer, and the spirit of the Crusade would take its flight. Some of our good friends not thoroughly cognizant with these facts have given notice of an amendment to the constitution (to be acted upon two years hence), by which the words "race and color" will be explicitly included in the constitution. But we cannot too strongly emphasize the fact that the W. C. T. U. has no race or color line, and in the nature of the case cannot have. If German, Scandinavian or any other women to whom English is not a native tongue, but who live in English-speaking countries, or if colored women in any country prefer to organize unions within the bounds of their own religious denomination or otherwise along the lines of race or nationality, they are free to do so. But to the World's or National societies these unions hold the same relations held by those unions that are organized according to our general plan.

"I say it over and over, and yet again to-day;
It rests my heart as surely as it did yesterday:
'It is the Lord's appointment!'
Whatever my work may be,
I am sure, in my heart of hearts,
He has offered it for me.

"I must say it over and over, and again to-day,
For my work is somewhat different from yesterday:
'It is the Lord's appointment!'
It quiets my restless will
Like voice of a tender mother,
And my heart and will are still.

"I will say it over and over, this and every day,
Whatsoever the Master orders, come what may:
'It is the Lord's appointment!'
For only His love can see
What is wisest, best, and right,
What is truly good for me."

The epitaph of the great General Gordon, hero and martyr of Khartoum, eloquent as it is, contains a eulogy deserved by every one of the comrades whose loss we reverently pause to think about to-day. It is as follows: "At all times and everywhere he gave his strength to the weak, his substance to the poor, his sympathy to the suffering, and his heart to God."

An incident in the life of the distinguished missionary Dr. Luther Halsey Gulick, contains the marrow of many sermons on Sabbath observance. After eleven years separation from home and kindred, Dr. Gulick, aged twenty-three, returned to Honolulu with his young wife, en route for mission fields. They arrived on the Sabbath. Only two miles of shining water lay between them and their eager parents and friends on shore; but loyalty to the fourth commandment kept them apart until Monday morning. Mr. Gulick's Christian fortitude was remarkable. Once when smallpox had been recklessly introduced into the Islands by sailors, and the natives were dying by the hundreds, Dr. Gulick inoculated himself and a few others with virus taken from the dying. In the operation on himself he was dangerously exposed, and both Dr. and Mrs. Gulick thought that he would die. In order not to expose the mother and two children, he lived for three days in a little hut far removed from home, waiting for the poison to do its work, and three times each day Mrs. Gulick sent him food. The agony of those three days few can realize. This heroism of Dr. and Mrs. Gulick was the beginning of a strong hold upon the natives.

The miner emerging from his hard work under the surface of the ground is all black except the eyes, for the reason that here alone does the cleansing and purifying influence of the tear glands constantly overcome the tendency to griminess from which no other feature is defended. Even so the eye of the spirit can be kept clear and lustrous by the constant cleansing of the Spirit of God, which works upon all who will permit its mild and gentle influence to operate upon them.

Lord Playfair, who has been all his life studying chemistry, tells us that this great art, by giving to us the Lucifer match, saves every man, woman and child say, seventy-eight hours a year, or ten working days, in the quickness with which people can strike a light now as compared with the tedious method in use before phosphorus matches were invented. He estimates that the gain of this extra ten days represents for the United States an aggregate economy of three hundred and ten million dollars annually. These matches are now extracted from old bones. Lord Playfair thinks that the competition for cotton and linen rags is a deeper indication of civilization than even the consumption of soap. In 1887 England used twelve pounds of paper to each person, in the United States ten pounds, Germany nine, France eight, Italy four. He says that when old woolen rags have reached the fourth stage of degradation, so that even the shoddy makers will not have them, they are mixed with the shavings of hoofs and horns and the blood of slaughtered horses, are melted in a great iron pot with wood ashes and scrap iron, and thus is produced the beautiful dye called Prussian blue. Chemistry is a wizard that transforms the most undesirable odors into those pronounced exquisite by the fastidious. It looks as if chemistry lies at the root of civilization, and like the thrifty housewife, economizes every scrap.

On Duty.

TASMANIA.

ANNUAL CONVENTION.

The third annual convention of the W. C. T. U. of Tasmania, convened March 26–28, and was certainly the most successful one that has yet been held. Mrs. Blair, our worthy Colonial president, and her efficient staff of officers, had worked hard to secure large gatherings and to make these days of meeting together days of blessing and help, and they had their reward. The attendance of delegates and members exceeded that of previous years, and the general interest displayed at the public meetings showed that the work and aim of the W. C. T. U. is taking a deeper hold on the minds of all classes of the community. Then not only was the attendance larger, but the number of papers read was in advance of other years, and the universal feeling was that the women of our union are becoming more earnest in the work and more willing to lay all the noble gifts God has given them on His altar for His service.

The afternoon session of the first day was of a devotional character, when the Rev. W. Shaw gave an exceedingly earnest and searching Bible reading on "Love." "Love the Heart of Consecration," and what it will do and give up for the sake of those whom Christ has died to save. At the conclusion of this reading the meeting was open for prayer and praise and many "praise notes" were struck by grateful hearts which told of the Lord's goodness and faithfulness in blessing work done by the various branches. In the evening a tea and public meeting was held when the hall was crowded. Mrs. Blair occupied the chair and was supported by her officers; by Mrs. Kirk, the well-known secretary of the Victorian union; Miss Murcutt, our young and earnest Australasian organizer; Mrs. W. Hart, the beloved president of the Launceston branch; Mrs. Lodge, a veteran worker and honored president of the Hobart union, and several presidents of local branches. Band of Hope extended a cordial welcome to the delegates. Miss Murcutt ably replied. The Colonial president's annual address which was received with hearty applause, was of an assuring nature. It told of the progress the union had made in spite of the prevailing depression, and that it was in a better position numerically and financially than it had yet been. Reference was made to the visit of Mrs. Nicholls, our able Australasian president, how it had aided the union, and also to the stimulus and "out reaching" that had been the results of Miss Murcutt's tour through the Colony. At the conclusion of the Colonial president's encouraging address, she was presented by Mrs. W. Hart, on behalf of the union, with a basket of lovely flowers. This token of affection was but a faint expression of the good will and loyalty which the members bear towards Mrs. Blair and she feelingly replied to Mrs. Hart's words of congratulation and encouragement. The report of the energetic Colonial corresponding secretary, Miss Corbett, showed that four new branches had been formed and one re-organized during the year; that there was an increase of seventy-six members and forty-four new members and that the various departments of work were making steady progress. The enjoyment of this and succeeding meetings was greatly aided too, by the choir, assisted by Mrs. Nicholls as organist, singing several beautiful anthems.

The morning session on Wednesday was opened by Mrs. W. Hart conducting devotional exercise. The Colonial treasurer's (Mrs. Seabrook) report was received with applause and showed that despite hard times there was a fair balance to the union's credit. Miss Murcutt's (Australasian organizer) report of her tour through Tasmania was exceedingly interesting and told of arduous labors attended with success all along the line. She had circumnavigated the Island, traveling about two thousand three hundred miles; four new branches had been formed and new members and honorary members, added to already existing branches.

The afternoon session was opened by Mrs. Rooke, conducting devotional exercises. A cheering report was read by Mrs. Stanfield, superintendent of literature, and one from Miss E. Searle on "coffee-rooms" told how this department is not being lost sight of. Mrs. Cunningham's report on "unfermented wine" showed that her department is wide awake, and one from Mrs. Morris on "work amongst sailors" proved how susceptible our sailors are to kindness and how readily they receive parcels of papers, tracts, etc. An able paper on "Purity" was read by Mrs. Kirk (Victoria) and called forth a discussion on that important department of work.

In the evening the large hall was filled, when a public meeting was held and addresses given on that important subject, "Franchise for Women." Mrs. Blair, Colonial president, presided. Several very intelligent and conclusive addresses were given, notably that of Mr. Mosey's, one by the Rev. J. C. Wright, another by Mr. S. E. Smith, a young New Zealander, and one by Mrs. Kirk (Victoria), who stated some very logical and undeniable reasons why the franchise should be granted.

On Thursday, the last day of convention, the meetings were largely attended and interest sustained and deepened. The election of officers for the ensuing year was then proceeded with. Mrs. Blair was again, and that unanimously, elected president, and took the chair amidst merited applause. Mrs. Seabrook, whose financial abilities have been proved, was without a dissenting voice, elected treasurer, and Mrs. Wilkins unanimously elected recording secretary. Miss Corbett, who has so ably filled the position of corresponding secretary, was obliged to resign that office. Her resignation was received with deep regret. In token of the love and esteem which the Launceston branch bore her, and of which she has been secretary for three years, Mrs. W. Hart presented her with a handsomely bound Bible and a volume of the "Golden Calendar." Miss Corbett suitably responded. Mrs. Bellin, a lady well fitted for the position, was elected in Miss Corbett's place. The appointment of superintendents of departments included two new ones, that of drawing-room and that of correspondent to THE UNION SIGNAL.

This successful convention closed by all present joining hands and singing with sweetness and emotion the appropriate hymn, "Blest be the tie that binds." Mrs. Blair pronounced the benediction, and so ended a convention which will be memorable to all as a season of spiritual refreshment, of stimulus to labor and of happy communion.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

"COME YE APART."

Our first "miniature temperance Chautauqua," as the South Australian Advertiser calls it, was an undoubted success. The camp was situated on the grounds of Mr. Lockwood, on St. Vincent's Gulf, between Edithburgh and Stansbury, and caused quite a sensation throughout Yorke's Peninsula. Energetic preparations under the direction of Miss Lockwood, district president, and Mrs. Nicholls, Australasian and Colonial president (who went over to help superintend affairs), were made for the accommodation and convenience of visitors, sleeping tents, dining tent, and a very large tent for meetings; also arrangements for bathing, boating and fishing, and a steamboat chartered to take over the party from Port Adelaide. In the evening, the inaugural service, which took the form of a welcome meeting, was held in the large tent, and greetings were given and responses made, and everybody began to realize that the camp had begun. Various reports, all of a congratulatory nature, found their way into the public papers, telling of refreshing sea-bathing, delightful rambles on the beach, satisfactory commisariat arrangements and pleasant re-unions; and, better still, of profitable exercises in department and other conferences, in gospel temperance and other meetings.

Our work had a splendid airing, people coming from far and near. One party traveled one hundred miles, another eighty miles and many thirty miles, in order to be present at the meetings, and this, not by boat or rail, but by their own conveyances. These are not likely to soon forget what they came so far to hear, and thus the imperishable seed of the kingdom of truth receives an impetus to growth, and communities, as well as individuals, will be benefitted. An excellent program was prepared and carried out. "Bible-reading in State Schools," "Scientific Temperance Instruction," "Hygiene According to Leviticus," "Ideal Woman," the "Opium Question," "Cleveland Convention Echoes," being a few of the items discussed.

On February 12 the Yorke's Peninsula District held its annual convention at the encampment, during which much important business was done and progress reported. The Australasian organizers, Miss Vincent and Miss Cummins, were present and gave powerful addresses, stirring the hearts of men and women alike. Papers on "Vine Growing," and on "Grocer's Wine Licenses," by Miss Blight, of Clare, and Miss Carter, of Port Adelaide, were read and ably discussed, and abundance of food for thought supplied to all who listened. Our sisters on the Peninsula have had a great uplift by means of these meetings, and will work with even more vigor and perseverance than before.

On the 15th of February the mounted and varnished copy (6 ft. by 3) of the World's Petition, which was hung in the meeting tent, was moved into the most prominent place and special prayer made at each meeting "that the power of God might rest upon our World's leaders in Washington, as they, for the first time, presented it to the representatives of the United States government, and that it might prove the means of a great awakening to the evils of the traffics in liquor and opium and a powerful lever for their complete overthrow."

The Sabbaths at the camp were special times of refreshing, the Revs. Wallbank and Wheatley, and Pastor H. D. Smith, assisting in the services with great acceptance. The gentlemen in the neighborhood were courteous in their help and regular in their attendance, and all parties concerned have reason to be glad at the success which has attended their bold adventure—the ten days' camp-life in Australian woods. Much praise is due to every one who lent a hand toward making the enterprise profitable and satisfactory in every way, and the seed thus sown will surely return a smiling and abundant harvest.

As I am writing, the necessary forms for enrollment as an elector have been brought to my door, and while I feel that the enfranchisement of the women of South Australia, or of any other land, is but an act of simple justice, long delayed, I also realize that it is a mighty power, and hence a mighty responsibility, and I pray God that women may be influenced to use it for the best purposes, and according to the spirit and meaning of our white-ribbon motto. Our organization is using means to induce all our women to vote, and is endeavoring to supply all necessary information, so that they may cast an intelligent vote when the polling arrives.

Yours faithfully,
J. A. CLATWORTHY,
South Australian Col. Reporter.

QUEENSLAND.

District conventions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Unions have recently been held throughout Queensland. Since the W. C. T. U. has grown into such a large organization it was found impossible to bring before the Colonial convention reports of all unions and their varied work. So last year the Colony was divided into seven districts, each holding its own convention yearly, when reports of unions are received, new plans of work suggested, etc., and all is condensed for the Colonial convention. At these district conventions women meet to gain fresh inspiration and learn the methods and great extent of the W. C. T. U., who could not possibly attend any convention further from home.

The No. 6 (Brisbane) district, met in First Baptist church for two days, with a large attendance of delegates representing eleven W unions and seven Y unions, with membership of 651, and six Loyal Temperance Legions with their 530 children. Good work has been done by all the unions during the year, and a sailors' mission started which was so sadly needed in Brisbane and is now looked upon as one of the necessary and important philanthropic institutions of the city. There is a reading room where sailors can meet daily, have weekly socials and Sunday teas, all of which are most gratefully appreciated.

The Y unions are also earnest in good works, assisting at the sailors' and city missions, donating money, garments and toys to the children's hospital, having regular singing band to hospital and concerts to Lytton reformatory boys.

The Loyal Temperance Legions' special work is for the poor and needy; they provided toys at Christmas for the children's hospital, and a donation of £8, raised by a fancy fair; they have also collected funds for a drum and fife band, and one Legion has an advanced class for boys over twelve years, also a debating class. Interesting papers full of helpful hints were read on "Press Work," "Drawing-room Meetings" and "Thoughts for Y's." Two evening meetings were given, one by the W's, when leading delegates and ministers gave enjoyable addresses. The second evening's program was provided by the Y's and L. T. L's, who gave action songs, marching chorus, recitations and part singing, with bright speeches from the Y giris and the pretty fancy dialogue of "Congress of Nations."

The No. 5 district (Ipswich) held one day's session, with public meeting in the evening, at which interesting speeches were given, and the L. T. L's assisted with the entertainment. All the unions were represented, and many visitors present to see how well white-ribbon meetings are conducted, for it is quite a feature in all conventions, the businesslike manner in which everything is carried out. The principal departments taken up are juvenile, heredity, hygiene, evangelistic, social purity, narcotics, Sabbath observance and mothers' meetings; these last have proved in every way a blessing to the mothers, who gladly attend. Tracts and leaflets are regularly distributed with cards and bouquets to the hospital, cab and busmen and local police barracks. The unions have during the year sown broadcast thousands of leaflets, which cannot fail to bring forth a harvest of good. Most of the unions have libraries, which the members gladly avail themselves of to study works on hygiene, education of children, household affairs, etc. One union has an L. T. L., numbering ninety-seven, and another eighty-two; this work among the children has a wonderful reward in store, and is very popular with the children themselves.

The No. 4 district (Toowoomba) began with a most successful public meeting to welcome the delegates and finished with a very happy afternoon social. Some fifteen departments of work are taken up by these unions in the "Darling Downs" district, "woman suffrage" being added of late. By three of the unions alone, upwards of one hundred visits have been paid to the local hospitals, and over one thousand bouquets presented with leaflets to the patients.

In Toowoomba a visitation to the women's jail is carried on, and a series of public temperance meetings held in this town were fruitful of good in many ways. This union has also regular visitation for evangelistic work. Many of the churches in this district now use unfermented wine, through white-ribbon efforts, and thousands of tracts and helpful leaflets have been distributed everywhere.

On May 18 a reception was held in Brisbane for Miss Murcutt, who has come to enter on a mission tour through Queensland in the interests of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Miss Murcutt is a Victorian by birth, but resides in West Australia, where she has done good work. Last year Miss Murcutt attended the triennial convention of Australasian unions, when her bright and earnest personality won all hearts. She was then appointed Australasian organizer, and has since traveled through South Australia, Tasmania and West Australia, conducting successful missions in each Colony, and doing good service for the unions.

The Nooloongabba, South Brisbane, union have held a missionary meeting when Miss Allauby, a Brisbane girl who has been for some time working as a missionary in India, gave an address on the life of women in India, and had on view native cooking utensils, ornaments, models of trades, and costumes, etc.

The Albion (Brisbane) union hold regular monthly temperance meetings around their district which prove most helpful. Good speakers are engaged and sometimes a paper read on an interesting subject.

The Rockhampton union has wonderful success with mothers' meetings, which are held weekly at the superintendent's house, and sewing is busily engaged in. Some of the garments being given away and others sold at less than cost price. Once a month the sewing is put aside for reading and instruction in many useful subjects. Most unions seem to find the department one of the most fruitful of results and find the mothers grateful for helpful instruction.

The Bundaberg union gave a farewell social to their president in April, whose husband, Rev. M. Foggon, has been removed to Brisbane. An address and six volumes of Shakespeare's works, handsomely bound and cased, was presented by the W and Y unions. Mrs. Foggon has most ably filled the place of president since the formation of the union, and is honored and beloved by her people.

The special day of prayer for the restoration of Miss Ackermann, was observed throughout Queensland, and latest news of Miss Ackermann is received with delight, for her name is a household word throughout Australia.

Queensland was honored by having a representative at the biennial convention, Mrs. Lagar, who is one of the foremost workers in Brisbane.

BULGARIA.

The annual meeting of the Bulgarian Temperance union was held in Philippopolis on the 5th of April. As it has previously been stated, our union consists of separate temperance bands in towns and villages, of which there are now eighteen. Three of these have been organized during the past year. Twenty regularly appointed delegates representing twelve of the bands were present. Though few, they represented all parts of Bulgaria. Only one day was allowed for the three sessions held. It was a busy day. The morning and afternoon sessions were devoted to reports and business matters. The reports showed that the efforts of the respective bands to popularize the temperance cause have not been in vain. The union has published during 1894, besides its semi-annual monthly, one temperance pamphlet. Its financial limitations have not permitted the publication of more temperance literature of which there is a great need. It was found more expedient for the present year to unite the two papers into one monthly.

As president of the union, Mr. Vulko Shopoff was elected the Bulgarian commissioner to the World's Fair. He is heart and soul interested in the temperance cause. We hope this year for more aggressive work. It seems that the time has already come for a popular appeal to our government for the limitation of the temperance traffic. A committee for that purpose was appointed and a petition to be presented at the autumn session of the Narodno Sobranie (national assembly) is under way of preparation. The evening session was devoted to several stirring addresses which were listened to by a large audience. So much for the union.

Now a word or two in regard to a recent speech of Mr. Ivan Ev. Gesheff, our Minister of Finance. The Ministry of Commerce and Agriculture being vacant, is put for the present under his care. In this capacity he appointed a committee which is to consider the condition of our peasantry, and the ways in which it may be bettered. In opening the session of this committee Mr. Gesheff clearly pointed out that one of the greatest curses of the peasantry are the krichmi (drinking places) of which there are many in every village. He stated to that committee that hundreds of thousands of women and children will bless them if they will devise the best means of limiting the liquor traffic.

This is a great encouragement to all temperance workers in Bulgaria. We will, therefore, push ahead the above mentioned petition, hoping that it will meet the approval of the people and the national representatives. M. N. Popoff.

WORLD'S CONVENTION NOTES.

Sir Wilfred Lawson and Canon Wilberforce were the favorite speakers among "the men."

Miss Yates, of Maine, spoke several times during the meetings, and always to great acceptance.

Mrs. Selmer was a universal favorite by reason of her sweet spirit and quaintly spoken English.

Mrs. Mary T. Burt, of New York, conducted the memorial services in her usual impressive manner.

Miss Agnes Weston and her guard of English Blue Jackets evoked uproarious applause whenever they appeared.

Miss Jessie Ackermann was unable to speak, to the disappointment of thousands who had counted upon hearing her.

Ten bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States have affixed their names to the Polyglot Petition.

Mrs. Richard, of China, and Mrs. Sheppard, of New Zealand, are honored names that stood side by side on the program.

Miss Conybeare, sister of the well-known member of Parliament, gave an interesting address on "King Khama and his country."

Mrs. Andrew Murray, wife of the saintly man whose books are so well known, spoke admirably from the point of view of an "old-fashioned woman."

Mrs. Harriet D. Walker, of Rhode Island, gave an effective Sunday address and conducted the closing exercises of the great day of the World's Convention.

There was universal rejoicing over the cable of Mrs. Hunt announcing that the Governor had signed the New York Scientific Education Bill of the W. C. T. U.

Miss Mary Gorham's name will always be held in appreciative rememberance by white-ribboners for her effective work in opening more than two hundred London pulpits to women during the World's Convention.

Frau Cauer, one of Germany's chief women, has begun the agitation of the temperance question in her paper, and we shall soon have a W. C. T. U. at the capital.

Miss Lerche, of Christiania, Norway, represented what Lady Henry Somerset called our "Northern Light," one of the most successful branches of the W. C. T. U.

No one was more warmly received than Mother Stewart, whose mellow and beautiful spirit was universally remarked as a link of sweetness between the old land and the new.

Mrs. Mary B. Willard, of Berlin, one of our ex-editors, will help to conduct the Woman's Signal during the vacation of Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Holdsworth.

A cable was received from the Countess Wedel-Jarlsberg, Christiana, Norway, and cables, telegrams and letters of greeting came to the Convention from all parts of the world.

Mrs. Peters, of Newfoundland, pleaded earnestly for a missionary to visit that Island, where a good beginning has been made, and Miss Ackermann hopes to go there ere long.

Mrs. Sager, of Queensland, Australia, and Mrs. Dann, representing the Bahama Islands, with Miss Thompson, of Cairo, Egypt, and Mrs. Organe, Madras, India, were among the delegates.

Mrs. Trygg, of Helsingfors, Finland, was one of the most "taking" members of the Convention. Her enthusiasm bubbled over on all occasions. She was made president of the W. C. T. U. for that country.

Miss Annie Holsworth's new story "The Years the Locust Hath Eaten," is very highly spoken of and a London publisher is to bring it out in book form when it has run its course in the Woman's Signal.

Mrs. Amanda Smith, Mrs. Lucy Thurman and Miss Hallie Q. Brown are three colored women who do credit to their race. Their speaking and participation in the Convention were heartily received by the great audiences.

Miss De Broen, of Paris, made so strong a plea that Miss Agnes Slack, the new secretary of the World's W. C. T. U., and one of the most capable among our young women, intends going there to "lend a hand" as soon as practicable.

A Y meeting, presided over by Mrs. Bertrand Russell (Alys Smith), and a model L. T. L., presided over by Miss Anna A. Gordon, and addressed by her and Mrs. Northam-Fields, were among the most instructive features of the Convention.

Mme. Antoinette Sterling gave her services throughout the Convention. She marched in the processions and identified herself, heart and soul, as was her wont in any good cause to which she is devoted. She is to sing at the Baltimore Convention.

Mrs. Pearsall Smith has become known as "the Chaplain of the B. W. T. A." Her Bible readings, full of instruction in the methods of white-ribbon women, are in great demand, and she is kept constantly "on the wing" during the lecture season.

Mr. H. J. Osborn was the "power behind the throne" in working up these great meetings and his ability in this regard is heartily recognized by our leaders as he deserved. Mrs. Osborn was made superintendent of the World's W. C. T. U. Lecture Bureau on recommendation of Miss Willard.

The absence of Mrs. Judge Thompson, of Hillsboro, was a silent note in the universal harmony, but the Crusade Bible was on duty, and a strong interest was manifested in its history, some of the auditors coming forward and asking permission to lay a hand upon the page opening at the Crusade Psalm.

Miss Augusta Jelstrup, of Trondhjem, Norway, who expected to be a delegate to the World's Convention, wrote that her physician forbade her taking the long trip. Prayer was offered in all the churches of Trondhjem on Sunday, the 19th of May, for the World's Convention and for the woman's work for the protection of the home.

The following is Mrs. Shuman's statement of the length of the petition:

3,076 yards of canvas mounted at Evanston, Ill., containing 1,204,000 names. 2,204,000 names mounted in Evanston, Ill.; 300,000 names mounted in England; 13,638 names mounted in Australia; 2,437 names from British Good Templar Lodges (not mounted); 500 names from other countries (not mounted). 1,520,575 actual signers to the Petition. Counting three names to an inch this petition is eight miles in length. If the six million attestations were added, the entire length of the petition would be nearly forty miles.

Madame Thommaian, of Armenia, Miss Krikorian of Constantinople, and the dear little Indian lady, adopted daughter of Pundita Ramabai, made a charming foreground on the great platform of the Convention, as they wore the picturesque costumes of their respective countries, but the delegates nearly all wore the English dress.

Dr. F. J. Campbell, an American, native of Tennessee, who has established the Royal Normal College for the blind, an admirable institution in London, furnished the music at the great public meeting of the World's W. C. T. U., and his well trained choir received encomiums that must have been most gratifying to Dr. Campbell, who, by the way, was Miss Willard's music teacher in Wisconsin in 1855.

Mrs. Ward Poole, secretary, Miss Gertrude Hunt, office secretary, and Miss Helen Hood, secretary of the department of organization in the B. W. T. A., with their stenographers, wrought without cessation in helping on the preparations. So strenuous was their work that it was feared they would be ill, but happily they seem to be recuperating in the less arduous toil that has followed the Convention.

Mrs. Rosseter Willard, editor of the Woman's Budget, is a white-ribboner from Nebraska where she was post mistress and editor, and years after she had an invaluable business experience in connection with journalism in Chicago. Mrs. Willard has been business manager of the White Ribbon Co., Ltd., London, for over a year and a half and her devotion to the work is recognized by all who know her.

Mrs. Todd, of New Brunswick, Canada, acting president of the Dominion W. C. T. U., was a prominent figure in the executive committee of the World's Association, and conducted the opening exercises of the World's W. C. T. U. Convention. She led the doxology over the Prohibition resolution adopted by the Dominion Parliament, and her name appeared on the program of the great Queen's Hall meeting. Mrs. Archibald, president of the W. C. T. U. of the Maritime Provinces, spoke at this meeting, and also in Exeter Hall.

There is a quiet member of the white-ribbon army who is rather known by her works than her words, and she has had no small share in making a success of the London Convention; her name is Anna A. Gordon. When Mrs. Woodbridge left us, the assistant secretary of the W. C. T. U. assumed her duties, and has worked unremittingly from that day to this to build up the society. She has sent out thousands of letters and documents, and in the making of the program, arranging for the Polyglot Petition and in countless other ways her quick mind and trusty hand have been busy. She has now completed one-half of her nineteenth year of work for the W. C. T. U. as Miss Willard's private secretary and as superintendent of juvenile work in the World's W. C. T. U., and as its assistant secretary, to which position she was chosen at the Convention when Miss Agnes Slack was elected secretary. Her song books are in the hands of the children of white-ribbon women everywhere, and her book, "Questions Answered," is the standard for Loyal Temperance Legion work. She has also prepared the chapter on the children's work in Miss Willard's "Do Everything" manual for workers. Few young women in our nation have made such a record "all in quietness and with a smile."

Mrs. Ida A. T. Arms, president of Chili W. C. T. U., writes in a private letter: "We arrived safely at Conception in February. Had a very pleasant voyage. Stopped at Iquique, Antofagasta, Coquimbo and Santiago, Chili, and Callao, in Peru, and were four days at Panama. All down the coast I talked W. C. T. U., at Iquique addressing the regular temperance meeting. At all these points there are strong temperance societies. There seems little interest, however, in a national organization. At Callao dear old Grandma Ward, one of Indiana's Crusaders, is as full of interest as ever. She has worked most faithfully with the Petition. On the whole general interest in temperance is increasing in Chili. The daily papers even dare publish articles, and I propose to renew my request for a temperance column. Perhaps in the year's absence they have forgotten my previous efforts. We have our local organization here. As much interest is shown as ever. We are all busy women, and our hands and hearts are full with many things. In April I gave an address before the Epworth League in a public meeting—'The W. C. T. U., What is it and what is it doing?' This paper was asked for translation, and has been read since before a Chillian temperance society in Santiago. Later it was requested for publication in the Western Courier, a weekly journal published in Valparaiso."

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

COUNTY CONVENTIONS AND GENERAL ACTIVITIES.

This is the season of supposed rest, and many of the workers are leaving for mountain and coast only to carry the love of the temperance cause with them to enthuse other women to enlist in our peaceful war.

A few unions have ceased to hold their regular meetings during the heated term, but will sustain the interest by occasional parlor meetings with discussions of some department topics.

Finding it impossible to hold their conventions before the annual state convention Kern and Santa Barbara counties chose their officers in executive—that they might be confirmed at the annual meeting—and have since held wide-awake conventions.

Kern county covers a large territory, with small towns far apart, and the rum traffic in full sway. Three unions are bravely defending our cause, the principal one being in Bakersfield, a town which has the business portion of its principal street lined with saloons. Heroines, indeed, are the few brave souls who fight the fight of faith in Bakersfield. Mrs. S. S. Hunter is the leader of the courageous band, and in the opening devotionals appropriately "admonished each member to be prepared and accept whatever test God might give her during the convention." Only volunteers could accept such a command.

Delano has held public meetings, kept literature in the postoffice pocket and sent relief to the Nebraska sufferers. Rosedale —at present disorganized—has lent its strength to the Good Templars and together one saloon has been routed by them. Cigarette pictures among the school children was the alarm which aroused the mothers to the need of more careful and faithful labors for purity.

In four weeks Poso union had opened up social work and circulated petitions to prevent the entrance of saloons into the valley, and with eight delegates at the convention made a record to be proud of for so young a child. Led by Bakersfield union, a large mass-meeting was held in that city and by its influence a notorious dive was driven from the place. The papers were good, the pastors kindly took part in the discussions and resolutions were adopted promising active work for the suffrage amendment to strike the word "male" from our constitution which will be voted upon in 1896, and sympathy and support in suppressing the dives.

Over the mountains to the northern part of their territory went the Santa Barbara county sisters and held their convention June 26 and 27 at Lompoc. They began with that blessed inspiring feature, a sunrise prayer-meeting, and, of old, the Master went early to the temple, so these women disciples found Him ready with a blessing for them. At nine o'clock Mrs. Jennie Carden, county president, opened the regular session, and Mrs. Anna B. Southwick, state superintendent of evangelistic work, conducted the devotionals. Four unions were represented—Carpenteria, Santa Barbara, Lompoc and Los Olivos. The county president's address was replete with helpful suggestions and the papers were full of practical truths pungently put. In the evening the greeting and welcomes, hearty and cordial, were extended. To these words of appreciation of what the white-ribboners are doing for humanity, the delegates responded and the exercises closed with "We'll turn our glasses upside down," sung by six little boys. Thursday morning a lively discussion followed the presentation of a report on "peace and arbitration." Mrs. Corning, of Lompoc, gave an excellent address on "Relation of Early Training to Temperance," and Mrs. Knepper a paper on "Scientific Temperance Instruction." So fast are the workers joining those at rest, that the memorial services have become touching prominent parts of the annual programs, and by faith we clasp hands with the dear ones whom we see not, yet continue to love. Such a service conducted by Mrs. S. M. Glasscork, was closed by singing, "When the mists have rolled away." Thursday evening was given to "suffrage," Mrs. Wright, of Santa Barbara, leading. Mrs. M. E. Garbutt, state vice-president, followed with a logical, dignified and pleasing address upon this subject, which to the women of California at this time is so important.

A temperance movement has begun in Los Angeles which promises much good. It is called the "Anti-Saloon League." The object is thus stated in its constitution: "The object of this League shall be to secure the enactment of such laws and ordinances, and the election of men pledged to enact and enforce such laws and ordinances as shall result in the abolition of the saloon." Only qualified voters can become members and they pledge their support to the League, while on all other questions they remain with their respective political parties. A number of district meetings have been held and in every instance new members secured. A mass-meeting of all reform and temperance societies has already been called and the day will be given to discussing the mutual standing ground.

As some changes have been made since the convention our state officers are now as follows: President, Mrs. N. P. J. Button; vice-president, Mrs. Mary E. Garbutt; corresponding secretary, Miss G. T. Stickney; recording secretary, Mrs. L. H. Mills; treasurer, Mrs. Sophia W. Plimpton; assistant treasurer, Miss K. C. Morrison; state organizer, Dr. Esthelle Strasser.

NEBRASKA.

AT THE CHAUTAUQUA ASSEMBLIES.

Two of Nebraska's Chautauqua assemblies have been in session, Beatrice and Crete. At each of them a school of methods has been conducted with very gratifying results. At Beatrice, Mrs. Octavia H. Jones, of Hastings, conducted the school in place of Mrs. Walker, our president, who attended the World's Convention in London. Mrs. Jones was a new worker at this assembly, but was very efficient and greatly liked. Various state workers spoke on the work of their departments on different days. Mrs. Woods, of Omaha, on press work, Mrs. Richardson, of Lincoln, on temperance legislation, Mrs. Cobb, state treasurer, upon finance, Miss Anna Goudy, of Liberty, gave a very pleasing address to a large number on the Y work, and Dr. Lankton, of Omaha, occupied the platform at the tabernacle on the afternoon of Temperance Day, and gave a very pleasing address.

A mothers' meeting was conducted one day by Mrs. Nesbett, of Pawnee City. One of the most enjoyable meetings was the devotional service of the last day. A number of ministers were in attendance, and joined with us in a W. C. T. U. love feast.

At Crete Mrs. C. M. Woodward had charge. This school was especially favored in having the presence of Mrs. Benjamin for five days, who gave her parliamentary drills and lectures, to the great pleasure and benefit of the large number in attendance. She also filled several engagements in different parts of the state, and greatly pleased everywhere she went.

The fifth district held its annual convention in Fairbury, in May. It was a sad meeting, for their president, dear Mother Putnam, had passed away just ten days before. On the platform was her empty chair draped in mourning and surrounded with flowers.

Mrs. Walker, state president, was present throughout, and was very helpful in suggestion, in song and in address.

Chase county, away out west, although under the burden of hard times and loss of crops, held its annual convention enthusiastically, delegates being present from every union in the county, with visitors from an adjoining county.

A large and beneficial convention was held by Gage county W. C. T. U. in Holmesville. The union here is young and this was its first active work, but I do not know what union could have done better. One of their pleasant courtesies was a lunch and supper served at the home of Mrs. E. Lancaster. This house became indeed a "Rest Cottage" during the noon and tea hours—about fifty being fed and refreshed. Mrs. Bowman, the president, is very efficient in carrying business along with interest and dispatch.

The first evening, a fine lecture by Rev. C. S. Dudley, of Beatrice, was given. Brother Dudley is always our friend and ready to champion our cause. The second evening was devoted to a suffrage contest, the contestants all being married women. As usual, all did so well it was difficult to decide, but the Susan B. Anthony spoon was bestowed upon Mrs. Dora D. Nickell, of Beatrice, who recited a part of Lide Meriwether's address before the Congress of Women. A choir of young people furnished excellent music and a quartette of ladies sang, "When the women all shall vote in Nebraska." Miss Goudy then gave a short address on Y work which was interesting enough to hold the large audience in close attention.

Hamilton county convention was held in Aurora with twenty-two delegates. Excellent papers were read by Mrs. Elarton, Mrs. Ferguson and Miss Dey; a mothers' meeting, conducted by Mrs. Gulliver, and a Bible reading, prepared by the state evangelistic superintendent, was given by Mrs. Klumb. Work for the Y and L. T. L. departments was urged and parliamentary rules and equal suffrage made a special study.

In June, Mrs. Julia M. Klinck, president of Kearney county, assisted by Mrs. Marshall, of Adams county, made a tour of the former county, organizing three unions,—at Norman, Axtell and Wilcox—all of which are finely officered and promise good work. Mrs. Marshall held her county convention at Roseland, with fine delegations from all unions in the county. An L. T. L. was organized by Mrs. Klinck, with Mrs. Dora Evans as leader.

The Bible readings of our state evangelistic superintendent, Mrs. Upton, which are given each month in the Worker, are found helpful by more than our own number. In the June Worker the subject was "The Battlements on the Roof," Deut. 22:8 being the foundation of the reading. On July 14 one of Lincoln's prominent ministers chose this text from which to preach a scathing sermon upon the policy of the present administration in that city regarding the social evil. All the work accomplished last year by Mayor Weir in driving out these workers of iniquity has apparently been undone by the present mayor, who pursues the policy of setting aside a portion of the city where houses of ill-repute are permitted to exist and ply their evil vocation. It is needless to say that the W. C. T. U. and Christian people in general condemn the mayor's policy. The sermon referred to was full of indignant condemnation, which will receive hearty approval, but the queer thing about it is that while the reverend gentleman so unsparingly denounces this policy, he favors licensing the saloon as the best way of controlling the traffic. He compares the saloon-keeper's license to the red card proclaiming "diphtheria," whose meaning is, "Here is danger we cannot destroy, beware." Is it not a marvel what a hold the licensed saloon has upon so many of Christ's followers and even of His ministers? How can an honest soul see any difference in the righteousness of licensing evils?

In my report of the passage of the age of consent bill, I neglected to mention that the bill was presented in the house by Mr. Emerson Benedict, who used his time and influence, by speech and personal work, to secure its passage. This was appreciated by the ladies, and a beautiful bouquet of roses adorned his desk as a token of their gratitude.

We anxiously await the return of our pilgrim sisters from their delightful trip abroad. We intend to keep them busy relating their experiences.

God-given opportunity pass unimproved. For it is our mission to eliminate everything unwholesome, impure and demoralizing, and introduce all that is pure, honest and of good report.

Valuable suggestions have been given by former superintendents and we can only hope to give a few added hints. We deem it of the first importance that every state erect a for permanent headquarters on the state agricultural grounds. It must be a large, commodious structure of architectural beauty, with quiet nooks for the essential, individual work, and broad verandas from which matin and vesper songs may lead the footsteps nearer, and the soul to higher, holier thinking. Its very arrangement and surroundings should be suggestive of work, rest, instruction, personal and social contact, and hospitality; indeed, so attractive that the coming to the fair will be a pleasant anticipation each year. With such accommodations a wide field is provided for our forty lines of

and the cosmopolitan character of the attendance will insure every wide awake superintendent an interested audience, and each one should see the importance of being on hand to plan, direct and present her department. But we cannot elaborate—its importance is self-evident—and certainly no better place or time could be found for conducting a which should be planned with care and tact, with the idea of its becoming a permanent feature of the state fair, an outing to be looked forward to by the thoughtful, weary farm-wives of the state, as the chief attraction—as a "University Extension," course of seven days, from which they cannot afford to be absent. We cannot estimate the moral strength and spiritual power exerted by forty consecrated superintendents and their corps of subordinates doing effective service during fair week. Will not every state superintendent select her workers and send forth instructions at once, remembering to communicate every helpful suggestion to the National Superintendent?

For permanent decoration ask each Union and Loyal Legion to present the Headquarters with a banner, and the Sunday Schools to send their pledge cards. Why not have a National Fair Souvenir? [The Union Signal is the best souvenir we know of!—Eds.] Who will send in a design immediately? That which is good for the state fair is equally applicable to the county gatherings, with some limitations. A superintendent in every state and territory and a superintendent with a fair committee from local unions in every county whether a fair is held there or not is my special ambition.

It should be borne in mind that the fairs are largely attended by a class of men and women who never attend temperance conventions, and have but few opportunities to become acquainted with our various lines of work. The fairs are almost the only days of recreation they have and are looked forward to with anticipations of particular pleasure, and with a little effort and tact on our part the W. C. T. U. departments of work could be so presented that these times would be hailed with special pleasure and be attended with valuable instruction.

The present financial depression has in many instances prevented the rural population from gaining a correct knowledge of the temperance work, through the various newspapers and magazines. The real necessities of life were all they had means to secure, and no doubt our literature, if distributed at the fairs, would be to very many a real intellectual and spiritual feast for which there had been positive mind and heart-hunger.

"The Work of the W. C. T. U. on Fair Grounds," must be presented to each State and County Agricultural Society so that it may be prepared to act at the annual meeting when the officers are elected, and in connection with that it would be well to speak of the fact that in some of the state and county fair programs they have what is called "Woman's Day." There every woman's society, trade, profession or business of any kind, are invited to have a representative. In appreciation of the favor the ladies try to make it a day of special interest by having the various organizations represented by their best talent. A woman director would be chairman of the committee on program for that day. You can readily see the advantage there would be in having a woman director on each state and county board and also of having "Woman's Day" on the program.

As the National Convention is to be so early great promptness will be necessary in sending in reports. I expect to hear from every state.

Yours for work,
Clara Vinson Weaver,

DEPARTMENT OF SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Dear Sisters:—I bring to your notice the importance of speedy communication with me on the line of effort for the soldiers and sailors, that your work for the past twelve months may have proper recognition in my report to the National union.

I want to gather in all the records by September 1, and it is unnecessary to give you any formula in questions, as you are aware what our great constituency desires to know as evidence of progress in lives of sobriety and right living among the classes of men for whose temporal and eternal welfare we are laboring.

It is also desirable, as well as interesting, to note facts of advanced legislation in your respective states, exhibiting the uplift of public sentiment toward the betterment of the condition of these servants of the Republic, who represent our government in the army and navy of the United States.

There are, I know, many unions in our large seaport cities especially who are interested in the men of the sea. Let me earnestly request to hear from such, whether a superintendent exists or not in connection with your W. C. T. U.

Let the prayers of all white-ribboners be fervent at the throne of grace for America's "blue-jackets" and military forces, whether on land or ocean, who are sorely tempted and tried by the drink demon.

NEWS FROM ABROAD.

Miss Camilla Bigisup, of Ridgway, Pa., writes that her father who is president of the Verein union of Vienna, Austria, and the lady members of that organization are so delighted with the "Handbook of German and English" that they are thinking of ordering one hundred copies. The book gives a history of the W. C. T. U. and the methods of carrying on meetings of the union, Bands of Hope and public meetings. It has the Pledge and a Constitution, By-laws, Hints and Helps toward Carrying on Successful Meetings, also Catechism on Alcohol and one on Tobacco, Responsive Readings for Meetings on Intemperance, For the Young, on Saloons, on the Good Time Coming, etc., etc. Altogether it is a very useful book for workers. It is in both German and English, and Swedish and English, and is sold for fifteen cents per copy except in large quantities, which are ten cents per copy. I have recently published two Italian tracts that are said to be so well received by the Italians as to create an excellent demand. One is "How to Grow Rich in America, and How to Grow Poor," by Dr. Harriet Kane, of Kane, Pa., whose brother employs eight hundred Italians. Of course she is well acquainted with the needs of the people, and has given admirable suggestions for their conduct, both in regard to intemperance and social purity. This is illustrated. The other is, "Why You should not Drink Intoxicating Liquors."

In order to have the National report of the Young Woman's Branch ready at the time set by Mrs. Katharine L. Stevenson, corresponding secretary of the National W. C. T. The annual convention of the W. C. T. U. of South Dakota will meet at Pierre, September 13–16. The general officers, state superintendents, district and county presidents are ex officio delegates. One of our best National speakers will be with us.

Treasurer's Corner.

Great anxiety is expressed by treasurers in several states lest the holding of the National Convention in October (one month earlier than usual) will prevent the full payment of dues prior to that time. It certainly will place us at a disadvantage, unless heroic and persistent efforts are made by all local treasurers to secure the early payment of dues. Will not every local treasurer who reads this Corner at once go to work to collect dues from every member and see that the state's share of the same be forwarded at once to the state treasurer, and then if each state treasurer would forward to the National treasurer ten cents per member of all dues in up to August 20, it would greatly help the National to meet its obligations. Then the balance could be sent by September 20 instead of waiting until the last moment and sending the whole amount at once.

Dues have been received from Maine, Indian Territory, Ohio, Delaware, North Carolina, Massachusetts, Northern California, Illinois, Connecticut, Indiana and Florida since last report. Donations have come from Sarah E. Prince (World's), $1.80; A friend, Illinois, $5; Mrs. Geo. D. Marsh (World's), $1; Sue Phillips, Brown, Ky. (Willard Fountain), $2; Wm. Blake, S. S. Remington, Ind. (World's), $3; McLean union, Ill., Self-Denial, $2.10; hospital, Mrs. Tenny, N. Y. $96; Temple, $4, from same; Mrs. Woodin, Mich., $1; E. S. Burrows, Me., $2. Membership fees from M. S. Lane, E. J. C. Thorpe, Rose B. Mason and Eliza W. Halliday. Birthday gifts from Mrs. R. W. Marriage, M. C. Madison, L. E. Zimmerman, Elisan Brown, Mary M. Cook, A. D. Fish, Deborah C. Leeds, Mrs. E. B. Clarkson and sister, W. J. Bonsall, Ida F. Barr, Louise Brooks, C. H. Sheppard, S. A. Ellison, Eva B. Bacon, Frances E. Barnes, while from South Africa comes this cheering remembrance:

Dear Mrs. Barker:—I have noticed the request of our beloved Miss Willard at the head of Treasurer's Corner in The Union Signal of May 9, and as I have this week completed my sixty-first year and am glad to contribute my little mite to "transfer our W. C. T. U. from crutches to wings," I ask you to accept the enclosed $1.22, equivalent to sixty-one English pennies.

Yours ever for the blessed cause in Christ's name, Laura B. Bridgman.

Only $1.60 has been received on Lathrap fund from Mrs. Madison, Mrs. M. Stafford and A Friend. The Woodbridge fund has received from Mrs. Madison, $1; Mrs. A. J. Crosby, 25 cents; Mrs. White, 50 cents; Mrs. Stafford, 50 cents; Elizabeth K. Taylor, $2.50; Mrs. Buss, England, 25 cents; Mrs. Price, 20 cents.

Allow me to call attention to the fact that next month comes our self-denial week and we hope this will receive attention from every lover of the work.

Kernels.

Johnny had been studying his spelling lesson and learning definitions, particularly of words with prefixes from the Greek. He had defined monologue as a soliloquy, or "one man talking to himself."

"Now what is a conversation between two persons?" asked the teacher.

"A dialogue."

"And between more than two persons?"

"A pollywog," replied Johnny, promptly.

"Robbie," said the visitor, kindly, "have you any little brothers and sisters?"

"No," replied Robbie, solemnly, "I'm all the children we've got."

The following keen retort is attributed to the French artist, Couture:

A man stepped in front of him whom he recognized as having known a quarter of a century before.

"Do you not know me?" he asked. "They say I have not changed."

"That is exactly the reason," replied Couture, quickly, "why I do not know you."

Six-year-old Alice, travelling on the cars, regarded a fat lady near her so long and so earnestly that the lady remarked pleasantly, at last, "Well, my dear, what do you think of me?" "I think," replied Alice, "that you would be a very nice looking lady if you could only be slimmed a little."

At a temperance meeting where several related their experiences, a humorous Irishman was acknowledged to be the chief speaker. He had on a pair of fine new boots. Said he, "A week after I signed the pledge I met an old friend, and he says, 'Them's a fine pair of boots you have on.' 'They are,' says I, 'and by the same token 'twas the saloon-keeper who gave them to me.' 'That was generous of him,' says he. 'It was,' says I, 'but I made a bargain with him. He was to keep his drink and I was to keep my money. My money bought me these fine boots. I got the best of the bargain, and I'm going to stick to it.'"

"Say, papa, if we were living at the centre of the earth, wouldn't we be all funny?"

"What makes you think so, my son?"

"'Cause this jography says everything there loses its gravity."

A merchant who died suddenly not long ago, left on his desk a letter he had intended mailing to a correspondent. An Irish clerk finding it sent it off after adding this postscript, "Since writing the above I have died."

Little Douglas, though only four years old, has quite an idea of drawing and makes beautiful carts with four entire wheels visible, and four-legged animals with a leg protruding from each corner. But engines and cars baffle him. He brought his slate to his father one day with this request:

"Dwaw a wailwoad twack with tars running on it."

His father did as he was asked, and told Douglas to make a copy of it and show it to him. The little fellow puzzled over this for some time and finally brought the slate back with his picture, consisting of two parallel lines only, made underneath his father's.

"Yes," said papa, "that's a very nice track, but where's the train?"

"W'y," said Douglas, "those twains is wacin' and mine's out of sight."

"I am here, gentlemen," explained the pickpocket to his fellow prisoners, "as the result of a moment of abstraction."

"And I," said the incendiary, "because of an unfortunate habit of making light of things."

"And I," chimed in the forger, "on account of a simple desire to make a name for myself."

"And I," added the burglar, "through nothing but taking advantage of an opening which offered in a large mercantile establishment up-town." But here the warden separated them.

A teacher was explaining to a little girl how the trees developed their foliage in spring-time.

"Ah, yes," said the wee miss, "I understand; they keep their summer clothes in their trunks."

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

Home Hints.

If one is very heroic she will attack the largest holes first in darning stockings, but to most people the yawning breaks at the heels are a weekly dread. An easy and serviceable way of mending stockings other than by regular darning is to baste a piece of coarse net over the hole and darn through it. This makes a neat, smooth patch.

Equal quantities of lemon juice and glycerine make a fine emollient for the skin. Use at night, and wear a pair of well perforated kid gloves. In the morning wash the hands thoroughly in warm water, rub well with a few drops of lemon juice, and, after a few applications, the skin will be soft and smooth. It is equally good for the face and neck.

For neuralgic headache take a slice of lemon and rub the juice onto the affected part. We know this is an excellent remedy. It may be just as good for any bad headache, but of that we cannot speak from experience.

To brighten either smooth or figured brass utensils or ornaments rub with cut lemon dipped in salt.

An exchange says that a little bag of bread crumbs dropped into a kettle where odorous vegetables are boiling will absorb the disagreeable smell. No one can afford to let the suggestion pass without testing it.

Water and vinegar bottles which have become discolored can be cleaned with coarse shot or with small pieces of raw potato. Put a little cold water in the bottle with the shot or potato and shake until the stains are removed.

Dr. Duncan, writing for Demorest's, says that pure cinnamon makes an invaluable drink if one is where there is any danger of typhoid fever from poor drainage or impure water. Steep and drink freely, as it has power to destroy infectious microbes.

A use has been found for old umbrella frames. They make excellent frames for branching and vining house plants. With a file, a pair of pinchers and some fine wire or stout thread any additions can easily be woven in to make the frame closer, according to the need of the plant. We can imagine that such a canopy covered by a fuschia, or nasturtium vine in full bloom would be a thing of beauty.

Slices of oranges are rather unmanageable. A better way to prepare this fruit for the table is, after peeling, to take a fork and a sharp knife and cut into small pieces. This makes a juicy, agreeable dessert.

Here are a few simple things worth remembering: Use ammonia in warm water for cleaning combs and hair brushes; in dish-water to brighten silver; in the laundry for washing flannels, it will keep them soft and white; also for washing lace and fine muslin, as it removes the dirt with but little rubbing.

Lamp wicks soaked in vinegar will burn with a more brilliant light and will not smoke.

Many people who think they cannot drink milk because it does not agree with them will find the unpleasant effects entirely overcome if they will drink the milk slowly, by sipping it. New milk taken in this way is one of the most grateful food drinks for the weakest stomach. Milk swallowed rapidly forms a curdled mass in the stomach, causing the heavy, depressed feeling many complain of. A taste for drinking warm milk can easily be acquired by most people.

For a delicious dish take large, full-meated tomatoes, cut off the tops of a sufficient number to fill a baking dish of the desired size. Remove about a third of the seeds and fill the space with bread crumbs, butter and a little salt and pepper. Sprinkle bread crumbs over the whole, add a few more bits of butter. Bake till the crumbs are a light brown.

Lemon cut in quarters or eighths and served with almost any kind of fish and with many kinds of cold meat is an excellent relish. In this form the lemon can conveniently be taken in the fingers, and a squeeze of the juice improves a variety of flavors. It is particularly acceptable with fish preserved in oil.

Antique decanters, which because of our higher education are no longer kept on the sideboard, make beautiful furnishings for the dressing table where they may be filled with cologne or toilet waters.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

Dear Sisters and Co-Laborers:—I have never before written the above words with such tenderness. The eventful convention trip, the close and constant companionship of so many consecrated white-ribboners, the meeting with "loyal hearts and true" across the water, has stirred the music in our soul, and we are singing with fervor:

"Blest be the tie that binds," etc.

The mail brings to me from a saint of sixty years words of cheer and welcome: "I was glad to see by The Union Signal your safe return from the World's Convention and from Switzerland. I am so glad you could go and get refreshed for your great work." As I read that sentence I wished I might sit close beside the dear woman and talk with her of the soul refreshing, the inspiration, the helpfulness of that journey, memorable, not to me alone, but to every wearer of the "ribbon white," and I believe to every passenger on the good steamer Berlin. The farewell words were a little tremulous, and there was an unspoken realization of possibilities as the shore faded in the distance, and the "white wings" which fluttered their good-byes became wholly invisible. We were "at sea," together, and then began the weaving of threads of friendship and love which must affect the work of the National W. C. T. U. and of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association far beyond human calculation. It would be unbecoming to put in cold type the many words of encouragement spoken to us individually, but we may be pardoned for saying that the expressions of good will and increasing interest for The Union Signal, our various publications and the W. T. P. A., so broadened "the business outlook," that we foresee a grander future, more extended patronage, and deeper loyalty to our Association.

The steamer chair of our National treasurer was usually close beside my own, and though almost invisible in our "Kenwood rugs" of red and blue, each had a listening ear for "dues" and over-dues, and it is pleasant to record that converts were made on the "ocean wave" who then and there donned the only piece of ribbon to be had, thousands of miles from land, a trifle gray, to be sure, from having done service on the back of my steamer chair. But it indicated the spirit of the voyage, and the never flagging zeal of the grand company of delegates to the World's Convention.

"Oh! that all the dear Illinois women could see and hear and be a part of these good times!" writes Mrs. Rounds to the Watch-Tower, and this was the oft-expressed wish of the many presidents whose hearts are closely linked to the constituency represented in the Third Biennial World's W. C. T. U. Convention.

But, dear friends, next to hearing is seeing, and when you have read the vivid pen pictures of the associate editor, Miss Jennie Stewart, in The Union Signal, if you will send to the W. T. P. A. fifty cents for paper, or one dollar for cloth bound copy of our new and enlarged edition of "Thumb Nail Sketches of White-Ribboners," you can look into the faces of forty of the leaders, many of whom were prominent in these important gatherings, and the illusion will be so complete that you will imagine yourself on the floor of the convention.

"I shall never regret this investment," said the outward-bound and home-coming passengers on the Berlin and New York, and if you will send at once for this interesting little volume with its brief sketches and biographies, and its beautiful half-tones, we believe you, too, will say, "I shall never regret the investment."

Yours for more earnest work,

Caroline F. Grow, Bus. Mgr.,
Woman's Temp. Pub. Ass'n,
The Temple, Chicago, Ill.

For a Sleep-Inducer

Our Library Table.

An Errant Wooing. By Mrs. Burton Harrison. This volume is valuable chiefly for its fine illustrations, all of which are of noted centers of interest to travelers in England. Mrs. Harrison's descriptions of English ways and oddities, as viewed by contrast with American individualities, are very apt. The story, however, is not satisfactory unless, indeed, one is in search of a narrative with no more "body" than is usually found in the society novel. The warp and woof of strong, picturesque delineations and pretty fiction result in a pleasing fabrication, suitable for "summer wear."

The Century Co., New York. Price, $1.50.

The Boy Soldiers of 1812. By Everett T. Tomlinson.

The scene of this story which will delight boys, is laid on and about Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence River. The history and traditions of this section of our country furnish abundant material which has never been used, and which the author works into the story with great effect. The main points in the story are historically true, and many of the incidents have an historical basis, with which is interwoven just enough of romance to give it life and spirit. The story is free from improbabilities, and is one that all young people will like.

Lee & Shepard, Boston. Price $1.50.

The Watch Fires of '76. By Samuel Adams Drake. Illustrated.

A choice coterie of aged Revolutionary pensioners meet around the fireside of a country inn, each giving his individual experiences in camp or field, in the most unconstrained way.

"The broken soldier, kindly bade to stay,
Sat by the fire, and talked the night away."

Each of the old heroes tells the story of the important events and stirring adventures in which he was an actor, in his own language, giving the details as they fell under his observation. It is not a retelling of hackneyed stories, but a bright, fresh presentation of many incidents never before given in so readable a form.

Lee & Shepard, Boston. Price $1.25.

Punishment and Reformation. A work dealing with crimes, prisons and reformation. By Dr. F. H. Wines. Vol. VI. in Crowell's Library of Economics and Politics.

Mr. Wines, who is known all over the world as one of the most practical and brilliant of investigators in this difficult field, has given in the above work a historical account of the growth of modern ideas on this question. In the most graphic manner he shows how from the very beginning of history, different people have treated crimes; how the old idea of "an eye for an eye," gradually gave way to wiser and more reasonable methods and how at last arose the celebrated Elmira system of treating crime as a disease and the criminal as a patient who under an indeterminate sentence must be cured by changing his environment, building up his physical and mental nature and then discharging him perhaps under surveillance. It is a valuable book, that will do much to educate the people in regard to a subject on which there is as yet altogether too much sentimentality on the one hand and brutal severity on the other.

T. Y. Crowell & Co., Boston and New York. Price $1.75.

Sonya Kovalevsky: Her recollections of childhood, translated from the Russian by Isabel F. Hapgood; with a biography by Anna Carlotta Leffler, Duchess of Cajanello, translated from the Swedish by A. M. Clive Bayley.

This most interesting volume is a character study of rare strength and sweetness. Sónya Kovalévsky is described as a "woman upon whom the union of a masculine mind with a feminine heart imposed the difficult task of solving diametrically opposite problems which all women, gifted or otherwise, must face." Sónya's recollections of her childhood form a study of child-nature that is of intrinsic value, and Miss Hapgood's translation has apparently marred none of the original beauty of unique and artless expression. The reader is filled with admiration for the child-woman whose mental grasp was so strong, comprehensive and independent, yet whose heart was hungry for those relations of the affections from which her virile thought almost debarred her. Of especial interest is the story of her struggle from the bonds that kept Russian girls from entering the student's and author's arena with her brothers. But mind conquered prejudice and Sónya at last was known in Sweden as "our Professor Sónya."

IN TIME OF NEED.

"Have you a copy of the Birthday Book?" "Have you an extra silver pin?" were two questions asked us frequently on the outward-bound steamer, and it occurred to us that no white-ribboner should start from home without these essentials. Fountain pens were pressed into service constantly, and the possessor of a Birthday Book had an air of conscious superiority as she saw her neighbor asking for autographs on an ordinary pad of paper. Just what you need at state, county and National conventions is the White Ribbon Birthday Book.

Our new bow pin of white enamel on sterling silver had an increased valuation as the dainty knots of white ribbon lost their stiffness and freshness at sea. The beautiful pin is not intended to supersede the white ribbon, but in an emergency or for an outer garment it has its place. For the "young women" the silver bow has a charm on scarfs and neckties where the ribbon cannot so easily be worn. As a gift to a white-ribboner it has no equal.

STATEMENT BY BISHOP HURST.

"The Temperance Movement, or the Conflict of Man with Alcohol," by the Hon. Henry W. Blair, ex-United States Senator from New Hampshire, is probably the most important contribution to temperance literature that has been made by any author. It is a storehouse of information on the evil effects of alcohol on the human constitution, the mind and the spiritual life. He presents the history of legislation and reform in general on this subject, and then gives an account of the most successful methods for the annihilation of the liquor traffic. This useful volume is illustrated with maps, diagrams, colored plates and full-page portraits. It would be a great blessing to our people if a copy of this book were placed in every home throughout the land. Should it undergo a new revision, introducing the latest history of the subject, it would be still more valuable than it is now. I sincerely wish that by some means it might have a world-wide circulation. [Signed]

Signal Notes.

It is reported that in twenty-seven places in Minnesota the curfew ordinance is in force.

Miss Lilias Hamilton, a young Scotch woman, is an important member of the court of the Ameer of Afghanistan in the capacity of physician and surgeon.

According to the report of the president of the United States Brewers' Association, the output of the breweries has increased in ten years from 11,916,120 to 33,822,872 barrels.

The Brewers' Journal states that English syndicates have $91,000,000 invested in American breweries, the dividend on which, at nine per cent last year, was $8,190,000, and was paid in gold.

Ten women have been appointed on the list of census takers in Boston. A woman has also received the position of census taker for Cass county, Minn. There the population is so scattered that she will be obliged to make the canvass on horseback.

The Canadian Pacific railroad has for years sold lands adjoining its stations with the understanding that no intoxicating liquors shall be sold thereon. If this compact, which is incorporated in the deed, is violated the land reverts to the railroad company.

North Carolina has overcome her long standing objection to conferring the degree of LL.D. on a woman. Mrs. Caroline Phillips Spencer, to whom it was refused several years ago, has this year received her LL.D. by unanimous vote of the trustees of the state university.

John G. Woolley, of Chicago, has been secured for a series of gospel temperance, no-license and good citizenship meetings for New England, commencing September 1 to October 27, inclusive; also November 6 to December 9, inclusive. The great success attending the series of fifty meetings held in New England this spring is ample indorsement of his ability and wonderful power to reach the hearts of the Christian people.

One of the largest dealers in tobacco and cigars in Boston sells 1,000,000 cigarettes each week; there are three more who sell 500,000 each, five dispose of 100,000 each, and two others 250,000 each, making an appalling weekly total of 3,500,000 of these worst of tobacco compounds. Most of these cigarettes are smoked in Boston. This basis as an average would give every individual in the city of Boston a cigarette daily and leave a reserve fund.

The Wells, Fargo express company have issued an order to its employes making the superintendent, route agent, or general agent, personally responsible for any loss occurring through failure to properly exercise their authority in the matter of controlling the habits of drinking or gambling of the men they employ. At the first offence, taking a glass of liquor while on duty, an employé is to be cautioned at once, and on repeating the offence be discharged immediately.

The board of trustees of the United Society of Christian Endeavor has drafted an "appeal for fellowship" to the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church. This appeal was presented to the convention at Boston and received the hearty indorsement of that body and was unanimously passed by every one present. We quote the following clause: "We regard the Methodist Episcopal Church as one of the foremost in the proclamation of Christian spiritual fraternity, and we greatly desire to welcome the Methodist Episcopal young people, with their glorious fervor, to our delightful interdenominational fellowship."

The Children's Home Society incorporated under the laws of the state of Illinois, for the purpose of finding homes for homeless children, has just held its twelfth annual meeting. In his report for the year ending May 31, 1895, the general superintendent says there are now eighteen states organized for this work under one management. At the beginning of the year there were on hand 171 children; during the year there were received 1,646, of these 1,375 were placed in homes for the first time, and 475 were replaced, these having been returned for one reason or another. Persons wishing to receive children either for adoption or special contract will address Rev. Geo. K. Hoover, 167 Dearborn street, room 712, Chicago.

Couldn't Stand Upright.

June 11th, 1894.

The Dr. J. H. McLean Medicine Co.,
St. Louis, Mo.

Gentlemen:

For about ten years I suffered with a pain in my back which I thought was caused by a strain, sometimes it got so bad I could not stand upright or ride in my buggy. I read in your almanac of symptoms that I recognized as my own, which led me to the conclusion that my trouble was disease in the kidneys. I immediately began using Dr. J. H. McLean's Liver and Kidney Balm. It proved to be the right medicine and reached the spot. I soon lost all pain and had better health than ever before. It is more than a year now since I quit using it and have not had a pain or sick day in all that time. It is certainly a wonderful medicine for the kidneys.

Yours truly,

JNO. H. ALBIN,

"DO EVERYTHING"

has been brought out by our beloved Chieftain at her own expense, and is placed upon the American market by the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association that it may aid white-ribboners in the "all-round movement" it advocates.

"Everything is not in the temperance reform, but the temperance reform should be in everything."

"'Organized mother love' is the best definition of the white-ribbon movement, and it can have no better motto than, 'Make a chain, for the land is full of bloody crimes and the city of violence.'"

"If we can remember this simple rule, it will do much to unravel the mystery of the much controverted 'do everything policy,' viz.: That every question of practical philanthropy or reform has its temperance aspect, and with that we are to deal."

These extracts from the preface will suggest the helpfulness of the new manual. It should be purchased by unions in quantities at the nominal price of 25c.

RED LETTER DAY.

September 22, birthday of Mary Clement Leavitt, our first Round-the-World Missionary, observed as World's W. C. T. U. thankoffering day.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Ex-Mayor Starkweather, of Superior, Wis., who was recently impeached in office, has accepted a position on a theatrical stage.

Twenty-three Italians who are charged with taking part in the Spring Valley riots, have been arrested and are now in jail at Princeton, Ill.

A dispatch from Brazil states that the body of Admiral da Gama, horribly mutilated, has been found, and was buried with military honors in Rivera.

A novel suit was begun in Bloomington, Ill., August 16, to recover five thousand dollars, the price of twelve negroes, alleged to have been sold at Geneva, Ill., in 1858.

News from Constantinople states that an attack has been made on the American missionaries' school at Tarsus, and fears are entertained for the safety of the missionaries.

Assistant Attorney-General Newell has decided that the law requiring the United States flag to be floated above all schoolhouses does not apply to parochial schools. The law was examined because of the opposition raised by the Lutherans.

Queen Victoria's speech was read before Parliament Thursday, August 1 5. The massacre of the Armenians in Turkey and of the missionaries in China received regretful mention, but no decided policy for their protection was outlined.

Rev. and Mrs. Andrew Murray, who in 1874 founded the Huguenot Seminary at Wellington, South Africa, modeled after the famous woman's seminary, Mt. Holyoke, spent last week at Moody's summer school at Northfield, Mass. This week they spoke at Moody's Bible Institute, Chicago, on their work and experiences in Africa.

MISS GORDON announces the good news that Miss Willard and she will sail from Southampton, September 21, on the steamer New York. They tried to secure an earlier passage, but the staterooms were all taken up to that time. We do not know with certainty the plans of our leader, but it is probable that she will remain in the East till after the Baltimore Convention.

FRIENDS of our National corresponding secretary, Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson, will remember that she was called last March to the bedside of her father, whose recovery at that time made the devoted daughter so happy. While at Chautauqua last Saturday, August 17, came the unexpected news of her father's death in Nova Scotia. She hastened on at once to the old New York home to prepare for his interment, her husband and daughter bringing the body to its last resting place. Our warmest sympathy goes out to Mrs. Stevenson.

THE death angel spoke suddenly to another true friend week before last, and in answer to the call William Alexander Hammer, husband of Mrs. Anna M. Hammer, president of the Pennsylvania W. C. T. U., stepped over into the country beyond death's territory. On August 10, Mr. Hammer succumbed to an attack of apoplexy, at Intervale, N. H., in the White Mountains, where he and his noble wife were resting. He was long identified with the Reformed Episcopal Theological Seminary of Philadelphia, and was a warm and active indorser of the temperance cause, working side by side with his wife in her responsible position as state president. The funeral took place on Thursday, August 15, from Newark, N. J., the former home of Mr. and Mrs. Hammer.

SINCE we have had many inquiries as to the new treasurer of the World's W. C. T. U., we gladly state that Mrs. May R. Thornly, of London, Ontario, Canada, president of that Province, was unanimously chosen treasurer of the World's union to succeed the lamented Mrs. Williams, but Mrs. Thornly has written stating that while devoted to the interests of the society she did not feel that figures were her strong point but preferred the more general work in which she is engaged (and in which we take leave to say no woman has made a better impression or wrought more successfully in the land across the border). In view of these facts the Canadian sisters recommended Mrs. Saunderson, president of the W. C. T. U. of Quebec. Our sister is the widow of a Congregational minister and has had long experience in Christian work and an exactitude of mind that specially fits her for the office

MORE evidence of the failure of restrictive liquor laws to restrict is furnished by South Carolina. The dispensary law is clearly not the "way out" of the drink problem. "Blind tigers" flourish throughout the state, and it has been demonstrated that under the present law there are more places where liquor is sold openly than under the license system. It seems not unlikely that South Carolina will witness again the riotous scenes of Tillman days, for Governor Evans declares that he has tried moral suasion long enough—a moral suasion backed by a special constabulary costing the state five thousand dollars a month, and that every town and city will be placed under metropolitan police rule unless they obey the law. He intends, not that less liquor shall be drank, but that the people shall drink state liquor. The profits to the state during the twenty-one months have been $200,000. This falls short of the amount predicted by the friends of the dispensary law, who are determined that South Carolina, as a liquor seller, shall make at least five hundred thousand dollars a year. The more liquor sold the better, provided the "blood money" goes into the state coffers!

IT is interesting to learn from such a source as the Friend of China, which is the organ of the society for the suppression of the opium trade, of the value placed upon the work of Mrs. Andrew and Dr. Kate Bushnell. The following paragraph appears in their magazine for July, and is a part of the report of the executive committee as presented to the twentieth annual meeting of the society: "First and foremost, we must mention the very successful series of twenty great demonstrations in the leading centers of the United Kingdom, besides several smaller gatherings in other places, addressed by Mrs. Andrew and Dr. Kate Bushnell. The disclosures made by these brave Christian women as to the intimate connection between opium and vice, especially as regards the Straits Settlements and China, were listened to with painful interest by great audiences, and have done much, we are persuaded, to deepen the detestation of the Christian public far a traffic which has, as one of its principal consequences, the stimulation of immorality."

MRS. HUNT'S promised Responsive Reading for September not having reached the editor of books and leaflets on time, the reading on the young woman's paper, deferred until a more convenient season, will be substituted. As a strength and upbuilder of the Young Woman's Branch, the young woman's paper is a "friend indeed," not only to the Y's, but to the parent society, contributing not a little to the success (present and future) of our organization. This reading aims to give white-riboners a stirring up all along the line on the subject of Young Women. It gives the plan and scope of the paper, and suggests how to make it "go." We hope that the Y's will make special effort to place it on the program of their meetings during the coming month, also to give it general distribution among members. For, as one of our bright young workers who knows the paper thoroughly, says: "If you want to get anywhere or be anything in Y work, read Young Women." We hope to issue the reading on scientific temperance instruction later.

PUBLIC sentiment in Georgia seems to be growing in favor of the anti-barroom bill, and it bids fair to become a law at the next session of the legislature. Temperance people, says Mrs. Sibley, as they become better acquainted with the merits of the bill, express themselves as more and more willing to support it. The measure is championed by Hon. Walter B. Hill, well known as a "stalwart" among Prohibitionists, and is "an act to abolish barrooms, to prohibit the manufacture, sale and keeping for sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, and to provide for its manufacture and sale for other purposes." As a temperance measure it is apparently far in advance of any plan yet presented short of total prohibition. Chief of its commendable features is, of course, the prohibition in it—no intoxicating liquors for beverages—next a vender of alcoholics "for other than beverage purposes," can only be appointed upon petition of a majority of the county free-holders—that is, local option on the sale for medicine and the arts; the most objectionable feature of restrictive liquor laws is eliminated—revenue to the state, and there is no money in it to the liquor-seller above a fair compensation to be fixed by the grand jury. Mrs. Sibley thus writes concerning the attitude of the W. C. T. U. to this bill: "When it was presented for indorsement at our last convention in Savannah we were not at first inclined to listen to it as it seemed to be only another compromise with the traffic; but when we remembered that the grand prohibition friends who had stood so nobly by the W. C. T. U. were at the head of the measure we consented to consider it, and after due consideration and prayer we adopted it." We hope in a later issue to give our readers further points concerning this important bill which, unlike the Gothenburg or dispensary systems, tends to prohibition rather than to regulation.

A DREAM OF HOME.

BY ADA M. MELVILLE.

I'm going to the country, John! To-morrow
I shall hear the robin sing his merry song
In his old haunt beside the fishing brook;
To-morrow I shall hear my mother's voice
At early dawn, as with some slow and sweet
Old-fashioned hymn of praise straight from her heart,
She faintly stirs the Sabbath stillness of the house,
Moving about on light, untiring feet
The morning meal in readiness to set
Ere father clatters in from field or barn.

I'm going to the country, John! Far beyond
The sound of city noise,—beyond the reach
Of hasting crowds on selfish ends intent;
I'll take the path that winds around the hill,
And walk so slowly I'll have time to note
The color of the golden-rod that waves
Its plumy stalk in the warm, drowsy breeze,
The sweet, domestic joy of nesting birds,
The rainbow-flashing of an insect's wing,—
And time to think on Him who made them all.

I wonder if He meant that man should build
House close to house in weary miles of stone,
Should shut out heaven's smile with traffic's smoke,
And smother grass blades under paving stones
That burn and bruise the children's tender feet?
I wonder if He meant that men should hide
Gray heads of shame in haunts where sun and air
Can never send their gracious healing touch,
Where mothers' hymns are all forgot and lost
In drink's debauch or laugh of flaunting vice?

* * * * * * *

I'm going to God's Country, John! To-morrow
I shall hear the angels give glory and praise
Unto the King of Kings upon His throne;
To-morrow I shall hear our Elder Brother's voice
At early dawn, bidding me haste away
Unto the marriage supper of the Lamb.
A satisfying portion that will be,—
I shall drink long and deep from the bright stream
That flows forever from the eternal hills,
The water of Life, clear crystal stream of heaven.

That is a blessed Country, John! Surely
The day must shortly come when He who laid
Its vast foundations will Himself rebuild
The homes of earth! Ah, then the sun will shine
On every hearth; the children's straying feet
Will find nor heat nor stone nor cruel thorn;
The mothers will not hide from drunkard's rage,
There shall be none in all the earth to make afraid.
The world is still God's Country, John! Some day
He'll come to claim and purify His own.

Chicago, Ill.

TRIAL AND TRIUMPH.

BY LAURA J. RITTENHOUSE.

Arthur Wetherell walked into the big, clean kitchen and put his pails upon the table, the white foam of the milk rising above the shining tin enclosing it.

He smiled at his mother as he went to the sink to wash his hands, but, in spite of the smile, she felt there was something out of sorts with him. She had missed his gay, bird-like whistle as he came from the barnyard, and as he wiped his hands upon the roller-towel, his face wore a depressed and discouraged air.

Mrs. Wetherell went on quietly with her work, deftly cutting out the delicate cream biscuits and putting them in the pan ready for baking.

"What is it, Arthur? There is something the matter," she said sympathetically.

"How do you always know, mother? You are a regular witch for reading the mind of your big boy." And he gave her plump shoulder a loving pat.

"Never mind; that is a secret known only to mothers; but there is something criss-cross, I'm sure."

"Yes, there is, mother. I am heart-sick and discouraged. Mr. Norton passed while I was milking, and he says the market is so overstocked with fruit and vegetables that there is no sale for anything. That is the trouble about such excessively abundant crops; no one makes money, and you know I had depended upon the apples to pay my way through college next year. Now I shall have to stay at home, there is nothing else to do."

Mrs. Wetherell put her pan of biscuits into the oven, washed her hands and began mixing the coffee before she spoke.

"It is too bad. I wonder if I couldn't help you by making preserves and jellies for ladies in the city?"

"And perhaps kill yourself over the hot stove this blistering weather? No ma'am, you can't. I wouldn't use money made at the risk of my dear little mother's life. But it seems to me there is always something wrong. Last year there wasn't any fruit; this year there is too much; next year there'll be blight or curculio or something, I'll warrant."

"You shouldn't talk so, Arthur. It sounds as if you were finding fault with the Almighty, and He always knows what is best," Mrs. Wetherell said reprovingly.

"Come here, Arthur, I've a plan for you," called Mr. Wetherell from the back porch.

Arthur hurried out and sat down on the steps where the morning-glories on the lattice held their dainty cups up for their first and last bath of sunlight. Aunt Catharine sat rocking and knitting industriously, and she smiled as her favorite nephew made his appearance.

"There is always a demand for good cider, Arthur. The apples can be used for that, and if we can't sell it right away it can be boiled and will be all the better for standing. It will have twice the snap to it then and bring better prices. Since we can't market our apples you may have the whole crop for cider, excepting enough for our own use. It ought to bring in enough to put you through another year," Mr. Wetherell said encouragingly.

"And you can retail cider at the fair. Every one is thirsty at such a place. Have a big chunk of ice in the barrel and your mother and I can make pies and cookies to go with it. We ought to make a lot of money that way," said Aunt Catharine, looking kindly at Arthur over her steel-framed spectacles.

Mrs. Wetherell in the kitchen paused with the pan of hot biscuits in her hands, an anxious expression on her face. Would Arthur forget the long talks they had had on the growing curse of cider drinking and consent? She knew how much it meant to him; a year lost from his precious studies, a year backward instead of forward, and her heart ached for him. There was a moment of silence, and then Arthur's answer came clear and strong, even if his voice was shaky.

"It is good of you, father—awfully good, but I can't do it. I believe it is wrong to make cider at all and I should not dare place temptation in the way of others by selling it; not even if I never complete my college course."

"You're a bigger fool than I thought you were, Arthur. Whatever put such cranky notions into your head? Look at me! I have drank cider all my life, and it has not harmed me. Can you find among all your temperance fanatics a single man with a clearer brain, a broader chest or better developed muscle?" Mr. Wetherell said angrily.

"But, father, while you have been able to curb your appetite, there are thousands of men who cannot, and who might be, and are, ruined by cider."

"I declare to the land I am out of all patience with you, Arthur. Who ever heard of any one being hurt with nice, sweet cider?" snapped Aunt Catharine.

"I have, auntie. There are the Tucker boys; there never were finer fellows than they when they first moved here, and now they are worthless sots, made so from drinking 'harmless' cider. And look at Mr. Eaton; a helpless, homeless drunkard, whose first downward steps were made when he began keeping his cellar supplied with cider. And there are many others in our neighborhood who can trace their downfall to the use of it. No, Aunt Catharine, much as I long for college, I'd rather work on the farm always and keep my soul clean, than become a physician and cause the ruin of others."

Then the breakfast bell rang, but all through that meal the argument went on. Mr. Wetherell and Aunt Catharine against Arthur and his mother.

"Very well, sir, do as you please; stay at home and be a clod-turner all your days if you choose, but I shall make the cider and sell it, anyhow, if you do not. I have no such superfine scruples as you and your mother have. I'd consider it a sin to let those fine apples rot in the orchard, and I shall not do it." Then Mr. Wetherell put on his big straw hat and stalked out of the house with severe dignity.

Mrs. Wetherell sighed. She knew how more than useless it would be to argue farther. Yet the thought of the harm that might come made her very unhappy, and her heart ached for Arthur. Aunt Catharine gave her no sympathy.

"You always were a crank, Milly, and you've trained Arthur to be just such another. If you folks don't sell cider, some one else will."

"Some one else may steal or lie or commit murder, but that does not make it right for me to do it. If you had lived here as long as I have, Catharine, you would know for yourself the danger of cider." But Aunt Catharine shook her head unbelievingly.

The next day Mr. Wetherell and his hired men began the cider-making, but Arthur was not asked to help, his father treating him with a coldness that hurt and repelled him.

Mrs. Wetherell made preserves and jelly for the fair, Aunt Catharine finished her wonderful knitted spread for it, and Mr. Wetherell competed for the premiums on cider and fine apples.

Fair week was always a gala time for the farmers around Bertram, and this year the interest was greater than usual on account of the abundant crops. The first day passed off delightfully in friendly rivalry and social intercourse. No intoxicating liquors were allowed on the grounds, but cider, being considered perfectly harmless, flowed as freely as water.

The second day Mrs. Wetherell had a severe headache and could not go, so Arthur staid at home with her while Mr. Wetherell and Aunt Catharine drove gaily away. Late in the afternoon when her headache had gone, as Mrs. Wetherell and Arthur sat on the shady front porch, suddenly a carriage came dashing swiftly down the road. It stopped at their gate and Aunt Catharine clambered out hastily and ran up the walk, her face white, her eyes tear-stained.

"Oh, Milly,—oh, Arthur, they've half killed him—John—your father! The boys got drunk on hard cider and got to fighting. John tried to stop them and they shot him and killed another poor man. No—he isn't dead—your father isn't, I mean, but he's hurt too badly to be brought home and he wants both of you. Hurry, Milly, and put on your bonnet. Poor John keeps saying you were right about the cider, and you were. Be quick, can't you?"

Mrs. Wetherell trembled so she could scarcely stand up, as Arthur tied on her bonnet.

"Don't be so frightened, mother; we will be with father in half an hour. Be brave, little mother, dear, good little mother," the boy said, caressingly, though his own face was white and his own hands shaking.

Then they went to Mr. Wetherell, while Aunt Catharine took care of the farm, and it was a month before the patient could be taken home. Weakened in body, his strong mind had been more active than usual during his enforced quiet. The cider question was settled with him forever.

"I'll never sell or drink it again as long as I live, Milly, excepting when it is made into good vinegar. I shall think of poor Johnson's grave every time I ever see any," he said, sadly, to his wife on his way home.

Aunt Catharine had everything in readiness for them. The house had never seemed so sweet and clean and quiet before, and Mr. Wetherell sank back upon his bed fairly deluged with the sense of rest and thankfulness. Aunt Catharine kissed them all warmly, though she did not often indulge in kissing.

"I had said to myself that I would never leave a cent of my money for such a crank as Arthur to use after my death, and I will not! It is better to give it to you now, my boy, while you need it most. Take this, with Aunt Catharine's love and blessing." And the look on the wrinkled face made it beautiful, as she put an envelope in Arthur's hands.

He opened it with trembling fingers. There was a draft for a thousand dollars.

"Oh! Aunt Catharine—you don't mean it; you mustn't! It would not be right to take it! you have robbed yourself," he cried, excitedly.

"Indeed, I have not. I have plenty left to last me all my life, and if I had not, I should not be afraid to depend upon the generosity of a man who places honor and love for humanity above ambition, as you have done," she said, warmly.

And thus from Arthur's trial and strong resistance came a clearer vision to some he loved, and for himself an unexpected happiness.

HUMAN LIFE AND THE DRINK TRAFFIC.

BY JOHN P. ST. JOHN.

It seems strange that in this land of school-houses, churches and general intelligence, any one should be called upon to furnish evidence to prove that the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage actually shortens human life. Especially is it so when we call to mind the fact that we are living and walking in the midst of such evidence every day of our lives. We do not have to go out on the streets and highways to look for it, it is all around us, we cannot get away from it. There is scarcely a neighborhood which has not furnished its victims, and rarely a family that cannot produce at least one witness, to prove the destructive influence of intoxicating liquors on the human system.

For nearly half a century the United Kingdom Temperance and General Provident Institution, of London, England, has divided its life insurance risks into two classes—total abstainers and moderate drinkers—and kept an accurate record of the death rate in each class. This record shows that at the age of twenty years, everything else being equal, an average of a little over forty-four years will be added to the life of a total abstainer, while only thirty-one years will be added to the life of a moderate drinker. And other authorities claim that only fifteen years will be added to the life of an habitual, or excessive drinker. The following lines illustrate these facts at a glance:

HABITUAL DRINKERS.

15 Years.

MODERATE DRINKERS.

31 Years.

TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

44 Years.

The mortality experience of this English institution from 1866 to 1893, inclusive, shows the following comparative aggregate results:

TOTAL ABSTINENCE CLASS.

Expected Claims { Policies, 5,841. Sums assured, $6,343,000.

Actual Claims { Policies, 4,131. Sums Assured, $4,317,789.

GENERAL CLASS.

Expected Claims { Policies, 8,440, Sums Assured, $8,912,298.

Actual Claims { Policies, 8,266. Sums Assured, $8,74,060.

Actual claims in Total Abstinence Class, only 70 per cent of the expected; while in the General Class they amount to 98 per cent of the expected.

In addition to the foregoing facts the directors of the institution state that the dividends in the total abstinence class are thirty-one per cent greater than the dividends in the general class. At a recent meeting of the Actuarial Society of America, Mr. Emory McClintock, actuary of the Mutual Life Insurance Company, of New York, read a very interesting paper on the "Use and Non-Use of Alcoholic Beverages," and its effect on longevity. He says:

"Upon those who on entering stated that they abstained from alcoholic beverages the maximum expected loss was $5,455,669, and the actual loss was $4,251,050. Upon those who stated otherwise the maximum expected loss was $9,829,462, and the actual loss was $9,469,407. The abstainers show, therefore, a death loss of 78 per cent of the maximum, and the non-abstainers 96 per cent."

The same authority also says:

"The non-abstainers heretofore discussed include a certain proportion of men who stated on entering that they drank 'beer only.' The total maximum expected loss upon this class was 94 per cent, against the 96 per cent first found for non-abstainers generally, and the 78 per cent found for the abstainers.

"It is widely believed that the drinking of spirits short of intoxication is less injurious than the drinking of beer, and there is nothing in these results to the contrary. It is the danger of falling into a habit of intoxication that makes spirit drinking the more formidable of the two; while undoubtedly the habit of drinking either beer, wine or spirits, beyond a certain medical limit, not well-defined, because it cannot be the same for all constitutions and is usually exceeded by those who drink at all, tends in many cases toward disease. Finally, it may be questioned very seriously whether the physicians should not fix their limit of safety for any individual at a lower point for beer, measuring by alcoholic contents, than for spirits; that is to say, whether there is not an injurious element in beer apart from the alcohol which it contains."

Mr. McClintock in closing his report says among other things:

"There is no reason to distrust the general result of this investigation. It coincides with all previous reasonable belief and expectation. . . It does not show that all of those who drink heavily must therefore necessarily die prematurely. It does show, however, that there is enough injury done to a sufficient number of individuals to make the death loss distinctly higher on the average."

Let it be borne in mind that Mr. McClintock is not a "temperance fanatic," nor is he even a total abstainer. Nor was the investigation the outgrowth of a mere matter of sentiment, but was prompted solely by a desire to obtain facts to guide the company in a successful prosecution of its business. It is a well known truth that no reliable insurance company will now take risks on the lives of saloon-keepers, gamblers, pugilists, and rarely upon those who habitually use intoxicating liquors as a beverage.

And right here let me say—and I can say it with perfect impartiality, having no longer any connection with life insurance except as a policy holder, that the leading companies in the United States are rapidly realizing the great importance of total abstinence in connection with the selection of desirable risks—and the American Union Life Insurance Company of New York, over a year ago, recognizing the injustice of compelling total abstainers to contribute to pay losses caused by those whose habits in relation to intoxicating liquors were less conducive to longevity than their own, established a total abstinence class similar to that of the United Kingdom Temperance and General Provident Institution of London, by which total abstinence policy holders are, at stated periods, rewarded for their good habits.

It is very likely that all other safe and reliable companies will, before very long, adopt plans along the same line; and it will not be at all surprising if a quarter of a century from now insurance will be issued only on the lives of total abstainers.

Finally, I think it a conservative statement to make, that all other things being equal, the total abstainer lives at least twenty-five per cent longer than the average tippler. In the face of these facts it seems to me that it is time men of heart and brain stop and think about this matter.

THE FARMERS FOOLED AND WHO FOOLED THEM.

BY T. R. CARSKADON.

[One who was fooled once.]

While the admission of this fact may be humiliating, yet believing an open confession good for the soul, I confess that for years I was misled and deceived by political leaders whom I revered and trusted. I now propose, for the benefit of my partners in distress, to inform them as to how and why I was fooled, in the hope that in the future we may all escape like humiliation and oppression.

The immortal Lincoln said: "You may fool part of the people all the time, and all the people part of the time, but you can't fool all the people all the time." Under this last head I escaped. First, then, why were the farmers fooled? I answer, for the want of that eternal vigilance which in every age is the price of liberty, for failing to apply in our political relations that profound philosophy indicated in the declaration of the matchless orator and statesman, Wendell Phillips, "There is no Canaan in politics." While we slept in fancied security because of our faith in the leaders of our great party, that when true to God and humanity (under the guidance of Him without whose blessing they labor in vain that build the house), saved the Union and freed the bondmen, these leaders soon became more concerned for their political power and selfish ends than for the welfare of those whose interests they loudly claimed to be serving. Congratulating ourselves on the grand moral and political achievements of our party during the sixties, we presumed that we could safely rest for years without continuous moral agitation of the body politic.

Very soon, however, for want of this agitation, we found to our sorrow the political atmosphere through the debauching influence of the saloon and its inevitable accompaniment, the love of money and lust for office, surcharged with the germs of political rottenness, resulting in a decade or two in our complete bondage to these ungodly influences, to which I dare assert we are to-day the most abject slaves of any equally enlightened people on the face of the earth, my position being fully corroborated by sworn and irrefutable testimony given before congressional and state investigating committees compiled by Henry Lloyd in "Wealth vs. the Commonwealth."

The New York Christian Advocate in its issue of June 6, 1889, speaking of trusts says: "To find an analogy to their high-handed action one has to go back to the rude age of the old world when powerful barons united their armed followers and swept in resistless force over the lands of their defenseless neighbors. . . What they did by force of arms these modern trusts accomplish by the force of combined capital. That it should be endured by a free people is one of the wonders of this self-contradictory age."

Rome banished those who had been found to be public enemies by forbidding every one to give them fire and water. In America this proscription is by the few to all. Coal and coal oil, the appliances for their transportation, use and application, with the matches to light the fires of the United States and Canada, are now special privileges of the few through which they plunder the many. These coal combinations (especially anthracite) keep thousands of surplus laborers on hand to underbid each other, hold them purposely ignorant of the working and closing of mines to prevent them finding employment elsewhere, and otherwise oppress them to such an extent that laborers are virtually chattels of the operators. Think of the Republican party having control of this government in 1872 permitting thirteen conspirators, in conjunction with the leading railroads, under the name of the South Improvement Company of Pennsylvania, to oppress and rob the people in the following manner—a plan which though opposed to some extent, and temporarily hindered, they finally practically and fearfully carried out:

1. The railroads were at once to double oil freight rates.
2. Were not to charge these conspirators the increase.
3. Give the conspirators the increase.
4. Make any other charges necessary to guarantee their success.
5. Destroy competition by high freight rates.
6. Spy out and report details of their competitors' business.

Thus laying broadly the foundation of the greatest monopolies that have ever cursed the human race, till now their name is legion, with the prince of devils, the saloon, leading the procession. The sugar trust follows with its ten million cost of refineries bleeding the people to pay dividends on watered stock of nearly one hundred million. Then comes the Big Four beef monopoly, declared on the floor of the United States Senate, by Senator Plumb, of Kansas, Republican, and Senator Vest, of Missouri, Democrat, to be the greatest robbery of modern times. In their wake the railroads and telegraph exacting from the people unnumbered millions beyond a fair profit on the real capital invested.

But time and space fail me to enumerate the multitude coming up out of this polluted political atmosphere by permission of law to consume the scanty profits of agriculture in these hard times of great taxes, low prices and small profits, until to-day no honest, well informed citizen will dare dispute the late declaration of a leading member of the M. E. church through the New York Christian Advocate that "we are now under a tyranny as remorseless as that of the Czar of Russia, our great barons dictating to us how much of the staples of life we may have, fixing the price on the same." While trusting and following our great political leaders the foregoing are some of the awful iniquities they permitted to be fastened upon us, thereby fooling me once as they are now deceiving millions of my fellow farmers. Do you wonder that I writhe under this tyranny, remembering how by voice and vote I supported these once honored leaders?

In conclusion let me suggest to our beloved sisters, upon whom in the ceaseless drudgery of the average farm home comes the worst effects of this financial oppression, that they remind their husbands of their priceless privilege of voting down and out of power the men and the parties that have permitted and consented to their degradation and hardships. The New York Tribune having most truly declared that the saloon "lies at the center of all social and political mischief," just the mischief I have been writing about, and Secretary of the Treasury Windom having enunciated the great and incontrovertible truth that "the destruction of the liquor traffic stands next on the calendar of the world's progress," we shall all continue to be fooled until with faith in God seeking first His kingdom we make the prohibition of the legalized sin of drunkard-making the issue of the Prohibition party, assured of the fact that with the brighter light emanating from the moral quickening engendered through this mighty struggle for God and humanity we shall see more clearly and adjust more wisely the other great issues now clamoring for public consideration.

HAVE ME EXCUSED.

BY EVA JONES.

What a remarkable number and variety of reasons there are which Christian people give for not entering actively into temperance work, for refusing to join and push forward the work of the W. C. T. U. and other temperance societies, and to stand by the prohibition fight wherever the fight is on. Here are a few that I recall, only a sample of many more that we, as the active workers, are constantly meeting.

1. "Yes, the saloon evil is a dreadful thing, but I really don't see how we can help it. So many efforts are being made, and all seem to be of no avail."

That is sitting down to nurse despair. It might do for an agnostic or a pessimist, but not for one who fights the good fight of faith and believes in the Captain of our salvation, who bids us "go forward" against the evils in high places. To doubt is disloyalty while God is God.

2. "I think we are doing very well as we are. The business is restricted and kept off our best residence streets, and is closely watched. That is much better than to have the evil everywhere unrestrained."

It is like having a filthy, disease-breeding sink of foulness kept covered and concealed down cellar or in some other unobserved place where it will be as little smelled and noticed as is possible, and letting it fester undisturbed, and, as much as we can, unthought of. What we need to do is to think, to realize, to feel and be everlastingly conscious that this dangerous, deadly evil is with us, and to work away rapidly and earnestly to remove it before it has brought death and sorrow to some of us. Better plant the saloons out in the sunlight of the best influences, bring them close to all our senses, and see if we want such nuisances anywhere just out of sight to poison the town.

3. "I believe in the license system, because I take a practical and business-like view of it."

We bow our heads with shame that Christian men, church members, can be found giving this answer. I fancy that this is just the wisdom that actuated Mr. J. Iscariot once upon a sad time. He thought, no doubt, that the apprehension of the Master by the Jews was bound to occur pretty soon anyway. It was in the nature of things, and it would be the practical business view to make what he could out of the inevitable. The overruling, all-powerful Master could and would be sure to look out for himself and His followers, and he could make a little money for the treasury, which was often sadly empty. Judas had a regulated and restricted way of managing. And licensing the saloons for more or less silver is the same thing over again.

4. "If I had boys, I might be more interested, I suppose."

That is like standing and looking on while a neighbor's house is burning and saying, "If it were my house I might be interested, I suppose." Oh, for a baptism of the Christly love that would make us care for the ruin, body and soul, of other people's boys.

5. "I cannot afford to openly fight the saloons for it would injure my business."

That is, some Christians think that the Lord will not take care of them if they do right. Not only forgetting His promise, "All these things shall be added unto you," but also His warning, "He that saveth his life shall lose it, and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." Dare a Christian make this excuse on his knees to God?

6. "If the W. C. T. U. were more popular I would work with it."

That is the unspoken excuse of a large class and once in a while one of these unheroic souls is honest enough to say so. The W. C. T. U. would not be much like the Master if it were very popular, and has never deserved the "woe" that "all men speak well of it."

7. "I don't admire many of the leaders of the movement."

And they are not leaders because they want to be admired. Ministers do not stand up in their pulpits and ask you to come and join their churches because you admire them. Leaders want help to do the work that needs to be done, and they want you to look at the work and come and help do it.

8. "I take care of my boys. If others did the same there would be no need of temperance work."

Good for all the boys taken care of. But not every boy taken care of is safe; and don't you care anyway about the boys—yes, and girls, too—of parents weak, wicked, ignorant, careless or indifferent enough to not take care of their boys? How selfish is it best to be? Would it not be good to help make the world as nice as "our boys" are?

9. "I am temperance, but I do not belong to this or that society because I cannot see that they are doing anything."

That may be due to your defective eyesight. But every W. C. T. U. feels keenly how little they are doing compared with what there is to do. The outsider's best way is to increase the sum total done by the addition of all that one member more is able to accomplish, even if that seems to be very little.

10. "Convert men and they won't want to drink. That is my way of doing temperance work."

And that is all right, too. But the Master not only preached repentance, but cast out devils, drove out the money-changers, cleansed the bodies of men. There is so much whisky in some men that there is need to get some of it out before you can get much religion in. And since it is an unquestioned fact that the saloons are doing more to ruin souls than the churches are doing to-day to save them, would it not be a good thing to stop the liquor traffic, and make less work for the churches to do? Or is it best to have as wicked a world as possible all the time for the religion of the Master to be preached to?

11. A pastor once said to me, "I cannot oppose the saloons actively, for if I did I could no longer enter them freely in evangelistic work as I am now accustomed to do to invite young men to the Saviour."

He liked to do evangelistic work better than he liked to make it easy for young men to do right; to snatch a few from the burning rather than to put out the conflagration.

12. "I am so undecided as to what are the best methods for this reform, I am studying the subject."

And meantime every year the thousands are perishing. All the rummies desire is that we maintain a splendid inactivity. They don't care for our opinions or our quiescent studying, if that is all.

13. "I believe in temperance, of course, but the church is all I have time for."

That is the saddest excuse of all. The saddest thing we mortals can do is to crucify the Master in the name of the Master. It is as if we said, "I am too busy praying to obey. I'm too much engaged in worship to help the needs of my suffering fellow man who perishes beside me."

14. "I would be glad to have something done to stop this saloon iniquity, but I am too busily occupied with my business to give it any time."

And that is all that the devil asks of the best of us—just to attend to our own private affairs, and he will attend to the iniquities of the world—that is his business. That is all the liquor traffic asks of us. And until we have time that we will spare from our business to attend to this work, things will be as they are, and worse.

WILLARD HALL NOONTIDE LINKS

"There shall be showers of blessings,
Oh, that to-day they might fall."

If there is one song more than another that we sing at Willard Hall it is the above, and some of us see signs, and dream dreams, and know beyond a doubt that God is making ready to come to the Temple with power.

. . . . . .

Mr. Sunday, a noted evangelist, once widely known as the champion baseball player, was with us for two days, and his talks are simply charming.

Rare pathos mixed with great simplicity and careful study of the Word, make him one of the most fascinating preachers I ever heard. And now we are rejoicing in the prospect of a ten days' help by Evangelist Murphy, a man who has been marvelously blessed in service for God.

. . . . . .

She is not handsome; some would call her positively plain. She certainly weighs two hundred and fifty pounds, and has a voice like a trumpet, but when she speaks every one is all attention. She said:

"I live on Hallelujah avenue; religion is no play-spell with me; for forty years I've been traveling this road, and it's better and better every day. Twenty-five years ago I went to the altar on crutches, and left them there. Don't you think I ought to love God? Hallelujah!"

. . . . . .

The amens were sounding from all over the hall, and as I passed out I heard her saying to the people who gathered about her, "The Lord sent me to the city and told me to help the poor unfortunates, so I take them in and scrub them up and stay by them until they are saved. Hallelujah!"

. . . . . .

The face grew radiant under the old-fashioned hat; it fairly beamed, and we all felt like moving down to Hallelujah avenue at once.

. . . . . .

"Even as ye did it unto the least of these, ye did it unto me."

TWO IMPORTANT TEMPERANCE LAWS.

NICHOLSON BILL.

Dear Union Signal:—For twenty years the state of Indiana has been under the rule of a liquor law that has allowed liquor dealers to violate its special prohibitory features with impunity, and the best moral elements of the population have been almost helpless before the arrogant encroachments of the liquor power. But the faithful work of the temperance people to rouse a public sentiment against the evil at last brought about a revolution in this respect.

A young Quaker preacher was elected to the legislature last year who threw a bomb shell into the enemy's camp by introducing a bill into the house for "the better regulation of the liquor traffic." It was not a full prohibitory law, although one section of it can be made so by the sentiment of the people. Its chief claim was, that it would enable the people to enforce the liquor law against its violators. The old liquor law was framed twenty years ago by saloon men in a saloon in this city and it was arranged with the full intent of having it violated with impunity. The amended law, called the Nicholson Law, that being the name of the Quaker who framed and fathered it, differed from the old law, in that it threw the necessity of proof of violations of the law upon the liquor dealers themselves instead of upon those who brought suit against them.

For instance, under the old law it was not enough for a man or woman to testify that they had seen liquor sold in a saloon to minors or during the prohibited hours, but they must swear not only that it looked like liquor, and smelt like liquor, but that they had drank some of it, and it tasted like liquor and was liquor; otherwise, testimony might be accepted that it was buttermilk or any other harmless drink. Again, there were three points in the law on which proof must rest in order to secure a conviction. The law said there must be either a salo, barter, or gift of liquor. So, if a dealer was prosecuted for having made a sale of liquor illegally, witnesses were brought forward who proved conclusively that it was a gift of liquor and the case was dismissed. So the liquor men have had things their own way, because the law seemed only a mass of loopholes and the better class of citizens were worn out and disgusted with efforts to punish its violators.

When the Nicholson bill was introduced into the legislature there was a good deal of apathy in regard to its passage on the part of the members, and some strong opposition, but the temperance people of the state were immediately aroused to the importance of the measure and bestirred themselves to gain the victory it promised.

Prohibitionists, anti-saloon Republicans and temperance Democrats with the churches and all sorts of temperance societies at once began circulating petitions and sending them into the legislature asking for the passage of the bill. Eighty thousand names of voters were signed to these petitions. Such an agitation has never been seen in our state as was soon aroused upon this question. Mass-meetings were held in every town and village where the bill was read and discussed, and audiences expressed their sentiments by vote. Ministers preached upon it on Sundays and circulated the petitions at the close of the services. Delegations came up to work for it at the capitol, and the press very largely advocated its passage, while the women of the W. C. T. Unions quietly and persistently carried the petitions from house to house and shop to shop to secure the signatures of voters.

Every stratagem possible was used to defeat it by those who feared the power of the liquor league. There was an effort to smother it in the committee room. It was delayed upon its passage by all the tricks known to politicians, but public sentiment finally reached the point where the legislators dared not ignore it, and under its pressure men felt impelled to do their duty.

After the bill had passed both houses, which passage was delayed until the last moment in the hope on the part of its enemies that it would not reach the governor in time for his signature, it went to Governor Matthews who was elected by the Democrats, and who has made such a fine record as an enforcer of the law against gambling.

The bill was held by him over Sunday and the liquor dealers besieged the governor's mansion all day with threats of political extinction and offers of political advancement. But even if the governor had been disposed to yield to their bribes or threats, the bill had a strong friend in the governor's wife, who is not only a temperance woman, but a strong advocate of woman suffrage, and the liquor men not only were met with a cold reception by this lady, but they found her constantly at hand to defeat their applications.

So the famous Nicholson bill became a law. Its chief features are:

1. That all persons who apply for license under the existing liquor law of Indiana shall specifically describe the room in which such liquors are to be sold, and the exact location of the same. (This is different from the old law which simply required the location of the lot where the building stood, and liquor could be sold up stairs or down cellar.) The person selling shall be a male of good moral character, and he is not deemed of good moral character if he is found guilty of violating the law twice. (This cuts off women from securing a liquor license, and ought to cut off all males according to a high idea of morality.)

2. No one selling liquors in quantities less than a quart can have any other business carried on in the same room. (This is to keep a man from having a grocery or restaurant in connection with his saloon.)

3. On such days and hours as the sale of liquors is prohibited the room where they are sold must be locked, and no one but the proprietor and his family are allowed to enter, and if any other person is seen to enter it is prima facie evidence that liquors are sold, and the law thus violated.

4. All rooms where liquors are retailed and drunk on the premises shall be in the basement or on the ground floor, and no screens are allowed during times of prohibited sales of liquors, for the violation of this a heavy penalty and fine is attached for the first offense; for the second offense any criminal or police court may revoke the license of the offender, and for the third offense the court shall revoke his license.

5. Any saloon-keeper will be fined and punished with imprisonment if he permits any person under twenty-one years of age to loiter around his saloon.

6. Any dealer selling liquors, spirituous, vinous, malt, or otherwise, to minors, either to be drunk by them or others, shall be fined and imprisoned. (This is to do away with parents and others sending children to saloons for the family beer.)

7. Town and city marshals, policemen, sheriffs and constables residing in township, town or city in which saloons are located shall enforce the law.

8. Only one license will be issued to any one person, and that person must carry on the business himself. (This is to stop brewers and distillers from running any number of saloons.)

Section 9 is really the popular one, and is the one for which the temperance people worked when they urged the passage of the bill, and it declares that if, three days before any regular session of the board of commissioners of any county, a remonstrance in writing, signed by a majority of the legal voters of any township or ward in any city in said county, shall be filed with the auditor of the county, against the granting of a license to any applicant, etc., it shall be unlawful for such board of commissioners to grant such applicant a license during a period of two years from filing of such remonstrance, and if any such license is granted, it shall be null and void the same as if he had none. (This is the local option feature of which many of our towns are already moving to avail themselves in order to get rid of the saloons.)

One good result of the law is that it abolishes the wine-rooms in connection with the saloons, which have been such a source of degradation to young girls and against which the local council of women of this city have been making a fight for two or three years. The section about drug stores makes it unlawful for any such to sell liquors in any quantity except upon the written prescription of a respectable practicing physician. For the first offense there is a fine, and for the second both fine and imprisonment of six months.

MOORE BILL.

In the rush of public sentiment over the Nicholson bill, another bill called the Moore bill was passed, which is even more stringent in its application to the liquor traffic in cities, as it gives the power to city governments to pass special ordinances by which saloons may not only be moved from any part of the city to another, but canb e moved away entirely; and the abolition of all attachments of music and all kinds of appliances for games under this law, as well as under the Nicholson law, deprive the saloon of all its allurements, so that it stands unadorned before the public as a place where nothing is done but the selling of intoxicating liquors, so that no one can claim they enter to play billiards or other games.

The great question now is, "Will the law stand?" The city of Terre Haute has openly ignored it, and the judge of that circuit has decided that the penalty in connection with it could not be exacted, so the liquor men feel justified in that place in defying the law until the supreme court of the state shall pass upon its constitutionality. The saloon-keepers of Indianapolis have observed the law because the police power has compelled them to do so. The effect of the law has been felt to such an extent in the enforcement of the Sunday observance clause that many saloon men did not seek to renew their licenses in June, as they claimed if they could not sell at illegal times their profits were gone.

In an interview with Mr. S. E. Nicholson, the author of the law, I found that he is quite sanguine in his expectations that the Supreme Court will declare for the law, but feels sure that the big fight will come in the next legislature in an effort to have the law repealed as was the Baxter law some years ago.

While this is only an amended license law the agitation it has caused is most hopeful for those who believe in the abolition of the saloon. It shows the real animus of the liquor traffic, and will convince conservative people as nothing else would have done, that any licensing of it makes it a law-defying element, and the only way to destroy its power will be to declare it shall not exist at all under any circumstances. The regular organization of the liquor men to defy the law has opened the eyes of the people to the enormity of the crime of allowing such a power to exist, and the good Citizenship Leagues are developing a sentiment for the putting down of the evil as well as for the enforcement of law.

Poor old Hoosierdom is waking up and temperance is a theme upon every program, no matter what kind of meeting is held. The audiences are larger than ever before, and people listen eagerly, and where the truth was received in silence a few years ago now the most radical statements are applauded and there is an ominous shaking of heads when the defiance of the law is mentioned that bodes ill for the traffic. Who knows but out of all this may spring a splendid sentiment for the utter overthrow of the liquor power, and the people in Indiana, where the liquor league has been more strongly entrenched than in any other state, shall rise up triumphant over its arrogant domination.

JOSEPHINE RALSTON NICHOLS.

HARVEY'S DANGER.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Many interesting stories have appeared from time to time in THE UNION SIGNAL accentuating some deep temperance truth, but the thought comes to me that no story of make-believe events had in it more of the elements of an astonishing work of fiction than the last few weeks have afforded for the true narrative of the struggle against the saloon in Harvey, Ill. Were there not so much of tragedy in the situation it might be designated the comedy of errors, for at every turn up to date the temperance people have been outwitted by the other side, which is making such a desperate effort to kill Prohibition. It is believed that Harvey's license men are backed by the "trade." The fight that is on is not for ourselves alone but for the principle on which the town was founded. Our failure means a backward step all along the line. This thought nerves us to greater effort.

A license ordinance has been passed by our city council. Buildings are being fitted up for saloons. Residents and non-residents are getting ready to have the honor (?) of running the first legalized saloons in Prohibition Harvey.

The ordinance was passed under a suspension of rules to pass an appropriation ordinance, and was railroaded through regardless of the protest of the four temperance aldermen, one of whom refused to vote. He expected to avoid a tie vote by so doing, but the mayor, a la Czar Reed, ordered his vote counted, declared a tie and gave the deciding vote. The chagrin of the no-license people may be imagined. They expected one of their men to be always absent when this ordinance was to come up, which it could not do regularly without being laid over from one meeting to the next. One man's absence would have made it impossible to get the two-thirds vote necessary to pass an ordinance when there was no tie.

The question now under consideration is how to prevent the issuance of licenses. At the last meeting the four temperance aldermen absented themselves, and will continue so to do as long as this plan can be followed to prevent a quorum. In the meantime, money has been raised and fine legal talent secured to begin injunction proceedings. The other side also has good legal advice, and the outcome of these plans cannot be predicted at this writing.

Two temperance candidates for mayor and a gerrymander of the wards when the village was changed to city government in the spring will explain to our readers how a whisky mayor and four whisky aldermen were elected in Prohibition Harvey, where at least two-thirds are for no-license. Temperance people here and everywhere ought soon to learn that we must "hang together or hang separately," as we are now doing.

The contest here had been made much of by the papers of Chicago which had been numerously represented by reporters of all sizes, ages, previous condition, etc. The result of their sleuths for sensation breeding news has reminded us forcibly of a definition once given in THE UNION SIGNAL: "Modern journalism is the collection, corruption and distribution of misinformation."

As may be supposed the women have a hand in affairs. The flourishing W. C. T. U. and other good women have formed themselves into a Home Protection League. They have the spirit which would carry through to a finish the hatchet plan, if that were considered a wise thing to do. Other measures which do not contemplate lawlessness, are being considered at the secret meetings, some of which are held at the dead of night. Each woman is pledged to secrecy, or we would tell THE UNION SIGNAL readers some of their plans. Any saloon man will be a hardened sinner who will run a saloon here.

The prohibitory clause in every deed of property sold by the Land Association, stands in the way of the saloon business. A test case will be made of those starting saloons, and it will be carried to the supreme court, so the Land Association people assured a committee of ladies who were appointed to wait on them. T. W. Harvey, the founder of our city, is no longer president, and it has been reported that Granger Farwell, the new president, and many of the stockholders are high license men, who are determined not to know the prohibition Joseph. The end is not yet.

DEAR SISTERS:—I have seen lately a number of our comrades who hail from the rural districts, and in their faces, browned by sun and wind, their hands bearing the honor-marks of God's best gift to man, work, I read lessons of indomitable courage, the courage which is fighting against "all odds" to beat back the liquor fiend which is never satisfied with anything short of the most priceless treasures of the home.

As I ride day after day on the crowded street cars up and down one of the principal retail streets of Chicago, and note saloon next to saloon in shameless activity of "business," my thoughts revert to the boys who are marching in from country homes to lay brain and brawn, manliness and morals upon the smoking altar of the liquor traffic.

---

It seems sometimes to us who live in the cities where beer is said to be more easily obtained than bread, as if the conflict were a vain one, but again when I think of the pure homes beyond the crowded metropolis, where children fast growing to young manhood and womanhood are training to stand dauntlessly for "God and Home and Native Land," I see the army that shall turn the tide of conflict in right's favor. As the river befouled by its journeyings needs the fresh current from the hillsides to freshen and revivify, so our city populations need the touch of strength and sweetness that can alone come from lives that have in rural homes grown thus strong and sweet by contact with nature and nature's God.

---

The city mother has no easy task on her hands to train her children to avoid the "wiles of the devil" when the eager little feet must walk past these wiles many times a day, the quick ears hear every deceitful echo of the voice of the wicked one, and the keen eyes become early familiar with his cunningly paraded allurements to sin. The fact that there are "object lessons" right and left to illustrate her earnest teachings does not always save the boy. Again and again I have heard mothers say, "I wish I could take my children away from the city until they are grown."

But the arms of the saloon octopus are long, and far beyond city limits into rural towns the fatal grasp reaches for its victims, and even in the lone farmhouse, separated by stretches of quiet miles from business centers, may lurk a danger little suspected by the inmates.

However, if there be a choice of localities where children may be reared and made ready for that day when they must leave the home for independent action in life's arena, it must be in a locality where nature's wholesome influences have sway and where the suggestions of vice are at low par.

Here the W. C. T. U. can do good work. Amid the abundance of grain and fruit how may not the story of their perversion into poison be driven home? In the "little red schoolhouse," where the number of subjects taught has not reached the bewildering multiplicity of city school programs, what time may not the teacher find for scientific temperance instruction, with the warnings she may point out from what is heard of the havoc wrought by the liquor traffic in neighboring towns? How great the opportunity to sow good seed through the printed temperance word, since books are often none too numerous, and the long winter evenings, devoid of city diversions, afford hours for thoughtful reading. What lessons of patriotism can be taught, and what patriotic fire awakened in the souls of boys and girls whose parents own even a few acres of ground, and who live continually under the mighty influence of broad fields, everlasting hills, great rivers and bending skies.

What are not the opportunities for the white ribbon parlor meetings, where neighborliness is one of the cardinal virtues, and hospitality something to be emulated from home to home? Here is the headquarters of the flower mission work, where blossoms fall unheeded; here what lessons of kindness to animals can be inculcated; here homeless waifs from city slums may find temporary or permanent shelter, where even the big, clean barns are better than city basements.

The local unions of country and city should be in close touch. They need each other. Who so quickly aroused by the story of starving men and women as the friends in the country who rarely count the cost of a loaf of bread or a pail of milk? And whose voice can utter a more potent warning to the young people of the rural districts against the saloon and its kith and kin than the white ribbon worker who lives in daily sight and sound of the enemy of our country's peace and purity?

---

"Blest be the tie that binds" the white ribbon army into a host having one common purpose! May the day hasten on when city streets shall be as safe as shepherd's hillsides.

Mother Experience.

Our Temple fund is being increased at a very encouraging rate—over ten thousand dollars has been received—from the Wheels, and unions and individuals seem to have taken up the work with fresh vigor. All this means a little less pressure on the heavy cable Mrs. Carse told you about a few weeks ago.

Pembina W. C. T. U., North Dakota, sends $10 on the county's pledge for $100. Ten dollars is sent from two members of the Galway, N. Y., W. C. T. U., with a request that it be credited to the union and not as a personal gift. The Loyal Temperance Legion of Atlantic, Pa., send $1. The Pioneer union at Harvey, Ill., is raising $100, and although the amounts are coming in in small installments it will all be counted on the pledge. Mt. Carmel, Pa., W. C. T. U. sends $25.68 on its pledge, Frances E. Willard union, of Philadelphia, $15, and McLane, Pa., union sends $16.10 to be credited on the Erie county pledge. Mrs. Frances J. Sumner sends $15.50 from the Willard union of Toledo, O., to apply on a hundred dollar pledge. Mrs. N. B. Hunt sends $19.50 to be credited to the Sudbury, Mass., W. C. T. U. She writes that she received over ten dollars through the Temple Wheels and the union voted to make the amount $19.50. This makes $50 credited to Sudbury union, as they sent $30.50 some time ago. Mrs. H. M. H. Taylor, of Taunton, Mass., is trying to fill one hundred Wheels. She has already filled fifty-seven, and we are sure she will have no trouble in filling the remainder. By typographical error $40 were credited to Mrs. H. M. H. Wheeler instead of Taylor.

For a long time Mrs. M. A. Davis, of Delaware, Ohio, has been trying to put together a silk afghan to be presented to Mrs. Carse. Her idea is to get pieces of silk five inches square or of velvet three inches square, and for one dollar will have the name of the donor painted on or for fifty cents will have it embroidered on. The money is coming to the Temple. She has already sent some raised in this way. Write to Mrs. M. A. Davis, 206 West William St., Delaware, Ohio, and she will give you full particulars.

The $100 received to place the name of Almira E. Hurd, of Rockford, Ill., on a tablet was her personal gift to the Temple and not the gift of her daughter as we stated a few weeks ago. Mrs. S. Marion Goss, of Melbourne, Washington, sends $5, the result of a Demorest contest which she gave in the little frontier town where she lives. She has also sent for some wheels and will try and get the souvenir spoon. The Pixie premium is exhausted and it will be impossible for us to get more. The Educational Checkers are almost gone and we shall not be able to renew this offer. Please bear this in mind in sending for premiums.

The unions are raising money very successfully by the Wheels. The Central union, of Kansas City, Mo., sends thirteen filled Wheels. This makes thirty Wheels they have filled and they hope to fill one hundred. Mrs. Clara S. Harza, state superintendent of Temple work for South Dakota, is using the Wheels in raising money for tablets, and finds it a very successful way. L. B. Kelly, of Concord, N. H., sends a filled Wheel and five dollars from two members of the Concord union. She writes that this is $2.50 each from two members of the union who live so far away they cannot often attend the meetings, but they are in hearty sympathy with the temperance cause and all its interests.

The coupons continue to come in. Miss Mary Dickinson, of Romeo, Mich., sends one for $15. A friend in Fall River, Mass., who does not wish her name published, sends $30, a little extra money which came to her which she sends in lieu of coupons. Mrs. A. O. Howell, who has filled one Wheel, writes for another. She writes that she believes God helped her to fill the first one and as long as He gives her strength she will go on filling them.

Lessie Sturges, of Meadville, Mo., writes that she wanted to fill her Wheel, and not knowing of any other way, she sold ice cream; a little friend helped her, and one evening they cleared seventy-five cents. Lessie is eleven years old. Mrs. O. E. Whitsell, of Horace, Ill., sent for a Wheel, and by mistake we sent her two, but she writes that she is glad we misunderstood her order, for her children had no difficulty in filling the Wheels, and she has ordered another. The first person her little girl presented the Wheel to was a drunkard, and giving her the dime, he said he wished "not a drop of liquor was made, then it would not tempt the weak."

We find a good many Wheels are being lost in the mails, stolen without doubt. To guard against this we will have to ask our friends who send us but a single Wheel at a time to take the money out of it first and purchase a postal order and send by letter. The Wheel can be sent (as we desire the names on it) for one cent by post if it is not sealed, just tie the string about it. When several are sent at a time it is best to send them by express—as a great many now are doing.

All orders for Temple Wheels, mite-boxes, and Baby Band lists, and everything pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, The Temple, Chicago. Send two-cent stamp for either the Temple Wheel or mite-box. Money orders and checks should be made out in the name of Mr. G. B. Shaw, treasurer, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, Room 1111, The Temple, Chicago.

FOR LOVE'S SAKE.

BY E. L. G.

Sometimes I am tempted to murmur
That my life is flitting away,
With only a round of trifles
Filling each busy day.
Dusting the nooks and corners,
Making the house look fair,
And patiently taking upon me
The burden of woman's care.

Comforting childish sorrow,
Or charming the childish heart,
With a simple song or a story
Told with a mother's art,
Setting the dear home table,
Clearing the meal away,
And going on little errands
In the twilight of the day.

So when I am ready to murmur
That my life is flitting away,
With only a round of duties
Filling each busy day,
It comes to my spirit sweetly
(With the grace of a thought divine,
You are living your life for love's sake
And the loving should never repine.

Living my life for love's sake?
Then the homely cares grow sweet,
And the self-denial is sacred
If laid at the Master's feet.

AZALEA.

In Three Chapters.

BY FANNIE B. DAMON

CHAPTER I.

Miss Hepwie reined up her sorrel, Sarah Jane, and alighted from her carriage over against the village drug store. Between the store and the street grew a large elm, from which swung the sign, quite after the style that held sway in the days of inns and stage-coaches, with an iron ring in the trunk below, inviting beasts of burden to tarry in the shade of its wide-spreading branches.

"Jamaica ginger, cloves and flaxseed meal," said the druggist, laying out three small packages on the counter. "Old lady out o' peppermints?"

"You might put up a dime's worth, seeing you mention it," said Miss Hepwie, "and another of cassia buds. Then I'll look at some shears. Well, I declare! What child is that, anyway?"

"Oh, that's one of Bree's—Jack Bree's. There's a baker's dozen of 'm, all of a size, 'n' all of a cut. See here, sis—"

"My name's Azalea," spoke up the child, as she edged her way along the counter.

"Want to know, my fine lady!" said the druggist, rubbing his bald head and laughing, as if it were a great joke for her to have a name. "I really want to know if it is! Come, now, I'll make you a present of a nice little comb if you'll promise to keep the kinks out of your hair from now t'll Christmas. Will yer do it, sis?"

"It's out of all reason to ask it," said Miss Hepwie. "The child wouldn't live to grow up. Can't you get your mother to cut it off, Azalea?"

Azalea smiled brightly, and shook her tousled head.

"It's a pity," said Miss Hepwie. "What's the price of this pair, Mr. Dakin?"

Suddenly the child darted in between Miss Hepwie and the counter, and snatching up a pair of glistening shears, snipped away at her straggling locks with the whacking clips of a sheep shearer.

"Give them shears to me!" roared the druggist. "Don't you know better than that? You'll spile 'm, you meddlesome little minx!"

The girl flung the shears recklessly on the counter, and with her hair clipped high in the back and raggedly long at the sides, skipped out of the store.

Miss Hepwie laughed, and Azalea hearing her laughed too, as she fed her tow-colored locks to the sorrel mare in the shade of the great elm.

"I can say," she philosophized, "that somebody's old red hoss nipped off my hair. She has ben eatin' my hair jest as if she liked it. So 'twouldn't be a lie to say she did eat it. That is, not much of a lie."

She decided not to go home that night till her father should have eaten his supper and gone to bed or gone out. She didn't like to meet him at the supper table. She was afraid of him. He would scoff at her appearance and scold her severely, and if—as often happened—he should call into Tucker's and get a drink or two on his way home, he might hurl a plate at her fantastically cropped head. But if she could manage to keep out of the way till morning, he would see her with sober eyes, and father sober was very different from father drunk.

Neither did she care to meet any of the village children. She never liked to be jeered very well. She wasn't sorry she had done it but she knew she had done it awkwardly. It felt good; it felt delightful, but she understood perfectly that her jagged locks were in desperate need of a trimmer.

So, for this reason and that, she crept down by the river bank and came up across the field to the rear of the little brown church where she played contentedly enough in the clover till about supper time. The day dragged a little after that until people began to come to church, for it chanced to be meeting night. The windows were open on both sides and she not only could hear the singing, but joined lustily in when they sang familiar hymns like:

"Ou t-on a n-otion all boundless we ride," or,

"Ile away, ile away to the promised land."

When the singing became infrequent and the prayers long, she grew drowsy, especially after the stars stole softly out above the still elms, and the great red moon rode into full view where the sky was the color of a robin's egg. A little startled to find herself getting sleepy out of her own bed, she ran around by the side of the church under the high windows and mounted the steps in the slant light of the open door. With interest she saw the old sorrel nag hitched to a post close by and evidently as sleepy as Azalea herself. The concord wagon, with the covered top turned back, invited the child's attention, and, moved by the impulse that incites a cat to crawl into a stove oven, or walk over the best bed pillows, she climbed gayly up into the wide open back. She laughed softly to herself at her snugness and, slipping her small legs under the seat, dropped her cropped head upon her arm and went to sleep.

HOUSEHOLD REMEDIES.

BY W. XAVIER SUDDUTH, M. D.

The habit of "dosing" has a very strong hold upon the American public. We run to the medicine chest, the drug store or the family doctor for every little ail.

The patent medicine man also doth "abound in the land," and his "cure all" advertisements adorn our most conspicuous landscapes, cover the walls and roofs of farm houses and line the highways to village and city.

All drug stores, many drygoods stores, and even groceries keep proprietary medicines for sale, and dispose of them without let or hindrance. The ease with which poisonous drugs can be obtained accounts for much of the drug habit prevalent at the present day. Attempts have been made to control their sale by legislative enactment, but these restrictive measures have been made almost wholly inoperative by reason of lack of restriction on the sale of proprietary medicines, many of which contain drugs which are proscribed by law except upon a physician's prescription.

The use of patent nostrums is becoming a serious menace to the public health. Much of the chronic functional derangement observable in our day can be traced to them. An attempt was made in the Minnesota legislature last winter to pass a law requiring the manufacturers of proprietary medicines to print their formulæ on the labels. It met with bitter opposition from retail and wholesale druggists and the agents of the patent medicine men, and was finally killed by the outcry of a subsidized press, whose interest lay in maintaining the unlimited sale of these articles from which they derive an immense income by advertising.

Space will not permit of an exhaustive consideration of household remedies. The analgesics and hypnotics that are sold in such quantities are worse than harmful in their effects; they are positively injurious, as they lead to the formation of the drug habit. They do not cure disease, simply temporize with it and put off the final day of reckoning which must come sooner or later. It is the old story of "robbing Peter to pay Paul" since they only borrow of the strength of to-morrow for the use of to-day, and load up the system with cumulative poisons that must eventually be eliminated.

When will we come to realize that pain is beneficent, is, in fact, nature's barometer to indicate overstrain and call a halt on the expenditure of nerve force? Nearly all the drugs in use for the relief of the aches and pains of humanity are virulent poisons and operate by deadening the action of the sensory nerves so as to prevent perceptivity; they do not eradicate disease but weaken the system so that it is finally overcome by the invading enemy.

The great quantity of soporific drugs daily consumed in this country has a terrible significance to those who are conversant with the facts. Few persons jump into the drug habit at once but are gradually led into it by the use of sleeping potions, headache powders and catarrh cures. The ease with which these drugs may be obtained, the false promises they hold out for the relief of pain, coupled with the lack of knowledge extant regarding their poisonous action on the system, makes the danger in their use imminent. The laity are only familiar with the laudatory advertisements of these proprietary medicines. Indeed, so skillfully has the fact been covered up that few persons, other than physicians and druggists, are aware of the true nature of these drugs.

Bad as is the habit of the self administration of drugs, tenfold worse is the dosing of infants and children with soothing syrups, sleeping potions, cough syrups and the like that contain opiates and other narcotics. The seeds of narcotism are thus many times thoughtlessly sown in infancy by mother or nurse. That this is done through ignorance of the true character of the remedy used and the danger incurred goes without saying. Few mothers would be so heartless as willfully to endanger the welfare of their offspring by administering known narcotics. It behooves the motherhood of the land to study this question if they would avoid the danger.

In the first place, most of the ails of childhood are due to errors in diet or from lack of proper sanitary regulations in sleeping apartments. There is no reason why a properly housed and correctly fed child should have any aches or pains. Its life should be one endless round of joy; its days spent in such a manner as to conduce to good digestion and provoke refreshing sleep through natural fatigue. The nursery should be conducted upon strict hygienic principles, and in its methods should follow nature as closely as possible.

The diet should be carefully attended to. Here is where so many fail; the appearance of the first pair of "toofies" is the signal for the giving of solid food, in small quantities, it may be "only a taste," but no solid food should be given a child under two years of age. In this we should follow nature, also,—she surely knows when the system is ready for solid food. If it were right for the child to have it earlier nature would have caused the eruption of the molar teeth to occur sooner. As it is, the mascatory apparatus is only imperfectly developed at the end of the second year, and not completed in any degree of perfection until the sixth year. Milk, grains and fruits should constitute the diet of a child up to the sixth year, and under no consideration should we tempt the little one by permitting it a seat at the family table until it is at least five years of age. But, you say, it is not always possible to carry out such rules, much as we recognize the advantage to be gained by so doing. What are we to do with a child that is crying with the colic? If errors in diet are accountable for many of the pains of childhood, then the indications in such cases are that the child has eaten something that has disagreed with it. I know of no valid rule that requires the retention of injurious food in the stomach simply because it has gotten there, and would advise the administration of an emetic to relieve the overburdened stomach of its indigestible load, green apples and the like; a simple way to produce emesis is to tickle the fauces with a feather, or pass the finger "down the throat." If these measures fail administer some of the well known mild emetics. After relieving the stomach give the little sufferer a hot bath and a dry rub, then put it to bed where, as a rule, it will go to sleep without any soothing syrup or paregoric.

Such experiences with infants in arms is hardly possible if the right care is given to the nursing bottle or the mental and physical condition of the mother. It is not necessary to enter into the consideration of the influence of the mind over the character of the nourishment provided by the mother. It is too well known to need discussion; suffice it to say that many cases of colicky pains in the infant are due to a disturbed mental state of the mother, often tried by life's duties almost beyond endurance, and the question naturally arises in conclusion, what shall she and other afflicted women do to alleviate their suffering? Surely not resort to narcotics, but the problem is a difficult one to solve. Each case must be considered by itself. In some instances the whole machinery of living has to be overhauled and reset. Live right, by observing as far as possible the laws of nature; make free use of hot baths instead of resorting to narcotics: keep the mind at ease, remembering that, "as a man thinketh in his heart so is he," applies to the physical as well as to the moral nature, and if the pain or sleeplessness is due to some bodily lesion, consult and follow the advice of the family physician, unless he prescribes stimulants or narcotics, in which case dismiss him and secure another.

GRANDPA'S CRAZY QUILT.

BY HARRIET FRANCENE CROCKER.

That's what I call grandpa's farm.
Here's a red patch,—that's the barn;
Here's a white one,—that's the house;
Here's one, gray,—just like a mouse;
That's the granary, big and old;
Yonder is a patch of gold—
Grandpa's wheatfield, bright and yellow
Rippling in the sunshine mellow.

'Way up there a patch of green
On the hillside steep is seen
Stitched all round with barbed-wire fence,—
That's where grandpa's woods commence.
Dark green patches,—that's the pines;
Strips of light between, sometimes;
Squares of dark, rich, golden brown,—
That's where grandpa's plowed the ground.

Mamma's crazy quilt is pretty,
But somehow it seems a pity
Hours and hours to sit and sew
On that sort of thing, you know.
When it's done it's far too nice
To use, they say, at any price.
So I think that grandpa's quilt
Is better than one made of silk
And satin pieces, 'cause, you see,
His is useful as can be.

"CATNIP GREENS."

BY CLARISSA POTTER.

"Such a scrabbling and squalling and pull-hauling over a little wisp of catnip, I never saw!"

"What, Grandpa?" little Fanny asked, running up the plank steps into the kitchen just in time to hear the last of the story her grandpa had been telling. "What was it you never saw?"

"I never saw such a parcel of cats as there was in that back alley off Meat Market square to-day, and every one of them clawing hungry for the sprigs of catnip your grandma sent to market along with her butter and eggs."

"I send catnip to market! Why, grandpa, what do you mean!" and the brisk, sweet-faced old lady who was trotting from stove to table, dishing a nice hot supper for grandpa, let a mealy roasted potato roll from its nappy in her surprise.

"Yes, Fanny, your grandma did pack a handful of catnip along with the big green rhubarb leaves that she picked and laid over her buckets of butter and eggs to keep them fresh and cool. The green grocer man said when he opened the buckets, 'Hello! Something new! Catnip greens!' and then he tossed them along with the wilted rhubarb leaves down onto the rubbish heap in the alley behind the stalls and then came the scrabble of cats."

"Oh, grandpa! Please do tell me about it. Were they wild cats?" and the little girl's eyes shone with eager hope that her grandpa was about to tell another of his delightful stories of the wonders of the city ten miles from her home, which, as yet, she had never been allowed to visit.

"Not wild cats, Fanny, but a herd of half starved city cats. You and grandma never saw such poor lean famished pussies as came darting from out gutter holes and down shed roofs and along the walls into the alley after those bits of catnip. Black cats and maltese cats and cats yellow and gray and ring-streaked clawed and pull-hauled till not a shred of leaf or stalk was left."

"Dear me!" the kind-hearted old lady said, pouring a steaming cup of tea for grandpa as he drew his chair to the table, "what a pity those poor cats cannot have all the catnip they want when there is so much that goes to waste in our yards and lanes."

"Oh, grandma! Please can't I pick a big bundle of it and put in grandpa's wagon when he goes to market next week? He could toss it down to the poor pussies before the grocer man had time to make fun of it, and the hungry kitties would be so glad."

"Yes, child, if grandpa thinks best. Maybe it would keep the poor things more healthy through the hot summer, for these heated months are just as hard for cats in a hot city as for folks," grandma said, whose big kind heart loved pussies almost as well as babies.

It was a big bundle that Fanny had ready next market day; green and fresh and fragrant as half a hundred juicy catnip stalks can be crushed, leaf and branch, into a fat bundle.

When grandpa saw it he said, "Whew! I think I'll have to ride on the whiffletree to-day," but he crowded the butter firkins a little nearer together, and pushed a big basket of crisp radishes under the seat, making room for the fragrant herb that even lazy old Thomas, the house cat, scented from his cushioned nest in the kitchen and came out to pur over the scattered leaves on the porch.

"Catnip greens again! and all for those alley cats! Well, now, I call that Christian!" the grocer man said when he saw grandpa untie the bundle and toss it down into the dark, narrow passage-way behind the market stalls. "See 'em come! clatterty scratch, up from the wharfs and down from the roofs! They're crazy hungry for a taste of your greens! Well, I'm glad the poor, starved things have one friend."

Each week throughout the summer, Fanny sent these homeless city pussies a bundle of catnip, till they learned to know grandpa's market day and were on the watch, skulking on rickety old roofs, and peering from under rubbish piles for the greenleafed stalks that were sure to be thrown them.

"It all helps," the market man said, reaching for a handful of meat scraps to toss the furry waifs, "even feeding a parcel of wharf cats helps a bit in making the world more comfortable."

"Yes," grandpa answered, softly, "and he who adds to the world's good, is doing as the Master taught."

ON THE FARM.

BY BERTHA VOLENTINE.

"I don't drink cider; I'm a Prohibitionist," said six-year-old Walter, stoutly, as his brothers around the home cider mill urged him to take some. "I wouldn't, either," said Amy, Walter's acknowledged companion in thought as well as in play. "Old worm juice! ugh!"

Then the boy and girl ran away, and soon were seen with a crowd of young people, who had just come up, all visitors to the Thompsons.

"They're queer uns, anyway," said Eb. And at his words the others looked to where they now formed a not unimportant part of the little gathering on the lawn. They had always said that Walter had queer opinions about things, and that Amy would be a strong-minded woman:—and right proud were they, let it be added, to be able to call their brother and playmate more clever than the majority of boys and girls. And Amy, indeed, seemed, just now, to be showing her contempt of conventionalities. Right in the midst of the group of children she stood with her little round hat pushed far back on her head, curls "every which way," as she would have expressed it, bespattered apron, and a fan which she was complacently using as, with a broad smile, she enjoyed the effect of the fresh thrust she had given some of the boys on the temperance question, while Delsie, the daughter of the house, and Naida Witchfield rocked their dolls in cradles under a tree near by.

"Maybe one or t'other of 'em will be president, some day," resumed Eb, as they turned again to the work they had just left. "You know they say the right side always beats in the end."

"Pooh!" said lazy Dick. "I'm in for the present."

"I wouldn't be queer for nuffin," said baby Joe, who was applauded noisily.

"And I'll drink all the cider I want," said Denny. But he didn't that time. Their father came up just then, and, to their surprise, ordered them all to go into the house.

"What d'you s'pose can be the matter?" they asked each other, first by looks, then in words.

"Well," volunteered some one, "I heard father and mother talkin' about some tracts they got at the fair against cider; but I didn't suppose it 'd amount to anything."

"What 'd they say about cider?" demanded Dick.

"I'll tell you what they said," answered big brother Robert, as he passed them on his way home from the field. "They said that cider began to have alcohol in it when it was only twenty-four hours old, and that when the cider was made out of rotting apples there was alcohol in the juice before it was even squeezed out."

"Let's quit eatin' apples, boys," said Dick sarcastically. But his speech was not noted by the other boys. They saw how grave Robert looked, and they had great respect for their grown-up brother.

"Boys, I believe that my Sunday-school teacher was right when she said that cider starts more people to drinking than anything else, and that it's 'the devil's kindling wood.' I signed the pledge against it last Sunday, but if I hadn't, I'd do it to-day, after what I've heard about it," said he.

"That's right; give it to 'em hard!" said Amy, just then coming up, and guessing what they were talking about.

And with Amy and Walter and big brother Robert against cider, to say nothing of what their father and mother will do, there is no longer any doubt as to how the temperance question will be settled at the Thompsons'.

A COZY CORNER POET.

I am a little girl. I am eleven years old. Our Sunday-school class has a little society, it is called the Coral Workers. I wrote a piece of poetry about my little white rats and thought you would like to print it.

MY LITTLE PET RATS.

Daisy Bright Eyes is one,
And the other Nelly Bly;
When I call them they come,
My Daisy has a pink eye.

Daisy has a pink nose,
And a long and slender tail,
She has cunning pink toes,
And has a sharp little nail.

Nelly is black and white,
She is playful and cunning;
And is playing all night,
And is all the time running.

Unionville, O. Agnes Lerrain.

AN ACTIVE L. T. L.

I am a girl twelve years old. I am a member of the Loyal Temperance Legion. I go to the Legion as often as I can. I like to go there and I hope the temperance cause will conquer and the saloons will have to give up to the temperance cause. My brother is a member of the Legion also. Pearl Beck.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

The introspection which follows the home-coming is most cheering and satisfactory, for not only has the intricate machinery of the organization been kept well oiled and running smoothly, but there are signs of better times and of returning activity. At no point is the pulse of the great National W. C. T. U. so accurately tested as in the subscription list of its official organ and the literature department of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Ass'n. The apathetic and inactive white-ribboner who is content to pay her dues and attend the weekly or monthly meeting of her union, possibly takes THE UNION SIGNAL, that she may hear the voice of the leaders, but when the demand for leaflets, pledges, membership cards increases, we note "the signs of the times," take fresh courage, and pray that the day may come when our presses shall be consecrated wholly to the issuance of temperance literature. Nearly fifty per cent increase in the orders for Department Leaflets, Signal Lights, Timely Talks, National Leaflets, pledges, badges, etc., in the months of June and July, indicates an "all around movement" by "all around advocates."

"I would like to show the women some of our leaflets," writes a W. T. P. A. representative, "but our state treasury is empty, so cannot invest. Our women need to realize more and more the great good to be derived from the judicious use of temperance literature." How happy this zealous sister would be, if from a "free literature fund" the National could supply her needs!

The watchword of the year has been "organization," but to make organization effective, the hard working and well trained organizer must in some way be provided liberally with such literature as shall judiciously cultivate the new fields thus opened. The ground may be well broken, but "what will the harvest be" without the seed sowing of temperance literature? The lecturer, the organizer, who has, perhaps, obtained from a meager collection scarce enough funds to secure railroad transportation, has not the wherewithal to meet these vital demands. How, then, shall they be met?

Do a majority of the new members enrolled take THE UNION SIGNAL? I asked on our ocean trip, and the prompt response came, "We usually ask one or two members who have money, to subscribe, and they loan their papers to the others!" It is not our province to criticise methods of work, but we may again emphasize the fact that without the official organ, intelligent work cannot be done, and we are ready to fortify our position by a concession in rates until October 1, to new members only, who upon the statement of organizers cannot obtain the money to pay one dollar per annum for THE UNION SIGNAL. To them the paper will be sent three months for fifteen cents, six months for thirty cents one year for fifty cents. We name October 1, believing that at the annual National Convention to be held in Baltimore, October 18–23, some definite plans will be formulated to scatter broadcast the leaves for "the healing of the nations."

Yours sincerely,

CAROLINE F. GROW, Bus. Mgr.,

OUR FAIR NUMBER.

Once a year THE UNION SIGNAL greets a host of new readers. It has been our annual custom for nine years to prepare, during the month of August, what we have always called a Fair Number, and introduce it, through the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, into the farm homes of the land. We believe in Fairs, and we believe in farmers. We believe that county Fairs, when rightly conducted, are the most helpful and educative agencies which this generation has produced. But we long ago saw the dangers which this beneficent institution often permitted—the licensed bar, the lottery wheel and the distribution of corrupt literature, and we determined to counteract this baneful influence with a clean, pure paper, prepared especially for the farmers and their families. THE UNION SIGNAL is in many senses fitted to do this. Its constituency is found chiefly in the small towns and country villages, hence will be interested in the matter written for the agricultural population. Its leading editors have all been farmers' daughters, and have the keen intelligent sympathy for the tiller of the soil that is essential to an understanding of their sterling integrity of character and their live interest in the current events of the day.

We do not attempt to turn this number of THE UNION SIGNAL into an agricultural sheet. We could not if we would. Practical farmers know more about their business in a day than we could tell them in a month. But we have made a specialty of the temperance question, and we come before our rural readers in the capacity of the official organ of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and endeavor to enlist their interest in the mightiest movement that this land knows to-day—the annihilation of the liquor traffic.

We always count the intelligent American farmer on our side. What has a sober farmer to profit by the licensed saloon? He does not indulge in its illicit pleasures (?). He does not derive any benefit from the license fee. He does not glory in the plate glass windows and gilded interior of these dives of Satan. He does not use the "improved sidewalks" which the city fathers boast are the result of high license. In short, he receives nothing from the revenue of saloons, but the burden of their curse falls equally upon him in maintaining county institutions for the care of the saloon criminals and paupers. He helps to support the county jail and county poor farm. His taxes are proportionately increased as the saloons are increased, but not one cent of the saloon tax is used to improve his farm, his country roads or his country school-house. We do not plead for such a distribution of this accursed license tax, but we do plead with the farmer to open his eyes to the injustice of a system which burdens him with the evil consequences of a business whose profits are expended upon town improvements. Fortunate is he in one respect, and that is the distance of his home from the soul corrupting, sin polluting monster, the liquor traffic. The plagues of Egypt were as nothing compared to this loathsome, defiling, right hand of Satan.

The busy farmer's wife has very little opportunity to connect herself actively with a W. C. T. U., but she can belong to the Somerset union, which is a general union of white-ribbon women who really belong to the movement in heart and life, but who are unable for different reasons to belong to a local union. These women send their names and fifty cents each year to the National treasurer of the country in which they live (in the United States, to Mrs. Helen M. Barker, the Temple, Chicago), and thus give their moral support and an increment of financial help to the temperance cause. They are entitled to wear the white-ribbon badge (provided, of course, they have signed the total abstinence pledge) and may consider themselves members of the W. C. T. U. A subscription to THE UNION SIGNAL (only $1 a year) will keep them well informed of the movement.

In sending out this Fair number, we are sure of an honest, sincere circle of readers and bespeak an earnest hearing of our plea for total abstinence for the individual and prohibition for the state.

MUTUAL DEPENDENCE OF CITY AND COUNTRY.

Since the recent attempts to enforce the Sunday laws have been in progress in New York city, a great deal has been said by the local papers of the laws voted by the "puritanic" country upon the city, and it has been asserted that "the progressive and liberal spirit of the great metropolis will not long endure such silly and obsolete restrictions." These great exponents of public opinion do not seem troubled by the consideration that many times the city has outvoted the country and fastened upon the rural population laws utterly repugnant to that population; nor does the still more important thought seem to have occurred to them that the country may have quite as vital an interest in what the city is as the dwellers in the city themselves, and that possibly it is not a mere piece of gratuitous meddling with what does not concern them for the inhabitants of the rural districts to have some voice in deciding what laws shall be enacted for the government of large cities and how those laws shall be enforced.

That there is a lack of sympathy between people whose mode of life is so different, which, to a certain degree, unfits them for understanding one another's position, is unfortunately true. City people, we regret to say, often entertain a feeling akin to contempt for their country neighbors, regarding them as hopelessly behind the times in manners and ideas. On the other hand, it must be admitted that country people are considerably given to looking upon themselves as the strength and sinew, the only hope of the nation, and to regard all city ways as the extreme of folly and depravity. But unreasonable and unchristian antipathy does not alter in the least the relations existing between the two classes of people. Indeed, the very fact that there is some truth in both sets of views but argues the more strongly the mutual obligations and dependence of city and country. That thus far the country has furnished the vast majority of the great men of the nation is too well known to need proof. It is to be remembered, however, that it is the cities which furnished them the needful equipment and development of their powers, the cities which made possible their career.

It is also true now, as it has been throughout the history of the world, that it is in the cities that great movements have their beginning, gain their power, and from the cities gradually work their way into the rural regions. Our words "heathen" and "pagan" are well known and striking examples of the way in which this fact has wrought itself into our language. Both of them originally meant simply a person who lives in the pagus, or on the heath; in other words, in the country. But because Christianity conquered the cities, in form, at least, before the dwellers in the country had so much as learned its name, the inhabitant of the country became a synonym for a non-Christian. In Christian lands, of course, this old meaning is obsolete, for it should not be forgotten that it is not great reform movements alone which originate in the cities, but that the mighty forces of evil find here their mustering place, and from the great centers of life sweep out to curse and destroy. Though all movements are much more rapid now than in the past, the same, to a great degree, holds true to-day. In spite of railroads and telegraphs and newspapers, the movements of good or evil sweep the cities long before the country is largely affected by them. Slowly, but surely, however, they find their way to the rural districts, and whither the cities go there the country follows.

The young people of the nation are flocking into the cities. In large farming districts, occupied fifty years ago by thrifty American farmers, only foreigners are to be found to-day. The farm with its monotonous life, its distance even from the postoffice, not to mention the railroad and telegraph, its separation, in short, from the intense life of the present, has lost its attractions for American youth. The cities, with their illimitable opportunities for education in "all the wisdom" of modern times, their alluring possibilities for great and illustrious careers and, alas, with their equally great possibilities of evil, draw American boys and girls to them by the power as of an irresistible lodestone. It is useless to deplore, to argue against this tendency. Whether it be fortunate or unfortunate, good or bad, it is a feature of the age. To the cities our young people are bound to go. This being the case, is it not true now as never before, that the country has a right to have a voice in deciding what shall be the influences which rule in city life? If the cities are to be the leaders and the teachers, the country has a right to say something as to the character of those leaders. If to the city the boys and girls are going, country fathers and mothers have a vital interest in deciding what kind of influences shall surround them, and it is not only their right but their duty to fight to the death every evil of city life, and defend with all their energy everything that makes the city a safer place for the young lives which are to find their destiny within them. But more than this, the present outlook leads us to believe that the cities are to be the arbiters of our national destiny. It is, therefore, the vital business of every citizen of the nation to see to it that they shall become centers from which shall radiate the power of a Christian civilization, not seething cesspools of corruption and vice.

Fortunately rapid transit and swift communication have increased, a thousandfold, the counter influences of the country, while our laws and customs increase this influence to a positive force. No inhabitant of the rural districts, therefore, can wash his hands entirely from the evils of the "wicked city." It is all very well for the Christian farmer to insist that peace and good order reign in his own immediate neighborhood, his responsibility does not end here; he may, and should, do everything in his power to bring about reform in the municipal misrule of every city in the nation. It is his duty to see that the laws are enforced within his own township, he owes a duty also to the disregarded and violated laws of New York and Chicago. He is doing a good work when he drives saloons to a specified distance from his own church and schoolhouse, but he is a blind leader of the blind if he supposes his duty ends there. He has little conception of the genius of our civilization, of the goal toward which we are surely working, if he does not see that at last the seemingly warring interests of humanity are being welded into one, that what works ill to his brother in any remote corner of the universe will surely in the end bring his own destruction, that modern evils of every form which raise their heads first in our great cities, threaten ruin to our civilization, and that for the sake of every interest which humanity holds dear, not from his little neighborhood alone, but from every portion of our land and from the whole wide world, "Saloons, saloons, saloons must go."

OUR VIEW OF THE MONEY QUESTION.

Whatever touches the monetary system of a nation touches all its interests at a vital point, and should be dealt with in a spirit of true patriotism. As to the attitude of The Union Signal toward the claims of gold and silver as money — this is one of the questions upon which, for obvious reasons, we can have no declared policy. As representative of the white ribbon organization, The Union Signal stands specifically for the principles enunciated by that society, and always, whatever the question at issue, for the greatest good to the greatest number; which means, in its truest sense, the greatest good of all.

In view of the fact that the W. C. T. U. "lends its influence" to the Prohibition party, we naturally are interested in knowing what that party has to say concerning this—for the time being—overshadowing problem. We turn to the platform of 1892: "The money of the country should consist of gold, silver and paper," etc. Looking about us to see how these words are interpreted in the lives of loyal Prohibitionists, we find that in this party as in others (except, perhaps, the Populist) there exists the greatest diversity of opinion as to the proper monetary policy of this nation. Of the two most prominent prohibition leaders one is a pronounced gold advocate, the other a radical free-silver champion. Doubtless among the constituency of The Union Signal there is a similar diversity of opinion, and all we have to say on this as on other mooted questions is, Do your own thinking.

We believe in an all-round study of social and economic conditions. The more true all-roundness men and women acquire the better Prohibitionists they become. Naturally, however, in all discussions which pertain to the general welfare the sympathies of an unprejudiced seeker after truth will incline to that side which invites investigation, which seeks an arousement of thought among the masses, and especially among the farmers. The gold dollar or the silver dollar—whichever befriends the agricultural interest, whichever defends the many against the few, the oppressed against the oppressor, we "lean that way."

But while one person may honestly believe in a single standard and another in a double standard as productive of the greatest good to the greatest number, no one, no matter what his political affiliations, can sincerely maintain that the liquor traffic works good even to a few. It is universally acknowledged to be an evil. The most its most ardent supporters can say of it is that it is a "necessary" evil. Then condemned as it is by both God and man should it not come first on the calendar of proscribed evils? Is it not reasonable to make its prohibition the "dominant issue"? It seems passing strange that the men who denounce the "crime of '73" are blind to the crime of '95. To an all-round observer it suggests an obliquity of vision much more serious than that which is attributed to the "fanatical" Prohibitionist. The demonetization of silver may have been criminally brought about, as silver men claim; its unlimited free coinage may be an evil, as gold men declare. But no legislative crime can equal the legalizing of the liquor traffic, the great criminal maker, because it dwarfs and depresses the moral as well as the material and financial condition of the people; no evil is so detrimental to the industrial and commercial prosperity of the masses as the liquor evil.

The question of prohibition is the most pressing of all questions because it involves a higher law which must be reckoned with by nations no less than by individuals. The material and business life is so closely interwoven with the moral and ethical that a violation of law in the latter causes disturbances in the former, and the political party which refuses to recognize "moral issues" shows its ignorance of one of the first principles of wise government and of self-preservation. So long as we as a nation continue to sin wilfully against God and our neighbor by making legally right that which is morally wrong, by covenanting with the powers of evil, just so long will our country be under a ban, and whatever relief or improvement comes, will, in the nature of things be but temporary. Hence we maintain that the so called fanaticism of Prohibitionists, when rightly understood, reveals a sound philosophy. It is based not on sentiment but on reason, not on emotion but on law. Give this nation sound minds in sound bodies and sound money with sound conditions generally will follow as inevitably as the day the night.

"In God we trust!" That is what our coinage tells us. But something besides a mere profession of "trust" is necessary if we would keep our ship of state afloat. "Trust in the Lord and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land and verily thou shalt be fed." Whole volumes of philosophy are contained in this injunction and promise. It is a plain, simple statement of law, of cause and effect.

The liquor traffic causes poverty in a deeper sense than usually attaches to this phrase. Doing evil—violating law whether physical or moral—always results in discordant conditions. We must obey the rule whatever the problem we are trying to solve, whether mathematical or moral, political or personal. God cannot be counted out in any of the affairs of the universe whether it be the development of a human soul or the fall of a sparrow, the sublime sweep of a solar system or the making and keeping of a nation.

TOTAL ABSTINENCE AND PROHIBITION.

We, as white-ribboners, know that alcohol acts upon the nerves as the soft pedal acts upon the wires of the piano; it deadens them so that they think cold is not cold, heat is not heat, trouble is not trouble. But this deadening effect is a delusion during which the law of periodicity binds men with its pitiless chain; one day they have the drink, the gambling, the tobacco habit; the next day it has them. The only place in the world in which a man under sentence of death can secure a substitute, for money, is China; and the man agreeing to act as that substitute distributes the money he is to receive among his relatives, calls for his opium pipe, and goes his way out of the world. The power of narcotics over the human brain has in this fact its strongest and its most deplorable illustration.

The man who says, "I can carry more liquor than any other drinker in town, and yet keep a level head," gives by that claim an inventory of goods already badly damaged. For since alcohol is preëminently a brain poison, men of most brain grow dizzy first, and Hottentots stand steady longest, while genius shrivels under drink like a snow wreath in the sun. As civilization becomes complex the brain acquires more convolutions to the square inch, and its delicate tissues are torn more ruthlessly by the coarse intruder, alcohol. By parity of reasoning, the more complex the civilization developed, the more vital will it be that those who handle its fine mechanism shall have all their keenly trained powers keyed up to concert pitch. The brain must think with lightning speed, the hand must be steadfast as steel, the pulse must beat strong yet true, if a great commercial nation is to hold its own with the forces of chemistry and invention now on the field.

Temperance workers can hardly overestimate the value to the total abstinence cause of the multiplying modern inventions that put such a splendid premium upon teetotalism. The sure, slow lift of civilization's tidal wave is with us. Even as the farmer's crops grow most while he is sleeping, so ten thousand forces are perpetually at work in this great laboratory of the world, to move forward the white car of temperance reform. We who give our whole lives to the movement are hardly more than the weather-vane that shows which way the wind is blowing.

All the work that we do is based on a prohibitory law for one, enacted by himself, and the prohibition of the legalized sale of intoxicating liquors as beverages, enacted by the town, county, state or nation. Whatever tends directly to this result, whether it be restricted hours of sale, Sunday closing, prohibition of the sale to minors and drunkards, we, as white ribbon women, strongly favor and do our utmost to enact in law and to enforce in fact. But whatever tends to add respectability and permanence to the liquor system, we oppose, viz., license and high license in all their fluctuating forms and under the various disguises that they so readily assume. We believe that "what the law says is property is property," and that alcoholic liquors give no equivalent for value received, but are only a form of investment, the most delusive in the world, producing no wealth and destroying the wealth-producing power of the drinker in exact proportion to the amount he drinks. Therefore, when the state says that alcoholic drinks are property and shall be protected the first great fallacy in government has been enacted.

But the pocketbook nerve is the only one that vibrates throughout the liquor system, except when it allies itself with the ambitions of men by entering the political arena. To dissect out the pocketbook and political nerves is the Herculean task to which white ribbon women have set their hands. Whenever in any country the government allies itself with the effort to secure Prohibition we cooperate with "the powers that be" to the utmost of our own power. We cannot consent as an organization, to stand in relations of equal friendliness toward one political party that ignores, another that opposes, and a third that espouses the cause of Prohibition.

The soul's dark cottage, battered and decayed,
Lets in new lights through "chinks" that time has made;
Stronger by weakness, wiser men become
As they draw near to their eternal home.

—Waller.

"It took one hundred years to banish the doctrine of the Jewish caste from the Christian Church," declares Dr. Bashford, of Ohio Wesleyan University, "but the doctrine of Jewish superiority gradually disappeared with the destruction of Jerusalem. It took nearly one thousand nine hundred years to banish slavery from Christian lands, but slavery has disappeared from the civilized earth. It may take another generation to realize Paul s third declaration, but the Christians of the twentieth century will no more think of teaching the divine subordination of woman to man in the face of the last clause than we now think of teaching the divine subordination of slaves to masters and Gentiles to Jews in face of the first two clauses: 'There can be neither Jew nor Greek, there can be neither bond nor free, there can be neither male nor female, for ye are all one in Christ Jesus.' "

No reply to Dr. Rainsford's plan of establishing saloons of a moral character by putting them in the hands of good men is more conclusive than these words by Dr. Lyman Abbott, with whom I disagree so often on this question that I am doubly glad to be able to quote him. "We shall not get rid of any proportion of the liquor traffic by establishing reformed saloons. The saloon, a place which encourages men to drink between meals, can be reformed only by being abolished. The object of temperance reformers is not to promote moral reform saloons but to abolish the saloons altogether."

While Mrs. Carse, the dauntless Temple builder, is away recruiting for her tremendous task of the coming winter, On Duty takes the liberty to extract some personal reference to her in a private letter: "As I read the Temple Items each week, I say to myself, 'Let dear Mrs. Carse slip away and what a bemoaning, what a praising there will be! What a regretting that more wasn't said to encourage her while she was in the thick of the fight and specked with the mortar and scarred by flying bits of stone, as she heaved to the line.' But when the capstone takes its seal of 'Grace, grace unto it,' everybody will then hurrah for the Temple and its builder." Are we all doing all we can to help bring that glad day?

"My little white ribbon flutters alone to-night by the lovely waters of Puget Sound," writes an old Crusader, "but the heritage of priceless memories, out of which gleam the faces God anointed over a score of years ago, is mine. I hear your testimonies, I sing the hymns I know you are singing, and with you thank God for the personal blessings of the Crusade. God bless you and bless the great army of the W. C. T. U., and when the Crusade of life is ended, and we join our comrades gone before, may not one who marched in the ranks below be missing at the roll-call on the other shore."

I never see the shining cross of the King's Daughters without a feeling of tenderness and reverence for those who go about, even as their Master was wont, doing good. Among the faithful ones whose busy hands set the type for The Union Signal the silver cross has many wearers. One of these was privileged recently in visiting a summer home conducted and supported by a circle of King's Daughters in Evanston, Ill. To this home tired breadwinners are invited to spend one or two weeks away from city sights and sounds, face to face with bonny old Lake Michigan. The visitor cannot say enough in praise of this practical method of loving one's neighbors. Being a city girl herself it is easy to understand the spirit of appreciation which emphasizes such luxuries as "big bowls of flaming nasturtiums," "picking wild flowers and berries," "going down to the lake to fish," "lying in the hammock," "spotless napery, home-made bread and country butter." The summer is not spent yet. There may be no King's Daughters' home in reach to which you can send a tired worker. But how about your own home? Is it too full to admit free of all expense, and as you would admit Him came He knocking for rest and shelter, some one who otherwise will have no vacation?

IMPORTANT SUMMER GATHERINGS.

"Every sin," we are told, "brings its own punishment," and if delay in sending notes from this field cannot be reckoned a sin, surely it is like one, in that it brings its own punishment—the perplexing problem of how and where to begin after so long a silence! That the delay may be readily accounted for does not help the problem in the least, and hence sometimes in this way a little delay becomes a greater one, and so on. I had almost said ad infinitum! This much by way of apology. And now by way of notes.

The absence from Baltimore of many of our active workers has caused a lull in matters pertaining to that all-important event of the near future, the National Convention. But with return from these various outings, preparations will be renewed with fresh vigor. In so far as possible all that could be done was arranged before the exodus began. Among the absentees is the president of the Baltimore city union, Mrs. A. C. Robinson, one of the two representatives of Maryland at the great World's gathering in London, who took advantage of the occasion to spend the most of the summer on that side of the Atlantic. The other representative, Mrs. Baldwin, who was among the guests at the marriage of Miss Katherine Willard, in Berlin, returned in June, much pleased with her voyage.

The annual meetings of the county unions were begun, as usual, with that of Kent. This was indeed a stirring event in the little town, and not only there but in all the country about, judging from the number of vehicles in the streets, as well as from the crowded audience. Among the unusual decorations for the occasion was a large banner stretched across the street, bearing the words: "Welcome, W. C. T. U."

The Talbot county convention was a source of profit and encouragement to those interested. Mrs. Haslup, president of the state union, was in attendance at both meetings. Other annual meetings of the county unions are set for early dates.

A meeting of a different character, held in July, one in its very nature antagonistic to the liquor traffic, was that of the Baptist Young People's Union of America, "the greatest meeting Baltimore ever had," the registration committee reporting the names of over six thousand delegates. The "guiding thought" for the coming year given by the president, the words of Christ, "I am the light of the world," and the pledge taken by almost all the delegates "to bring one soul to Christ during the year," rendered the closing scenes, we are told, "most solemn and impressive."

Other meetings here that should be noted, even at this late date, because of their success, were a series held through the efforts of a committee from the Baltimore Prohibition Union and the W. C. T. U. Thirty meetings were held in twenty-nine churches and one hall, and addresses were made by twenty ministers of ten different denominations, five prominent lecturers of the W. C. T. U., the secretary of the National Prohibition League and four of our state Prohibition speakers. All the speakers were party Prohibitionists; prohibition for the state and nation, and total abstinence for the individual, were the subjects explicitly discussed at every meeting. The total abstinence pledges taken numbered 344, the voters' pledges 284. Among the National speakers at these meetings were Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson, Mrs. Sophia F. Grubb, Mrs. J. T. Ellis and Miss Cummings, superintendent of young woman's work in Africa.

Miss Cummings was in the state for a short time and won favorable opinions wherever she was heard. A Stevenson union, in the Young Woman's Branch, is one of the results of Mrs. Stevenson's brief visit to Baltimore.

Another visitor to that city, who made a more extended stay, was Mrs. Martha Strickland, of Detroit. Mrs. Strickland gave several lectures on various phases of parliamentary law and usage at public meetings, and organized classes subsequently for instruction in these lines.

The organization of a Good Government Club in connection with the Arundell Club, of Baltimore, is worthy of note in woman's work here; also the visit of that distinguished and charming woman, a mother of clubs—Mrs. Julia Ward Howe. Mrs. Howe gave addresses at the three woman's clubs in Baltimore, at one in Mt. Washington, at the closing exercises of the Bryn Mawr School and at the Friends' Meeting House, Park avenue, Baltimore. Her address at the last named place was on suffrage for woman, and was, I believe, the main reason of her visit at this time.

An important meeting held here recently that bears indirectly on the "woman question," was that of about three hundred lay delegates from seventy-five Methodist Episcopal churches in Baltimore, to consider the matter of lay representation. All the speakers in favor of "the rights of laymen" were constantly applauded, and strong resolutions to the General Conference for extension of these rights were passed. Such proceedings can have ultimately but one logical conclusion in that progressive body.

The Prohibition camp at Glyndon has been, as usual, in successful operation since July 4.

The annual convention of the state Prohibition party was held there August 2, and nominations made for governor and several other state officers. Among the resolutions adopted was one indorsing the principles embodied in the Gardiner-Donaldson local veto bill of New York, and commending it to all Prohibitionists as a basis of non-partisan efforts before the next legislature of Maryland. Another indorsed the fidelity to sworn duty shown by Commissioner Roosevelt, of New York, and commended his course to our own state and county officers. The liquor traffic was denominated "the great enemy of popular government and a public nuisance," and its legislation for beverage purposes by the state a "bargaining away the public health and public morals," thereby "directly contributing to the debasement of our citizenship." The "splendid work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union" and other organizations engaged in similar work, was "heartily commended," and aid and coöperation promised.

The nominee for governor, Mr. Joshua Levering, is a wealthy merchant of Baltimore, well known and most highly esteemed in business, and in philanthropic and religious matters. He is president of the Young Men's Christian Association and holds several other positions of trust and honor in the community.

The course of politics here is far from smooth, the Democrats—so long the dominant party in the state—being hopelessly divided among themselves. Their state primary election, held recently, was a pitiful spectacle of submission to the dictation of a "ring" leader, and indignation loud and deep among "true Democrats" has resulted. In view of this, one signing herself "A Colonial Dame—A Daughter of the American Revolution—A Descendant of the War of 1812—A Marylander," has written to one of the most influential dailies of Baltimore, stating that a number of women "wish to form a Cleveland Club, not to vote, but to go behind the voters to brace them up and help them to throw off the yoke of the dictator, a traitor at that." This has called forth an editorial headed "Woman to the Rescue," which is most interesting reading.

Alas, for the men whose "eyes are holden," and who have no woman to guide them! Happily for them that women with "clearer vision" are coming to Baltimore from all over the nation in October, with just this object in part, and with the hope of opening the "holden eyes."

The annual meeting of the state union will be held at Easton, Talbot county, September 24, 25 and 26. Miss Elizabeth U. Yates, of Maine, is expected to be in attendance.

CONNECTICUT.

MIDSUMMER LETTER.

Since the last letter from this state appeared much has been done, and while there have been many outside interests, the temperance work has not flagged.

Hartford county held a convention in City Mission Hall, and the principal address was given by Dr. Mary Wood Allen. Her subject, "Unintentional Home Training in Evil," was of interest, judging by the close attention of her audience. Clergymen and others gave addresses, and these, with the routine business, election, or better, re-election of officers, music and a short social hour at midday, filled the time. Neither the Y's nor the children were forgotten. Tolland county convention was held in Rockville. No outside speaker was provided, but the exercises were made interesting by the presence and words of our state president, Mrs. Forbes, Rev. J. H. James, the county officer, and an enthusiastic band of delegates.

New London county held its annual meeting at Hanover and had a most delightful day. Dr. Wood Allen was the speaker, and Mrs. Fitz Gerald addressed the children in her own happy manner. The L. T. L. was well represented and the convention was in every way bright and active. It was voted that henceforth this county shall hold continued and public meetings, of similar character, upon the basket collection plan. A vote was also taken denoting a desire and determination to coöperate and aid the Temperance Temple. In the evening the address was upon "Heredity, or the Bequests we Make our Children," and here, as in Hartford, the speaker made a good impression, and her words will live in the hearts of her listeners.

Fairfield county secured Mrs. Forbes to make the evening address at the convention which was held in the First Methodist church, Bridgeport. They report a pleasant and profitable meeting, and how could it be otherwise with such a program, such lectures and such a genial welcome? Many of the papers and addresses were from state superintendents, or others specially interested in the subjects presented, and some fine singing was furnished. But when is the latter feature not true at our gatherings?

Windham county ladies went to Scotland for their annual reunion, but remote as that sounds, it was not a very serious journey. Mrs. Fessenden made the evening address. She is so well known in our state that her name was sufficient to call out an audience. The children assisted by singing and recitations, and officers of the county were reëlected.

New Haven county W. C. T. U. workers went en masse to Hanover Park, Meriden, to hold the semi-annual convention, and nobody who attended regretted the trip when the day was over, for a feast of good things was provided.

The scene of the meeting is a temperance park and it is being patronized by people who are glad to have a place to spend a pleasant day undisturbed by the annoyances ever present where intoxicating liquors are sold.

County superintendents, Mrs. Forbes, state president, county officers, clergymen, visitors and others contributed to the day's entertainment. One visitor was Mrs. M. J. Pollock, of Bellefontaine, O., one of the early Crusaders, another, Mr. Philo Evarts, a lifelong Prohibitionist. After the adjournment of the convention a band concert was given through the kindness of the park manager.

Middlesex county held one of its pleasantest conventions in the Baptist church, Middleton. Mrs. Forbes and Mrs. Andrews, state secretary, were present. Mrs. Fessenden made the address of the day. The local union furnished a bountiful collation at noon and evening, singers assisted in making a joyful meeting, while earnest addresses inspired to more earnest work for the cause.

Litchfield county convention convened at Thomaston and had a perfect day. Mrs. Andrews, Mrs. Fitz Gerald, Mrs. Cobles, Rev. Charles Smith, Mrs. Stone, Mrs. Moody, Mrs. Faust and the head workers assisted in the exercises of the convention. Miss Greenwood, the National evangelistic superintendent, gave a fine Bible talk. Officers were appointed for the coming year.

And so the counties meet, discuss methods, needs and results, working in the strength of Him who went about doing good. Inspiration is gained and discouraged hearts cheered by these reunions when with a common cause at heart we sit down and take counsel together.

MISSISSIPPI.

A LIVE UNION AND A CHAUTAUQUA.

Upon the principle of "Honor to whom honor is due," I append the following report from McComb City union, Pike Co., Miss.,—the only union which has reported since convention in May:

"We have a live L. T. L., which meets regularly once each week. It is growing in interest and influence. Soon after the Natchez convention, Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson lectured before a large and appreciative audience. Quite recently we have held a Demorest medal contest, which was one of the most enjoyable evenings of the year. The medal was awarded to Miss Lillie Sartin. There were six contestants, all young ladies. We have splendid gospel temperance meetings every fortnight, which do great good. During the late whisky campaign we did good work preventing the 'antis' from capturing the county.

"On Confederate reunion day we gave away six barrels of lemonade, distributed one hundred temperance tracts, and circulated a counter whisky petition, securing many names. Our booth on grounds was beautifully decorated, and quite a resort for the better class of people. Last Saturday, at the earnest solicitation of the citizens of Holmesville, two of us went out to that little town and organized a W. C. T. U. of fourteen members. The meeting was very enthusiastic and promises good results. Our superintendents in all departments are doing good work. We have a column in our town paper, which is kept well filled with taking temperance facts, and is read by all. Our union is growing. We are constantly circulating pledge cards and gaining new names. Our most active members are busily preparing to attend the Chautauqua at Crystal Springs. A good W. C. T. U. program has been prepared for that occasion."

The above report is from the pen of that faithful worker, Mrs. Mary Montgomery Reynolds.

Our day at

MISSISSIPPI CHAUTAUQUA,

July 22, was given to the W. C. T. U. by the directors. At ten a. m. the exercises opened with a grand chorus led by Professor Williams, then a symposium, "What the W. C. T. U. has done for me," which was most excellent. Many good papers were sent in to be read, beside interesting verbal testimony. The noontide hour of prayer was an occasion of special interest, being led by our Mrs. Ervin, of Columbus.

Mrs. Beauchamp, National organizer, of Louisville, Ky., captured the entire assembly during her stay. The question-box was in every way a success, Mrs. Beauchamp's promptitude and ability being strikingly manifest in her successful answers. One asking "if the W. C. T. U. concentrated its efforts on woman's suffrage, would it not accomplish its aim, the destruction of the liquor traffic, much sooner," was in the nature of a bomb in the camp, and a majority of the members voted to throw it out, fearing its effect would be to shut them out from next year's Chautauqua, but two sisters stood firm, and with Mrs. Beauchamp, carried the day. The latter made a suffrage speech in reply to the question, and then made a bright apology for doing so, as she was not on the program for a suffrage speech. Just then one of the board of managers rose and invited further discussion of the subject, evincing personal interest and appreciation of what had been said. This elicited further words from Mrs. Beauchamp, and the minority came off with flying colors. "The world do move."

Mrs. Ervin's mothers' meeting was the overflow of her own motherly heart, encouraging young mothers to patience and personal consecration.

"Round table talk" was an hour of instruction, and interchange of ideas as to ways and means of forwarding the work. A motion was made and carried that we request the executive committee of the W. C. T. U. to organize a state school of methods. Mrs. Lillie Thompson (a member of the assembly board), was appointed superintendent, and Mrs. Reynolds, of McComb, secretary, headquarters to be at Crystal Springs. Mrs. Beauchamp organized an enthusiastic Y union, with fourteen members. The state superintendent of Demorest medal contests (Miss Anna Simonton) not being present, Mrs. Reynolds, of McComb, was appointed to take her place, and the contest hour was a great success. The medal was awarded to Miss Lulu Weal, of McComb, her speech being on "Noble Christian Womanhood." Miss Garner, of Columbus, won her usual measure of praise, for two beautiful recitations. Choice musical selections from artists present added greatly to the pleasure of the hour.

PENNSYLVANIA KEYNOTES.

ALLEGHENY COUNTY.

The thirty-one local unions of this county are each actively engaged along the lines of work best suited to the locality in which they are situated. Allegheny union holds gospel temperance meetings each Sabbath, distributes literature and visits the sick and needy. East End union assists with the prison and jail work, visiting the reformatories. Wilkinsburg union holds mothers' meetings monthly. Carnegie union has fine headquarters with large hall for holding meetings and has opened a free reading-room. Idlewood union enjoys prosperity, having headquarters with reading-room and gymnasium. The W and Y join in every good work here. Bellevue union have their own headquarters and hold a charter. They have a wide awake Y which does earnest, aggressive work. Sterrett union, of Allegheny City, have under their supervision the only day nursery in the county. They have purchased a new building on Race street, centrally located. The enterprise is a great benefit to many poor mothers. Swift W. C. T. U. has taken up railroad work as their specialty and are doing most effective work. The Moorhead union conducts the "Moorhead Home," having under its protecting care women and girls who come to the city strangers seeking employment. The Mt. Washington W's and Y's have taken up flower mission and scientific temperance instruction as specialties. Oak Station, Springdale and Elizabeth, suburban unions, hold meetings, distribute literature and conduct a column in the local papers. Venna has headquarters and is active along various lines of work, endeavoring to hold their local option law against repeal. The local unions throughout the county united in giving a series of dinners in a central part of Pittsburg. The series lasted three days, and was a great success in every way. Preparations are now being made for a successful convention to be held the last week in September.

NORTHUMBERLAND COUNTY

held its annual executive meeting at Montandon. The delegates were royally entertained by Miss Butler, county recording secretary, and Mrs. Cleese, vice-president. The annual county convention will be held at Elysburg, September 19 and 20. Mrs. Holvey has been secured to lecture on the last evening of convention and a gold medal contest will be held the first evening. Mt. Carmel union has secured the names of all who signed petitions and publishes them annually at its own expense. This union held a strawberry festival recently, the proceeds of which were applied on the Temple fund. They expect to raise one hundred dollars for the Temple.

LAWRENCE COUNTY.

The semi-annual convention met at Edenberg with a large attendance. Miss Pauline Leavens, of Chicago, was present. Harper (colored) union sent two delegates to the convention. The colored work is in a most flourishing condition. Mrs. Helen G. Rice made a brief visit to the county on her way home from state convention at Butler and held two meetings. The second annual county convention of the Loyal Temperance Legion was held August 19. Lawrence county was honored at the state convention by having their L. T. L. president, Miss Nettie Chapman, chosen to make the response to the address of welcome. Miss M. Luella Crawford was present this month to assist Mrs. Baker, the county superintendent of Y work. New Castle union has lost a loved member by death, Mrs. Harriet D. Sankey. New Bedford union held a franchise contest recently. A very impressive memorial service was held in honor of Frederick Douglass, at which Mrs. McBride read an able paper on his life. Memorial services were also held in memory of Mary T. Lathrap. Mrs. Holvey delivered twenty lectures throughout the county and very kindly concluded her work with a benefit lecture for the Y's at the Central Presbyterian church in New Castle.

WESTMORELAND COUNTY.

Scottdale is a wide awake union. It erected a public drinking fountain and watering trough which was dedicated July 4th. The fountain bears this inscription, "Presented to the Scottdale Borough by the W. C. T. U. July 4, 1895. No drink is so good as pure water; 'tis the one that never makes sad." Scottdale union numbers one hundred and ten with thirty-one honoraries, and the "honor roll" is receiving careful attention.

TIOGA COUNTY.

This county held a semi-annual convention at which there was a good attendance. Blossburg union is wide awake and active. It has paid all but one hundred dollars on the reading room and boarding house. The L. T. L. hopes to erect a drinking fountain this fall. The Ogdenburg union have "bearded the lion in his den," and placed a wall pocket in the bar room of the principal hotel, which they keep well filled with literature that "those who drink may read." Other unions are doing equally well in other lines. Mrs. D. C. Waters, county press superintendent, has been seriously ill but is now recovering.

DELAWARE COUNTY,

at its annual convention, reported a gain of sixty new members. Mrs. Mary Sparkes Wheeler was elected. The next convention will be held at Lansdowne in September.

BUCKS COUNTY

fall convention will be held at Yardly, September 1. Mrs. Holvey has been secured as speaker. A large and enthusiastic parlor meeting was held at Fallsington in July. Mrs. JMary Twing, president of Yardly, Y was present, and so enthused the young people that an organization was effected of nineteen who promised to meet an organizer in the early fall and be enrolled for the winter's campaign. Mrs. Helen G. Rice addressed the Legion at a grove meeting. The Makefield W. C. T. U. and Junior Prohibition League held their annual summer meeting in O. H. Holcolme's grove, July 30. A debate on Independent Political Action was a prominent feature of the afternoon. Chairman Patton and William Beny, candidate for state treasurer, were both present and made addresses.

SNYDER COUNTY.

The white banner of the W. C. T. U. now floats in this county, Mrs. Mary E. Gearhart having effected the first organization in its bounds at Selin's Grove, with a membership of twenty-two, of which Mrs. Anna Kistner was elected president, Miss Kate Ehrehart, corresponding secretary.

NOTES.

State convention will be held in Harrisburg October 11 to 15; fuller particulars in next letter.

We still delay our Y letter hoping for further contributions.

Those sending items for THE UNION SIGNAL will please address all letters after August 31 to Smethport, McKean county.

Several postals to presidents and press superintendents still remain unanswered. Send before the tenth of each month.

MISSOURI.

CONVENTIONS THROUGHOUT THE STATE.

The season of conventions draws on, and the first report is from the twenty-first district, Osceola the place of meeting. Among the visitors were Colonel Sobieski, H. P. Harris and Rev. Armstrong, wife and daughter from Clinton. Excellent papers were read portraying the relation the saloon sustains to the church, the home, the school, to good government, and to politics. Department work was considered, and a parliamentary drill given by our state president. Mrs. Bosworth, who has been lecturing and organizing in the district, spoke on organization. The feature of the second evening of the convention was a two hours' debate on "Franchise," with Mrs. Hoffman on the affirmative and Rev. Mr. Armstrong on the negative. The verdict of the audience was overwhelmingly in favor of the affirmative.

The Holt county school of methods convened in Craig last month; the district president, Mrs. Dunning, presided, assisted by Miss Ella O'Fallon, county president, and Mrs. Hunter, local president. The following premiums are offered by the Holt county W. C. T. U. for the Maitland fair: First, best essay on "The Effects of Alcohol and Narcotics on the Human System," by boys and girls under eighteen years, $4; second, best temperance scrapbook, by boys and girls under sixteen years, $2; second best, $1.50.

Cass county convention, held in Freeman, while not largely attended, on account of inclement weather, was of local help in suggestions along department lines. In the evening Miss Wood lectured on "Christian Citizenship."

McDonald county convention met in Anderson. The exercises on Sunday morning consisted of addresses on the religious work of the W. C. T. U., responses, welcomes, etc. In the afternoon discussions on various topics and recitations by young ladies filled the time. In the evening a grand address was given by Mrs. Hoffman. On Monday department reports were received and a contest held.

The third annual convention of the second district met in Kirksville, with President Page in the chair. The representation from unions was small, but aggressive work has been done in the face of much opposition and indifference. Demorest contests have been especially successful. The popular meeting of the first evening was well attended and cordial greetings were extended by the mayor of the city, and several of the normal faculty and by the resident ministers. Mrs. Millie Lewis and Mrs. Bosworth were present during the sessions of the convention.

The state president, Mrs. Hoffman, was in convention the second day, and her words of wisdom were helpful and inspiring. Her address at night was replete with logical and convincing points.

The fourth district held its annual gathering in Jamesport. The address of welcome was by the mayor, who unlike the mayors of some cities, enjoyed good health even during a W. C. T. U. convention. Other addresses were given by representatives of the union and Y. P. S. C. E. Department work was taken up in the morning session, and fraternal addresses were given by representatives of the two Epworth Leagues and of the Christian Endeavor Society. In the afternoon sixteen unions responded to roll-call. A Demorest gold medal contest furnished the entertainment for one evening, and Mrs. Sophie Grubb gave her logical and convincing address on "Personal Responsibility," the second evening. Fourteen active and five honorary members were added to the Jamesport union during the convention.

The Johnson county white-ribboners met in convention in Knob Noster, Mrs. M. E. Golladay, district president, in the chair. The Temple and other lines of our work received earnest consideration. A memorial service was held for Mrs. Nettie Kelly, through whose perseverance the union was organized. Mrs. Golladay gave an interesting talk on the subject of union mass-meetings of Sabbath schools in the interest of temperance, and read a fine paper on "Motherhood." Miss Wood gave a talk on the Anti-Cigarette League, and also made an appeal for new members; four regular and two honoraries were secured. At the evening session one more member was added to the number. In the evening Miss Wood gave her lecture on "The Christian in Civic Life."

NOTES.

Clarksville union writes of ten new members gained on the occasion of Mrs. Hoffman's visit. More recently a rousing temperance mass-meeting was held, and after weary months of patient waiting, public sentiment is increasing in favor of our cause. The three ministers are honorary members, preaching, praying and living temperance.

Mrs. A. Rollar, president of the sixth district, recently organized a union in Plattsburg of twenty-three members, and one at Easton with twenty-seven members.

Blythedale has had a lecture from Rev. J. H. Burrows, of Cainesville. The L. T. L. is in a flourishing condition.

Burlington Junction Rural union holds its meetings at homes of members who come for miles in wagons, buggies, carts, or on foot. Often an all day session is held. These women are thoroughly versed in W. C. T. U. methods, and recently held a Demorest contest in town, traveling from three to seven miles to attend. This society is rarely ever without funds, and is ably assisted by the young ladies in all their undertakings.

The twenty-second district rejoices in new unions at Nevada, Joplin, Webb City and Shell City. Mrs. R. B. Hall, state evangelist, has visited several points holding gospel temperance meetings. Miss Vandelia Varnum, John G. Woolley and Mrs. Hoffman have given lectures in the district. Nevada is preparing to entertain the district convention, and Butler will welcome the state forces in November.

Adrian writes of a successful Demorest contest, also of a W. C. T. U. picnic where the L. T. L. furnished the entertainment in the morning and the union held a mothers' meeting in the afternoon.

The new union at Ford City grows in membership and good works; a specialty is made of mothers' meetings. Pineville W. C. T. U. rejoices in the fact that every member of the brass band is required to sign the pledge, and expulsion from the band will follow its violation.

Miss Carrie Lee Carter reports a successful tour of two weeks in the twenty-sixth district, having organized five new unions, given twelve lectures and addressed six other meetings, also assisted at the district convention held in Houston. Delegates came many miles over the rugged roads of the Ozarks and the two days' program was full of interest, which culminated in a gold medal contest the second night.

ENFORCEMENT OF LAW.

For some time past the enforcement of our prohibitory law has not been all we could wish, and the friends of temperance have become so thoroughly aroused at the unfaithfulness of officials, that it could no longer be endured in silence, and on July 4, at the call of the State Temperance Union, there assembled at Topeka a mighty host of delegates from all over the state. The state W. C. T. U. was represented by its president, Mrs. L. B. Smith, the treasurer, Mrs. Ella Brown, of Holton, and many other state workers.

It was an enthusiastic meeting. It is no secret that our Governor, when interviewed by a newspaper correspondent, stated that our prohibitory law "could not be enforced where public sentiment was not in its favor," and for this he was roundly scored by that convention. The true friends of prohibition feel that this statement of our chief executive, whose business it is to see that all laws are enforced, has worked more harm to the cause so dear to us than all else combined since the passage of the law.

As soon as the Governor's statement was made public, open drinking saloons began to spring up in places that had been entirely free from the curse for years, and a desperate effort has been made, and is still being made by the whisky traffic, to manufacture such a state of "public sentiment" at these points as will make it next to impossible to enforce the law, but it has been truthfully said that "whom the gods would destroy they first make mad," and this certainly seems to be the outcome in this case, for the people have been awakened from their sleep of fancied security, and there is being inaugurated a regular old-fashioned temperance revival, and it is being daily demonstrated that "public sentiment" is still in favor of a rigorous enforcement of the prohibitory law. If Governor Morrill is not sorry that he ever made such a statement, he ought to be. I believe that he is now, however, making some effort to enforce, regardless of "sentiment," and has demonstrated that it can be done, when done by the authority of the state officials.

ASSEMBLIES.

The Chautauqua assemblies of both Ottawa and Winfield were well attended by members of the W. C. T. U. At each we had a place on the program daily, and our meetings were of much interest. Many able papers were read by some of our best workers in the lines they represented, and their departments were thoroughly discussed. This annual "gathering of the clans" cannot fail but result in a grand awakening of all who are privileged to attend, and a renewed enthusiasm on their return to the work of the local unions. We have no cool summer resorts in Kansas, no mountains to scale except the "mountain of difficulties," and no sea breezes to invigorate save that which blows over the seas of corn, for it is corn, corn everywhere. No fear of famine this year, as we do not turn our golden harvest into soul destroying drink it is used for that which God intended it should be, as food for man and beast. God has blessed us with plentiful rains, and an abundant harvest, and I trust that the sheaves garnered by the W. C. T. U. will be reported proportionately large at our coming annual convention to be held at Hutchinson, the third week in September.

COUNTY CONVENTIONS.

Jefferson county held a school of methods at Meriden, five unions being represented. The district president, Mrs. Cowan, was present, also Mrs. S. A. Thurston. The following papers were read and discussed: "The Cigarette Evil," "Temperance is not Prohibition," "Relation of the Drug-store to the Prohibitory Law," "The hand that rocks the Cradle rules the World," "Health and Heredity." Mrs. Dr. Hopkins hospitably entertained the entire convention at her home for tea, at the close of the meetings.

The Coffey county W. C. T. U. secured the services of Miss May Jaquith, our state evangelist, for a series of meetings in Le Roy, as a prelude or preparation for their annual convention to be held in that place. As a result several were converted and the meetings developed in interest so that it was thought best to give her the first evening of the convention also in place of the program previously prepared. Delegates were in attendance from three of the four unions of the county and several visiting sisters also. District President Haines came up from the Winfield assembly to assist in convention. This was her first visit to the county and her constituents were happy to greet her. The second evening was divided between Mrs. Haines in an address on W. C. T. U. department work, and Miss Jaquith in a farewell message to those who had so faithfully attended her services. The day sessions were filled with routine work. A number of excellent papers were read and discussed. Good audiences in day time and crowded houses at night were a welcome feature of the occasion. The pastor of the M. E. church welcomed the delegates to his beautiful church edifice, and the mayor of the city gave to them the "freedom of the town." Such evidences of friendliness from our good "brothers-in-law" were highly appreciated and impress us with the idea that the "coming woman" is to be accompanied by the "coming man" and that their advent is really assured.

Miss Jaquith held a similar evangelistic meeting at Tonganoxie, where the Leavenworth county sisters convened. Her meetings resulted, as did those in Coffey county, in a means of arousing Christians to their duty and awakening an interest in our work, as well as gathering souls for the Master; she accomplishes much, and cannot be too highly recommended to unions all over the state.

Mitchell county white-ribboners met at Cawker City and Rice county held a profitable session with the Center union. Among the many interesting discussions was a parliament on hygienic cooking. The convention reporter "touched a sympathetic chord" when she said that "what to cook and how to cook it, is of more importance to the majority of women than what to wear and how to make it; three times each day the housewife's brain is busy with culinary processes, trying to evolve healthful, and at the same time palatable, food for the family. She must economize time and strength as well as resources, in all her preparations." Would not this be an excellent topic for discussion at our local unions? The W. C. T. U. might well support the Boston hotel reform movement that has discarded pie from their "bill of fare." How many precious hours could be spent in something that is elevating, if that one article of food could be dispensed with on all our tables. White-ribboners who do their own pastry work could answer.

The Rescue Home of Kansas City, Kan., an institution for the rescue and care of destitute children, is doing a grand work. They report an average of twenty inmates per month, ages ranging from a few months to eleven years. Some of these are placed there by mothers to enable them to procure employment to take care of themselves.

Our state editor, Miss Bray, has for some time been in feeble health, and is now taking a vacation and visiting her aged father who resides in New England. It is earnestly hoped that the sea breezes may fully restore her to health and strength.

News in a Nutshell.

MRS. EDNA H. KEAGLE, last year president of the Redlands, Cal., W. C. T. U., is this year numbered as one of the church triumphant.

THE W. C. T. U. at Clackamas, Ore., organized in April, has a roll-call of twenty-five members, and is greatly encouraged by the unflagging zeal for the work shown by so young a union.

LOCAL and county unions are one by one falling into line in preparation for November 24, the date to be generally observed in churches, Sunday-schools and W. C. T. U's as "temperance Sunday."

STRAFFORD county, N. H., W. C. T. U. met in quarterly convention recently at East Rochester. A fine attendance of workers and sympathizers greatly cheered those who stand at the helm of this county temperance ship.

MRS. SARAH A. MCCLEES, who has become a permanent resident of California, is rejoicing in the companionship of her daughter, Mary, and her grandson, Douglas McClees. The three will make their home together at 936 S. Hill St., Los Angeles.

MRS. FRANCES J. BARNES is preparing some "travel talks" about her trip to the Mediterranean and the Orient which she hopes to present with stereopticon views. The subject of temperance will not be wholly omitted, as it has become so much a part of her life on sea or shore.

AN interesting program was prepared for the annual school of methods at Long Beach, Cal., August 12-14, following which was the quarterly state executive. Mrs. E. T. Scott represented the W. C. T. U. at Long Beach Chautauqua, giving her address "Our Battle," which was highly complimented by the newspaper reporters.

Two members of the Violet union, Nebraska, have been made a temperance committee of the M. E. church at that place. The press superintendent of Pawnee City union could not secure space in one local paper, but having become local correspondent of the paper she improves the opportunities to report the work of the W. C. T. U.

THE first quarterly meeting of the Federation of Societies at Los Angeles, Cal., was a pronounced success. This federation, the W. C. T. U., the Orphans' Home Society, kindergarten work, day nurseries and other philanthropic interests were presented. In this federation men are eligible as delegates if they belong to a society composed of men and women.

ON the seventh of April Miss Rhena E. Mosher left home to do Y work in New York state. In nine weeks she traveled about two thousand miles and gave forty-four addresses, sixteen of these being in schools and colleges. She formed five Y societies; one society beginning with twenty-four members now numbers sixty. One hundred and five new members were gained.

MRS. SOPHIE F. GRUBB, National superintendent of work among foreigners, will speak in Willard Hall, the Temple, at noon early in October. She desires appointments in the city or near by for the evenings of those days. Her terms will be ten dollars and expenses to and from the Temple. Application should be made at once, addressing her at Kirkwood, Mo.

TEN cents from each member of the local unions will run the Florence Crittenton Anchorage in Chicago one year. About twelve dollars has already been received in response to the appeal a few weeks ago. This is not a local work but girls are received into this home from all parts of the country. The committee wish to thank most sincerely all those who have sent their dimes. Let there be showers of blessings (dimes) to Mrs. M. E. Kline, The Temple, Chicago.

THE W. C. T. U. forces in Suffolk county, New York, have taken a long stride forward this year. Mrs. Eva Horton, county president, has visited the local unions, giving them much inspiration; she also arranged a lecture tour for Mrs. L. E. Bailey, of Wisconsin, whose work was closely followed up by local endeavor, the county membership having thus been more than doubled. A special result of the endeavor of Suffolk county W. C. T. U. has been the erection of a commodious building at Point o' Woods, or Chautauqua-by-the-Sea, a pretty summer resort. No liquors are sold in this place, and the dormitories and restaurant of the W. C. T. U. afford a most desirable retreat for our tired workers.

MRS. MABEL L. MACCOY, president Mansfield, Mass., W. C. T. U., writes: "John G. Woolley spoke at Tent Endeavor, on Boston Common, July 11, to ten thousand people. The enthusiasm with which his words were received was unbounded, and made the hearts of the white-ribboners grow strong with the assurance of victory. On Sunday evening he spoke again at Music Hall to three thousand people. The fire of his eloquence was like molten lead, and his listeners sat enthralled as he portrayed the horrors of liquor-drinking, and arraigned the Church of Christ as the accomplice of the saloon. They were great occasions, and we may well feel that with God in heaven, and John G. Woolley on earth, the death of the liquor traffic is certain, and that, too, at no distant day."

SUNDAY-SCHOOL DEPARTMENT.

Dear Sisters:—Permit me a word of exhortation. Our National Convention occurs earlier this year than formerly and therefore all reports should be sent in at once. We have sent a supply of report blanks to every state superintendent, and we earnestly request our workers to make use of them. Will not local superintendents send complete reports to their respective county superintendents without further delay? Answer each question definitely, and send with the report a letter concerning the work of our department. Especially do we ask for accounts of Sunday-school temperance rallies, and all efforts made in the interest of our plan for an annual temperance Sunday.

If you have no county superintendent please send reports to your state superintendent. We urge all county superintendents to secure reports from each union, and to summarize the same and send immediately to state superintendents. Will not every union doing Sunday-school work please report? If you have no county or state superintendent will you not send your reports directly to the National superintendent? All reports should be in my hands not later than September 1.

Dear superintendents, make haste! Let our harvest be complete. Thus we shall give an impetus to the work of the coming year and encourage the hearts of those who have labored so faithfully in the past.

Yours for prompt service,
Stella B. Irvine,
Nat'l Supt.

FLOWER MISSION DEPARTMENT.

Dear Co-Laborers:—Our department work is like the old, old story, so often repeated yet ever new. I have written a personal letter to each state superintendent inclosing "our new leaflet, 104" and the blank report. I trust that each superintendent will respond promptly with a good report. A great many people are at work in various ways in the flower mission department, but it is almost impossible to get them to report in detail what they are doing. Therefore my most earnest plea to all flower missioners is—report all work done. The easiest and most practical method of accomplishing this is to purchase an inexpensive blank book, label it "Flower Missions," and into its pages insert from day to day complete notes of work according to my "Plan of Work" leaflet. I have received a large number of encouraging letters from our co-workers and know excellent work is being accomplished all over our country, but it cannot be reported unless we have it in round figures. Being situated so far from headquarters it is absolutely essential that I receive all state reports not later than September 1.

Treasurer's Corner.

I wish to call attention of all superintendents who desire to have their financial reports as an addenda to the treasurer's report that it will be necessary to have them in the hands of the treasurer certainly by the first day of October. These reports should be so prepared as to be ready for the printer without revision. If all would follow some such general order as the following the appearance would be much improved:

Name of Department.
Receipts.
Expenditures.
Balance.
Name of Superintendent.

As the report is properly headed, "Financial Reports of Superintendents," it is not necessary for each individual report to bear such heading, neither is it necessary to append title at the close. Of the thirty-two superintendents last year, eleven sent financial reports. A resolution was adopted last year that superintendents, organizers and evangelists shall not be reappointed until after their reports are heard, and it was strongly urged that the National should have a clear financial statement from every one to whom money is given from the National treasury. Some reports reached the treasurer after the report was printed, and hence, could not appear. So, sisters, if you send report, have it in on time.

Again I want to urge every local treasurer to faithful collection of dues and prompt forwarding of same. These are hard times, but the skies are brightening and we trust the worst is over financially. Our work is broadening and deepening and the outlook is encouraging. Miss Willard will soon be with us, with her cheery hopefulness and her manifold plans for our ongoing. So many pleas have come for a later date for closing the treasurer's books, I have decided to run the risk and say September 25 instead of 20 as I have written all state treasurers. This will give me four days in which to prepare and tabulate my report which must be in the printer's hands October 1, in order to be printed, proof read and corrected. Monday the 30th is the last day of September and reports mailed from any state the 25th should surely reach me by Monday, and I will see that all dues received up to Monday are incorporated if I and my assistant sit up all night to do it, but I could not promise it if received a day later. Let us have full reports and a great increase in membership for Baltimore.

"I do hope, mamma," said little six-year-old Donald, "that my garden will turn out better than it did last year. The seeds came up all right, but they didn't hatch!"

When Lina first saw the baby kitten, its eyes were not yet opened, and she was told the poor little kitty had no eyes. "Give me a pencil and I'll make it a few," was the prompt reply.

Boys and girls who are studying grammar will appreciate the humor of the situation when, according to an English periodical, a flunky, who was proud of his grammar, in announcing the arrival of a Mrs. Foote and her two daughters at a reception, bawled out: "Missus Foote and the two Miss Feet."

A schoolboy who "builded better than he knew" described St. Augustine, Fla., as "a great summer resort in the winter."

"If we are to live after death, why don't we have some certain knowledge of it?" said an old skeptic to a clergyman. "Why don't you have some knowledge of this world before you come into it?" was the caustic reply.

A story is told of three French boys who were studying a volume of Shakespeare in their own tongue, their task being to render portions of it into English. When they came to Hamlet's famous soliloquy, "To be or not to be," their respective translations were as follows:

1. "To was or not to am."
2. "To were or is to not."
3. "To should or not to will."

A BIG FIFTY CENTS WORTH.

That very interesting and helpful publication for women, "The Housekeeper," of Minneapolis, Minn., has recently been purchased by a syndicate of prominent publishers who propose to enlarge the magazine and greatly add to its usefulness. Mrs. Effie W. Merriman, a writer of national reputation, is now editor-in-chief. The new management has set out to double its subscription list (already over 100,000) and is offering to send "The Housekeeper" for one year and a copy of the famous "Buckeye Cookery" book—535 pages, oil-cloth binding—both for 50 cents. "The Housekeeper" has been established eighteen years, and its regular subscription price is $1. Over 450,000 copies of "Buckeye Cookery" have been sold. Magazine and book for 50 cents is a great offer. Read "ad." in another column.

"I do not think I am egotistical in saying I have something to blow about," remarked the cyclone, as it carried a few houses into the next state.

"I cannot account for it," said the doctor, "but this is a severe case of mal de mer."

"I know it, doctor," said the sick man, "it is all caused by the soprano in the next flat practicing on the high C's."

A certain little three-year-old likes very much to go to church, and especially enjoys the singing. One day the choir sung, "Rock of ages, cleft for me," and after she got home the little one was heard singing, very seriously, "Rock the babies kept for me."

HOW TO GET A TOKOLOGY FREE.

Tokology has for some time been advertised in and recommended to The Union Signal readers as a book for every woman, but in these times of financial depression the complaint comes from many who desire the work and know its value that $2.75 is too much to pay for it, and, although the price of the book is not reduced, and cannot be from the fact that the sale of the work is largely through agents, still you can learn by sending postal card to Alice B. Stockham & Co., Chicago, how to get a Tokology free.

"Mine, miner, minus!" This is the general upshot of speculation in mining stock.

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure Deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

Home Hints.

Spots on the floor made by spilling hot grease can be easily removed if cold water is immediately poured on. This cools the grease and prevents it from soaking into the wood. Then wash with strong potash water after scraping off the surface grease. Use a handled mop, as the potash will skin the hands.

---

It is often the misfortune of one who is ironing to scorch a garment. If the mark of the iron is but slight the next washing will remove it, or it can be wet with soapsuds immediately, and hung in the sun for several hours. For worse stains a repeated dipping in a strong solution of borax, drying in the sun or firelight each time, will be effectual for any spot where the fabric is not injured. The solution must be so strong that no more borax will dissolve in the water.

---

A delicate glue for mounting ferns, flowers and mosses is made of five parts of gumarabic, three parts white sugar, two parts starch and a very little water. Boil until thick and white.

---

Good Housekeeping gives the following directions for spiced grapes: Five pounds of grapes, four pounds brown sugar, a pint of vinegar, a tablespoonful each of cloves, and allspice, and a little pepper. Put all together and cook three or four hours.

---

Place a piece of tender, lean steak on the meat board and scrape it until the pulp is entirely separated from the white fiber which holds it together, and you have the easily digested and nutritious portion of the meat. Season this with a very little salt if for a sick person. Make up into a little flat pat and broil quickly over hot coals, or in a skillet, with a little butter. If for a well person, add pepper, and if desired, a little finely chopped onion.

---

Where a rapid succession of hot, wet cloths is needed in a sick room the nurse often scalds her hands in her haste to prepare them. One who has had experience in caring for an invalid mother has, after much suffering along this line, found a better way. Fold the cloths the size they are to be applied. Wring them out of cold water, fold between two pieces of newspaper, and lay on the top of the stove where it is not too hot. The cloths will heat rapidly, and as many at a time as are needed. If there is no cook stove, wring out the hot cloths between cold ones.

---

A subscriber writes that she is much troubled by the ravages of the buffalo moth, and will be very grateful if some one will give her, from experience, instructions as to their extermination. The answer will be given in this column.

---

When shoes seem hopelessly stiffened by being soaked in the rain, give them a thorough rubbing with kerosene before they are quite dry. After standing awhile give them a second treatment with the oil, letting them stand in a moderately warm place to dry. Finish with a liberal coat of shoe polish.

---

Kid gloves should be taken off by turning them wrong side out from the wrist up, not by pulling at the fingers. Turn and pull them into shape as soon as they are taken off. Do not lay them away until they are perfectly dry.

---

It is claimed that lemons preserved under glass will keep almost indefinitely. Some one experimenting placed a lot of lemons, one each, under inverted goblets on July 4, and took them out at Christmas, when they were in perfect condition and juicy as ever. Wrapping them in tin foil also preserves them, keeping the air out.

If ever there was truth in the oft quoted saying that "a woman never invents anything" that day has past, for according to the latest reports from the Patent Office, 5,200 patents have been taken out by women. The following invention supplies a "long felt want" and as there has been no "patent applied for" it may be used at the discretion of other sufferers, of whom there are many. A San Diego (Cal.) woman who was pestered by other folks' chickens scratching up her flower bed and littering her yard, hit on a novel scheme for conveying a gentle hint to her neighbors. She tied a lot of small cards with strong threads to big kernels of corn, and wrote on the cards, "Please keep your chickens at home." The chickens ate the corn and carried the message to their owners in a fashion that was startling and no doubt effective.

Our Library Table.

Our Day: The Altruistic Review, is especially fine in the "Monthly Round-up" of the current issue. The editorial touch upon "The Young People's Movement" of this summer is one of prophecy for coming decades.

"An Appeal to Housekeepers," by Christina Goodwin, is an article in the August Forum, touching the much-vexed question of domestic help. It is a clear statement of the mission of home-keepers, and the true missionary seeks not her own but another's weal.

"The Clearing of Mulberry Bend: The Story of the Rise and Fall of a Typical New York Slum," by Jacob A. Riis, is an article appearing in the current Review of Reviews. The name of the writer alone is sufficient guarantee of the value of the article as a study in municipal reform.

The American Medical Temperance Quarterly devotes a good share of its valuable space this month to the consideration of the treatment of typhoid fever without the use of alcoholics. The subject is handled editorially, as also in a contributed article by Dr. W. H. Riley, of Battle Creek Sanitarium. This little magazine is invaluable and ought to be in the hands of every temperance household.

There is a felt want in the world of fiction for temperance stories that will command a wide reading because of their literary worth, attracting thereby those who will not otherwise listen to any voice pleading for the "unpopular cause." Into this gap of need Elizabeth Stuart Phelps is pouring the wealth of a story that can be described by no common phraseology. "A Singular Life" has reached its twenty-second chapter in the August Atlantic Monthly, and as the plot unfolds the readers are held spellbound by the magic of that pen that can tell more of life's secrets in a dozen strokes than many tell in pages.

In the August issue of the New England Magazine is a keenly interesting article, "The Discovery of Silver," by Eliot Lord. It is the story of the two Grosh brothers, Allen and Hosea, who, in 1849, went from Philadelphia to Mexico, by ship, and then made that hazardous journey of ninety days to San Blas. The quiet heroism, the unselfish devotion to each other and the tragic death of the two brothers, form a story that is beyond fiction. The Grosh brothers reaped no benefit from their long and patient toil, and it remained for other hands to drag from the earth the wealth that had been first discovered by these pioneer explorers.

"Argon: The New Constituent of the Air," is one of the many fine articles in the August Popular Science Monthly. It is by Dr. J. T. Stoddard. In regard to this stranger, the writer says that it "out-nitrogens nitrogen in its chemical inertness"; also that "the discovery has well been called 'the triumph of the last place of decimals'—that is, of work so exact that the worker knew that the small differences in the figures he obtained must be due to the presence of an unknown substance rather than to an error in his results. The prediction based on his observation, the search for the disturbing substance, and its discovery, form an achievement, which in the history of science, has perhaps only been surpassed by the prediction of Neptune by Adams and Leverrier and its subsequent discovery by Galle."

Do you Feel Depressed?

Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

It invigorates the nerves, stimulates digestion and relieves mental depression. Especially valuable to tired brain-workers.

The leading article of the August Arena is of emphatic interest to moral reformers. It is entitled "A Battle for Sound Morality," by Helen H. Gardener, and is a history of the passage of the "age of consent" bills in New York, Arizona and Idaho, the age in each case having been raised to eighteen.

Female Filosofy: Fished Out and Fried by Feelix Fieler. A collection of well chosen articles on woman's suffrage. Bright and interesting. Address the author, Caldwell, O. Price, paper, $.50; cloth, $1.

Twenty-five Letters on English Authors. By Mary Fisher. Published by S. C. Griggs & Co., 262 Wabash avenue, Chicago. Price $1.50.

This volume, designed for teachers, literary clubs and the general reader, treats of those eminent writers who, for more than five hundred years, have most influenced the thought of the world. The reader is made acquainted not only with the character of their productions, but, what is of greater moment and interest, with them as men—what they felt and believed, their way of looking at life, and their experiences. It thus fills up the outline—clothes the skeleton with living flesh and blood. The treatment of the subject is a departure from the general method adopted in its omission of the hackneyed judgments that pass from book to book; its fresh, telling matter from original sources; and its special discussion of the influence of weak and vicious literature upon young minds. The chapters are in the form of letters to a young friend—in a style vigorous, fearless and unconventional.

Across India, or Live Boys in the Far East. By Oliver Optic.

In this volume, which is the first of the third series of the "All-Over-the-World Library," Oliver Optic takes the Belgrave family in their steamer, the "Guardian Mother," sailing to Bombay and Surah. At the latter place the party leave the steamer and continue their voyage by rail to Lahore, Delhi, Cawnpoor, Lucknow and Benares, visiting the scenes of the Sepoy Rebellion, as well as many other interesting places. During the voyage on the "Guardian Mother" a party containing a number of persons of importance in India were rescued from the perils of the sea, and through their influence the party enjoyed many privileges, and were given much information during their tour in the country which it would otherwise have been very difficult to obtain. The geography and history of the country are conveyed in a most interesting manner, but as the author knows just what young people desire, he does not allow their interest to lag from want of novel incidents and thrilling scenes, including hunting adventures and the sports of the country.

Lee & Shepard, Boston. Price, $1.25.

Children of the Ghetto. A Study of a Peculiar People. By I. Zangwill. Macmillan & Co., publishers, New York and London. Price $1.50.

The author explains the purpose of this altogether interesting and unique narrative as follows: "The book is intended as a study, through typical figures, of a race whose persistence is the most remarkable fact in the history of the world, the faith and morals of which it has so largely moulded." It is not every writer who can occupy himself with continuous detail in narration and not become tedious. This study of the Ghetto in London is carefully drawn, no outline of character or custom slighted, and the reader is held from chapter to chapter by the mingled pathos and humor, the gloom of a religion of dead faith flashed upon here and there by human happinesses or the simple joy of life which will overleap high barriers and shine in spite of darkness. The author deals kindly but justly with these children of Abraham; his pen is keen to lay bare their pitiable devotion to empty formulas of a superceded law, their purity of life in spite of down-dragging corruptions on every hand, the grotesqueness of a really noble devotion to a belief existing in tawdry shreds and rags of material observance of form at this day stripped of all beauty and significance; and the strange elasticity of conscience that prepares a sacrifice with one hand and with the other filches from a brother's need. The study of child-life in this story is peculiarly interesting as it shows the investigating thought of youth peering into the musty beliefs and rejecting with reckless abandon those things on which their fathers hung their eternal welfare. The whole volume is a valuable record to those interested in this ancient race, wanderers from the shrine to which every "faithful" one among them looks with yearning love and hope.

Publisher's Notes

Mrs. Barney's Bible Readings are so well known, and Mrs. Barney herself is so well loved of white-ribboners, that in announcing a Reading from her pen we feel sure of giving pleasure. As World's superintendent of penal, charitable and reformatory work and National evangelist, Mrs. Barney is, as may be imagined, one of the busiest of busy W. C. T. U. women; nevertheless she consented (at the urgent request of the editor) to prepare upon short notice the Reading for September. Her subject is "Heart Enlargement," and her words breathe that consecrated, uplifting spirit, that closeness to the divine and to the human, which is possible only to the soul whose life is "hid with Christ in God." The Reading is one which cannot fail to reach the heart and quicken the spiritual life of every reader.

Signal Notes.

THE World's department of peace and arbitration is exerting an influence in no less than twenty different countries. In South America there is a peace band of two hundred boys and girls.

MISS MARY TURNER, a talented young colored girl, formerly of Indianapolis, but now of New Orleans, has made an excellent miniature bust of Frederick Douglass, which is being cast in bronze, and will be exhibited at the Atlanta Exposition.

THE liquor law recently passed in Norway provides that no liquor association can be formed for doing business in a city or village, until the question whether liquor is to be sold has been voted upon by the resident men and women who have reached the age of twenty-five years. Decisions thus reached by popular vote are valid for five years.

REV. FLAVIUS J. BROBST, of Chicago, in a recent sermon on Christianity and Paganism, said: "The growth of the population of the United States since 1800 has been one of the marvels of the world's history. Since that date it has multiplied itself twelve times. But what surpassing marvels do we see when we look at the growth of the Christian church, which during the same period has multiplied itself sixty-two times." In 1800 one person in fourteen of our population was a member of a Christian church. In 1890 one person in three was a professing Christian.

IT is the intention of the Inter-Collegiate Prohibition Association, which held its third annual convention at Cleveland, Ohio, July 2, 3 and 4, that every college in the land shall have an organized prohibition club before the end of the year. The secretary will have general direction of the work. It is the purpose of the executive committee to urge the members of the convention to take up a course of study in relation to current political questions, especially the great question of the release of our nation from the bondage of the saloon. Prohibitionists everywhere are requested to send to the secretary, at once, the names of prohibition students and instructors in any college with which they are acquainted. Address John Elliott, Secretary, 219 York street, New Haven, Conn.

A NATIONAL Purity Congress, under the auspices of the American Purity Alliance, will be held in the city of Baltimore, Md., October 14, 15 and 16, 1895, just before the National W. C. T. U. Convention. This combination has been made because the time seems to have arrived to give more thoughtful, intelligent and general consideration to the important social problems involved in the purity movement. All social purity, white cross, moral education, Woman's Christian Temperance Union organizations, churches and other religious bodies and philanthropic associations in sympathy with the objects of the congress, are invited to send five or more representatives, and to forward the names to the recording secretary of the American Purity Alliance, Mrs. Naomi Lawton Davis, United Charities Building, New York, before October 1.

JOSHUA L. BAILY, Esq., the new president of the National Temperance Society, is one of the best selections that could have been made for that important office. It will be remembered that it has been filled by men of such distinction as Hon. William E. Dodge, the merchant prince of New York city, Gen. O. O. Howard, (U. S. A.) and Rev. Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler. Their successor is one of the finest specimens of what Quaker origin and training can do for a Philadelphia merchant. Joshua L. Baily's coffee houses are known the world over, and have never been equalled in any country as a temperance force. They have also been a financial success. Mr. Baily was from the first a warm friend of the white-ribbon movement. He is the brother of Mr. Baily, of Trenton, N. J., whose daughters are among the choicest of the posy garden of Y's. The new president is a man of fine presence and manners, and one who will not alienate by brusquery, but will hold to the work in which he is engaged a large and constantly growing circle of friends. THE UNION SIGNAL offers him the right hand not of fellowship but of sisterly appreciation, and hopes his tenure of the office may be long as we know it will be brilliant.

TWENTY-FIVE LETTERS ON

ENGLISH AUTHORS,

For Teachers, Literary Clubs, and the General Reader.

By MARY FISHER. 12mo, cloth. 406 pages. Price $1.50.

This work treats of those eminent writers who for more than five hundred years have most influenced the thought of the world. The author makes the reader acquainted not only with the character of their works, but, what is of greater interest, with them as men—what they felt and believed, their way of looking at life, and their experiences.

The work is a departure from its class in its omission of the hackneyed judgments which pass from book to book; its fresh, telling matter, from original sources; and its special notice of the effects of weak and vicious literature upon young minds—its mission being to inculcate a taste for the "best that has been thought and said in the world."

The Chicago Inter Ocean says:

This is a book marked for its simplicity of style and its directness in clear statements of the literary characteristics of eminent English authors, from Chaucer in 1400 to Mrs. Humphry Ward in 1891. Such a broad field can give only epitome sketches, but her characters are wonderfully clear in their delineation. She does this not so much in words of her own, but allows each to speak, and thus clothes each in living character; what each thought and believed; how they lived and acted and labored. The reader will seldom find more of positive value in such small space, told more vigorously and pleasingly, than in the neat, compact volume. Teachers and literary clubs will find the book boundlessly suggestive—inviting to wider fields—while the intelligent, thoughtful reader will find richness upon every page. It is not often a book of the kind is more deserving of full commendation.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Cardinal Gibbons has just returned from Rome.

Saturday's steamships carried $1,100,000 in gold to Europe.

Dispatches from Yokohama report sixteen thousand deaths from cholera, in Japan.

Ten thousand persons attended the third day's session of the Universal Peace Union at Mystic, Conn.

A dispatch to the London Times confirms the report of an attack on an American mission near Foo Chow.

The California Knights Templar carried 40,000 bottles of wine to Boston, to be distributed among the guests.

The saloons were very strictly watched in New York August 25, and there was but little violation of the Sunday law.

Destructive forest fires have broken out along the western divisions of the Northern Pacific and Great Northern railroads.

On August 22, Milwaukee lost by fire fully one hundred buildings, including warehouses, freight depots and other railroad property.

H. O. Houghton, Sr., of the publishing house of Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston, died suddenly August 25. He was seventy years old.

William R. Castle, the new minister from Hawaii to this country, has arrived in Chicago. He will go to Washington about September 15.

The Coliseum, the mammoth amusement building being erected in Chicago, collapsed Wednesday night of last week. No one was injured.

The whisky trust has been reorganized under the name of the American Spirits Manufacturing Company, with capital stock of thirty-five million dollars.

FRIENDS of Mrs. Maybrick on both sides the water are glad to know that attention has been called to her case in the House of Commons, and that the Home Secretary "feels it his duty to inquire into it." We trust the efforts in behalf of this unfortunate woman will not be relaxed until she has been declared guiltless of the crime attributed to her.

THE angle of vision at which Lady Henry Somerset sees America is quite different from that at which Mr. Wm. T. Stead views it. Her "American Observations," given on page 2 of this issue, are eminently fair and will tend to correct many wrong impressions which have gone abroad concerning us. How much depends upon the point of view and the motive of our observations one of another! We wish this article could have as wide a circulation as Mr. Stead's book.

ON September 18, President Cleveland, at Gray Gables, will touch the button which will set in motion the machinery and unfurl the flag at the buildings of the International Exposition, at Atlanta. We are glad to note that one of the orators of opening day is to be Bokker T. Washington, president of Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute (colored). It is fitting upon this occasion, when the South invites the nations of the world to be its guests, that official recognition should be thus given to that race to which is due in so great degree the growth and prosperity of the cotton states.

WE asked Mother Thompson some time since to write for THE UNION SIGNAL a letter which should be in the nature of a farewell tribute to the old Crusade church, around which so many sacred memories cluster and which is no longer to exist as a visible landmark in W. C. T. U. history. A note just received from the dear "mother" tells us that she has been for some weeks suffering from that most depressing of ailments, malarial fever. We are glad to assure her numerous "daughters" that she is better and hopes to communicate with them through the SIGNAL soon. She says: "Before the inertia of malaria took possession of me, I had it in my heart to express personally to our highly favored white-ribboners who crossed the sea, saw and heard such wonderful things, and returned in safety, my congratulations and heartfelt thanksgiving. Now it is too late! Won't you please hand over to those around you my good intentions, at least."

THE decision of Judge Gibbons, of Chicago, in the Harlem case, deals another severe blow to race-track gambling, which cannot fail to have more than a mere local influence. He refused to dissolve the injunction restraining the Chicago Fair Grounds Association (otherwise the Harlem race track) from permitting gambling within its inclosure, upon the ground that a corporation is an artificial thing, not a natural being, and enjoys no greater privileges than those conferred by its charter—privileges which by its gambling operations it was clearly transcending. The gamblers were hoping that they would be able to hide behind some technicality, but the court ruled that the law against gambling was too explicit to admit of any evasions. "If criminals go unpunished," said the judge, "it is owing, not to the insufficiency of law and its machinery, but to the dereliction of officers." This is as true in other states as in Illinois. If it depended upon the making of laws only, this country would be a shining example of good government. To quote further from Judge Gibbons' admirable opinion: "It is needless to say that the apathy and indifference of a large number of those whom we are pleased to enlist among our best citizens, in respect to public affairs, are largely responsible for the frequent miscarriage of justice in our larger cities."

THE Denver hotel explosion in which twenty or more persons met a horrible death is another calamity for which the liquor traffic is directly responsible—and when we say the liquor traffic we mean all who in any way lend their influence to its support. The drunken engineer, the drunkard maker and the man who makes drunkard-making a legitimate business, must be held equally responsible for the Gumry hotel holocaust. Truly, the drink evil never lets anybody alone.

WILLARD HALL, Chicago, is to be the scene of a new religious organization with the ringing name of the Church Militant. For a long time the white-ribboners of Chicago have desired religious exercises in the Hall on Sunday, but it seemed too great an undertaking without money to back it, so they are glad that a body of Christian men and women forming themselves into an undenominational society, and led by the Rev. John Rusk, are to occupy the Hall on the Lord's Day. This new church proposes to work week days as well, and as its name indicates will fight sin in all its forms, by offering something to take its place. The members will be divided into committees, who will look after certain classes of the neglected and criminal floating population of the down town districts. All hail to the Militant Church!

IT should be remembered that the Pullman company is subject to the law of the state or county through which their cars run to just the same extent as are other liquor-sellers. This question has been recently brought to the front by a test case in Wyoming. The attorney of Sweetwater county notified the Pullman company that they must pay a license for selling liquor in that county or suffer the penalties of the law, and furnished them with a copy of the statute. As a result orders were issued by the Pullman managers, stopping the sale of liquors in all their cars in Wyoming. For in order not to violate the law they would be compelled to take out a license in every county traversed by their cars. Travelers through Wyoming testify to the strict observance of this edict. Here is a point that temperance people would do well to make the most of. Let our workers in every state in the Union,—those that are under license, tax, mulct or Gothenburg system, no less than those under prohibition—see to it that the Pullman cars comply with the law of the state or county through which they pass.

IN the opinion of Mayor Strong, New York's excise law is a bad law and should be repealed. To this end he favors its rigid enforcement. Replying to citizens who waited upon him with a petition to recommend a little less vigorous policy on the part of Commissioner Roosevelt, and claiming that his strict enforcement of the Sunday closing law was causing drunkenness in tenement houses, he said: "I am sorry, but this petition will have to be buried. You know our administration was elected because Tammany had been lax in enforcing the laws, especially the excise law. In fact, the Lexow Committee proceedings clearly proved that the excise law had been made, not for enforcement, but to bleed the saloon-keepers. In its strict enforcement we are working for the saloon-keepers' interest. The repeal of the law can be brought about only by enforcing it rigidly. Of course, you know, I like the saloon-keepers. Ninety per cent of them are just as good men as any other citizens. They have just as many rights as others, and I am trying to get them their rights. But you can't ask me to wilfully break the law. What we want to get is local option, and I would not vote for any man this fall who does not come out in favor of it. Neither should you." Here is a frank admission that local option so-called works to the interest of the liquor-seller. We wonder if Mayor Strong and his friends, the saloon-keepers, would be as favorable to a local option that is local option!

IN THE NIGHT WATCHES.

BY E. HARRIET HOWE.

Sometimes when murm'rous silence hushes all the night,
Asleep I lie, inward from far a voice I hear,
Calling my soul to stand before One in the light.
I wake, and greet the Presence that I do not fear,
And wait expectant, awed, to hear aright
His message. The stroke of passing hour falls on my ear:
"Be also ready. Would my coming e'er thy soul affright?
Do well thy work; the day of God draws near;
For after countless ages take their flight
As now thou art, so then shalt thou appear."

Father, I will be faithful. 'Tis sweet indeed to be Withdrawn from earth, in peace, alone with Thee;
Speak to my heart, O Holy Presence, stay
And guide me safely through tumultuous day.

A WHITE RIBBON STRIKE.

In Two Chapters.

BY ADA M. MELVILLE.

Chapter I.

It was the last meeting of the year of the Happyville Local W. C. T. U. Urgent notices had been sent to the one hundred members of the union, but only ten were present: the Little President, the Wide-Awake Secretary, the Alert Treasurer, the Emphatic Superintendent of Mothers' Meetings, the Superintendent of the Evangelistic Department, the bright-faced leader of the Loyal Temperance Legion; the Crank of them all, the Superintendent of Literature; the Superintendent of Sunday-School Work; the Silent Member, who though voiceless, attended every meeting and inspired them all by the noiseless eloquence of her great dark eyes; and the Little Old Lady, a crusader who had been a grandmother when the crusade fires had begun to burn and who had knelt on the unholy floors of the saloons and pleaded with hardfaced proprietors in the name of God.

The meeting was called to order, the hymn sung, the chapter read, the prayer prayed, the minutes approved and the Little President rose to the business of the hour. She looked from face to face, slowly, inquiringly, almost sadly and was about to speak when the Emphatic Superintendent of Mothers' Meetings sprang to her feet.

"Madam President, I move we strike! Strike right here and now and strike hard!"

The members were accustomed to the "volcanic outbursts" of the Emphatic sister and always welcomed her warm words, but this remark was beyond comprehension. The Little President—her diminutiveness was a mere matter of feet and inches—retained her self-possession and said quietly, "You have heard the motion. Is there a second?"

Then there was a gentle laugh around the circle, and the motion was seconded.

"But, Madam President, I am in earnest!"

"I do not doubt it at all," responded the quiet Little President, "and your earnestness is always to some purpose. However, if you would kindly explain the nature of the action you propose, we could vote upon the motion more intelligently."

"Well, I will explain. We are meeting here month after month, week after week and our numbers are growing smaller and smaller. Just look round at each other, sisters,—everyone of you a superintendent save our two blessed helpers who are never absent and whose faithfulness cries shame upon us. Strike? Yes, I mean it,—strike for revival of interest, strike for attendance of members, strike for help in our work as superintendents, strike a real blow at that curse of our town"—pointing through the open window to red screened doors that swung to and fro at the touch of men and boys, children and occasionally women. "Let us pray," continued this Emphatic Superintendent, in a lowered voice, and then and there arose such a petition as moved the hearts of all present and brought a blessing to some whose souls had long been unstirred within them.

After the prayer the Little President called for "remarks" and the Evangelistic Superintendent was the first to speak.

"I have been grieving in secret for some time," she said. "Our gospel service is not well attended and those who do come are Christians. We are not gaining the audience of sinners who need our help. Our reading-room has very few patrons. If our Emphatic sister will tell me how to do it effectually, I'll strike."

The Sunday-school Superintendent had her word to add.

"I would put my plea beside that of our Emphatic Member. She has been telling me how the mothers' meetings have dwindled and my arms are outstretched in vain for the little ones of my flock. The mothers are asleep and the children are wayward. The children of to-day are the men and women of to-morrow. Oh, if we might but turn their steps away from that red door!"

"Amen," fervently responded the leader of the L. T. L., all her merry dimples vanishing before the gravity of the situation. "The others have spoken for me and whatever your movement is I am with you to make straight, safe paths for the feet of the little ones."

Then the Crank of them all spoke: "There are one hundred members in our union; ten take The Union Signal. No wonder the union is dying! No wonder there are ninety women not interested enough to come here to-day. I have talked and worked, I have written letters, I have made personal appeals,—but I cannot sell a leaflet at any price. The women will accept them as gifts, however, and for the sake of the cause I have bought and donated leaflets for distribution, until my poor purse is suffering from a prolonged attack of in-nutrition. Oh, yes, I'll strike!"

"Madam President!" (It was the Alert Treasurer who took up the strain.) "That Crank need not say one word more. Here are dues not paid, rent behind, hymn-books worn out, people needing help, and no money. I tell you, when money stops, it is a sign of serious illness in the body politic. I'll either strike or resign—so there!"

"What has our Wide-Awake Secretary to say?" quoth the Little President whose face was growing more earnest and who seemed to have grown taller as her righteous indignation waxed warm under these added testimonies.

"Last night I read over the minutes of the year, Madam President, and there are just nine people in the Happyville W. C. T. U. who are doing any work to speak of—ten, counting the speaker—and they are all here to-day; seven officers and our two Blessed Ones. I was thinking when the Emphatic Member made her original motion to strike, how we are missing the true spirit and mission of the W. C. T. U. Superintendents are not to be slaves but directors; they are to outline the work that the rank and file may take it up systematically, intelligently and forcefully. It is as though all the members of a family are idle while the mother and father work. I'll strike if we can hit something and hit to some purpose."

"And now we will hear from our Little Old Lady," said the President giving her hand to the white-haired saint who slowly and painfully arose from her seat and leaned upon the stronger arm that was honored by its burden.

"Children," and the sweet old voice trembled, "I don't know much about strikes; usually they mean lawlessness and terror. I have been a white-ribboner for twenty years; I had grandchildren in heaven before the crusade fires were lighted; I have watched unions rise and unions fall; children, do you pray enough? This old heart is not strong enough to work now and it is learning the secret of persistent prayer. So you want to strike? Well, dear ones, you have done bravely so far, and now if you strike, strike in the name of the Lord and may your blows be heaven-directed!"

They had all spoken but the Silent Member. Her face was aglow with deep feeling. At a nod from the Little President she sprang to her feet and wrote rapidly on a blackboard at hand: "When you strike I'll play the march to victory. My tongue is speechless but God can speak through my violin. It and its mistress are sacred to the cause. Count me in!"

Then the Little President said: "You seem united in a determination to do something. I am in sympathy with you all. We are banded together against the drink traffic and we must make it feel our power. I will not say more now. The motion is still before the house. All who wish to consider ways and means of striking in the name of the Lord, may meet here one week from to-day. In the meantime—pray!"

When Happyville woke up two weeks later and was on its way to town, it read with considerable mystification, the following placard which hung in the window of the room used as Headquarters by the Happyville W. C. T. U.:

We Have Struck.
Watch the Papers.

Now it happened that the Little President and her corps of officers were women held in high regard by all who knew them, hence, though so weakly upheld, the union was in fairly good favor in the community. Thus it was that when Happyville sat down to read its evening paper, a paragraph headed "The W. C. T. U. Has Struck," met with careful reading. It was as follows:

At the last meeting of the year, held at the headquarters of the Happyville Woman's Christian Temperance Union, it was moved, seconded and unanimously carried that the union "go out on a strike." All members not "in sympathy" will be strictly boycotted. Any citizen of Happyville wishing further information will receive the same by calling on any one of the undersigned between the hours of seven and nine any evening this week.

Following this remarkable statement was the name and address of each one present at the meeting which had resulted so uniquely.

Happyville went out calling. Some straightway visited the Little President, some sought out the Wide-Awake Secretary; a few daring ones ventured to interview the Alert Treasurer (leaving their pocketbooks discreetly at home). Many who were proof against her appeals for subscribers to The Union Signal visited the Crank of them all. Each one had a large number of callers, even the Silent Member and the Little Old Lady.

"What's all this about a W. C. T. U. strike?" asked one business man of another as they walked to town together. But his neighbor was singularly reticent. "Better call on some member of the committee on strikes, hadn't you? That's the way I did. Mustn't get knowledge too cheap nowadays."

"Those temperance people are silly cranks," said a society girl who was breaking her mother's heart. "Believe I'll call on one of them and sharpen up my weapons of satire and repartee. Which shall I 'tackle'? I guess that Little Old Lady is harmless. The others are always so vulgarly in earnest, but she looks mild. I'll entrance her with my new fall bonnet, and have some fun."

And so on. We cannot take time here and now to tell you how these various callers were received, but call your attention to the third act of the drama.

A new placard in the union's headquarters read thus:

Strikers Meet Universal Sympathy.
Mass Meeting at Baker's Hall.
Watch the Papers.

Happyville was awake now. According to records kept by the ten original strikers, over one hundred and fifty calls had been received, aside from those of the delinquent ninety, who had, of course, made all haste to become informed concerning these strange proceedings. The two hundred and forty callers did some talking in their respective circles, and on the evening of the mass-meeting Baker's Hall was full.

AMERICAN OBSERVATIONS.

BY LADY HENRY SOMERSET.

Having now invested more than a year in the study of American institutions under conditions exceptionally favorable, I venture to give some of the results of those studies, not to the general public, but to my own sister workers. And first of all I wish to put on record my deep sense of the uniform consideration shown me by the American press. With the exception of those journals which are in close touch with the liquor traffic, I have been accorded a leniency of judgment and a cordiality and warmth of appreciation that I rejoice to take rather as an indication of the good-will cherished by all good people toward my own beloved country, than for any personal reason. It is my deliberate opinion that the people of the home, school and church in the United States—and that means the true nobility of the nation—are at one with the same classes here in the common struggle against those combinations in custom, politics and law, which if they do not absolutely seek to destroy, still inevitably involve the downfall of the church and school and home.

Quite distinct from these forces of light are the multi-millionaires whose corrupt greed has concentrated countless streams of gold in the safe reservoir made and provided by them to receive this visible outcome of the toil and sweat that should have rendered myriads of homes secure, but which, manipulated by untrusty "Trusts" has enriched a few families "beyond the dreams of avarice." The fathers or grandfathers of these were trappers, oyster dredgers or small traders; and in some cases their wives were laundresses, or maids-of-all-work. This I do not mention as in anywise discreditable, for all these occupations were honorable—far more so it seems to me than "watering railway stock," "hypothecating futures" and "squeezing" stock owners, all of which methods have helped to swell the fabulous incomes of this mushroom aristocracy.

It is in this curious stratum of American life that the disease of Anglomania has reached its height; a species of degeneracy which makes them ashamed rather than proud of their own country, desirous of living abroad, and anxious to marry their daughters to titled foreigners. They seem to be without the intellectual acumen to perceive that the finest flavor of character and the most attractive personality, results from seeming to be what one really is—if an American, then clearly so in look, speech, manner, opinion and purpose. These plutocrats, whose existence and mode of life are a reproach if not a danger to the public, employ their wealth to conceal these national characteristics, which in our country render them specially attractive, and strive to make of themselves a pinch-beck imitation of the so-called "smart set" in England. But I must do the American people and press the justice to say that while the newspapers report the goings and comings of the "newly rich," as the "Court Circular" of the London morning papers reports the movements of the royal family, this is done in no spirit of esteem or good-will, but ridicule is the basis of public opinion concerning them, and nothing is more sure than that the Americans will "turn and overturn" until this fungus growth on the banyan tree of their liberties shall be destroyed. For they perceive as plainly as we do, that if they do not kill out this parasitic growth, it will surely kill them.

The comfort of the average American home is far superior to that of the average home with us. "English comfort" has passed into a tradition, but we do not know the name compared with what is common to the lives of our friends over the water. The equable heating and lighting of their houses, with hot and cold water distributed wherever it will diminish work or add to the general convenience, forms in itself a broad line of demarcation between English and American houses among families of moderate means. Steam furnaces, electric light, well appointed bath rooms and abundant tables, characterize the best houses, I do not mean of millionaires, but of the comfortably well-to-do in cities, and to a large extent those of the lower as well as the upper middle classes, while the homes of the working people are, as a rule, provided with every comfort. The average intelligence of the Americans is far beyond that of any other nation with which I am conversant, and education among women has become diffused to a degree that is, I feel sure, unknown in any other country. It seems to me sometimes as if parents carried their determination that their daughters should have the best advantages of school and college further than they ought in justice to themselves. To be comfortably-off at home, to have some spare cash for travel—they are great travelers over yonder—to lay by in store, not against a rainy day only but a rainy future, to start the sons and daughters well in life, to help along the public institutions of the town in which they live, its library and reading-room, its schools, streets, parks, and above all its churches, is the fixed purpose of the average American; and as one goes farther west the public spirit and generosity of the people is one of the most hopeful tokens that has ever cheered me on my way as a worker for the good cause.

But this bright picture has its shadows deeply worked in, and they fall in heaviest masses around the brewery, distillery and dramshop. With us the vice of drink is far more deeply seated than with them, but the vice of the saloon itself has them strongly in its grip. As the center of political corruption the American liquor system is the successor to Pandora's box. Municipal politics are moulded and fashioned in the alcoholized atmosphere of the saloon. There the "slate" is made out by the political boss, who is kept in power by the solidarity, and still more by the unlimited cash of those who make and deal out intoxicating liquors, so that it comes about that when reputable men assemble in good faith in the caucus to nominate those candidates to whom are to be especially entrusted the public interests of the community, they find that the machinery of politics is already in motion, the ticket has been determined, the local press subsidized, and the reputable portion of the community "comes up smiling" on election day, and votes its party ticket. Between the nether millstone of the liquor traffic, the upper millstone of the growing concentration of wealth in a few hands, and the growing poverty of the mass in large cities, American institutions are being put under a pressure such as has never been known in human history. But it must be noted carefully that the public houses are mostly kept and the slums inhabited by foreigners, and that corrupt voters are also largely both ignorant and foreign. For my part I believe that, notwithstanding these terrible conditions, a democratic form of government is the fittest and will survive. My whole heart is with those brave men in America who are guiding the new politics that put principle before party, and those heroic women of the white ribbon who have formed in ten thousand localities the nucleus of a better public order in which the home shall be regnant, and through which the dramshop shall be overthrown.

ECONOMIC COMPETITION AND CHRISTIANITY.

BY REV. W. HOWATT GARDNER.

It is said that "competition is the life of trade," but in these latter days it is seen to be the death of trade. Warfare means death, and competition in the sphere of industry is a mode of warfare. War, in which men find justification for blowing out one another's brains over a question of material gain, is man's brute inheritance, and competition is the extension of this unchristian principle within the lines of industry. As rapine under the feudal system was considered in no wise inconsistent with honesty and personal worth, so the present competitive system, which encourages rapine of a more refined sort, is believed by many to be not inconsistent with moral integrity and Christian duty. That which in the lower animal forms of life is called "brute cunning," is expressed in the relations sustained by mankind by such terms as "business shrewdness" and "diplomacy."

Before venturing farther let us have some authentic definition of economic competition. For such a definition we quote from one high in authority, whose textbook is used in many colleges and academies: "Competition signifies the unrestrained operation of individual self-interest among the buyers and the sellers of any article in any market. It implies that each man is acting for himself solely, by himself solely, in exchange, to get the most he can from others, and to give the least he must himself." Is not all this strangely opposed to the words of a certain Teacher, whose name is exalted in all the churches? "The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister." Christ came not to get, but to give; not to extort, but to serve; not for "himself solely," but for all others.

But hear further the teacher of economics: "In competition every man is supposed to be active and alert to slip in ahead of every other man and sell his own product first, and sell it at a higher price, if possible . . . . Competition is opposed to sentiment, in exchange. When ever any economical agent does, or forbears anything under the influence of any sentiment other than the desire of giving the least and gaining the most he can in exchange, be that sentiment patriotism, or gratitude, or charity, or vanity, leading him to do otherwise than self-interest would prompt, in that case the rule of competition is departed from; another rule is for the time substituted. Such is competition in the economical sense."

In further declaring that man's passion for wealth must not be interfered with, our author says: "Of every other human passion or motive, political economy makes entire abstraction. Love of country, love of honor, love of friends, love of learning, love of art; pity, honor, shame, religion, charity, will never, so far as political economy cares to take account, withstand in the slightest degree, or for the shortest time, the effort of the economic man to amass wealth." Here we have economic competition as emphasized selfishness. It has its foundation in pure naturalism; the economic man is presented as a grasping, cunning, treacherous creature, an extension of all that which pertains to the animal nature. All those qualities of human action and relationship which mark man as human seem discarded. The doctrine is biologically deduced, while rational and ethical elements are allowed little weight.

Christ came discovering man as "little lower than the angels," in the image of God. Our old economic system declares man to be a more highly formed animal, having an insatiable greed for gold rather than an intense desire for God.

Many use the term "economic competition" as though it were synonymous with "rivalry" or "emulation." The terms are not identical. A college oratorical contest or the competitive examinations offered by many academies, involves rivalry or a strife for the same object in which the success of each contestant is made dependent upon his superior ability, and the reward is not won because he has effectively placed obstacles in the way of his opponent. Competition in this sense is not what is understood by economic competition. This latter competition urges men in all their getting to get not "wisdom," but to get wealth, and is not concerned about how the wealth is gained. It will allow any scheme or trick that may be successfully employed by one in order to exploit another.

It is clear that economic teaching should not discard moral considerations. To an industrial arrangement that sanctifies warfare, that exalts selfishness, that rewards dishonesty, Christianity also has something to say. Every minister of the Gospel cannot fail to recognize the antipathy of economic competition to Christian thought and life. As far back as 1832 Thomas Chalmers had noticed that it was a mistake to divorce economics from morality. In his lectures to students of theology at Edinburg, he undertook to vitalize political economy with moral philosophy. To-day the historico-ethical school in economics, a welcome ally to the church, and a part of the onward movement of Christianity, is seeking to discover the laws of economic progress, and to show men how to use them rightly and rationally. It seeks to guide these forces that have to do with the production and distribution of economic goods so that the higher ends, instead of the lower, of humanity may be subserved to the largest degree possible. The strictest ethical principles are to test all economic facts and institutions. Man is held to be more sacred than anything that man may possess of material goods.

Here is certainly a widening field for study on the part of ministers of the gospel. The servant of the Lord is committed to an uncompromising opposition to selfishness in every form, whether exhibited as an individual proclivity, or as an organic part of the social body. Ought there to be one code of morals, or no code, for business, and an entirely different one for Christianity? Christianity has much to do with the thought and conduct of men in this life as well as the life to come. May it not be as great service to instruct men how to live well as how to die well? May we not hope then that the kingdoms of this world will more speedily become the kingdom of the Lord and of His Christ? Economic competition and Christ are in irreconcilable conflict. Can we preach both?

AGE OF CONSENT LEGISLATION IN 1895.

BY MARY WOOD-ALLEN, M. D.

Some time since I received a tabulated statement of age of consent laws from The Union Signal, asking me to indicate upon it the changes made by legal enactment during 1895. I at once requested my most efficient coadjutor, Mrs. Dora Webb, of Kent, O., who serves us faithfully as general secretary of the reform and legislative sections of the purity department, to obtain the desired information from reliable sources. A letter just received from her says: "I make the changes in the tabulated statement according to reports sent me by state superintendents. Possibly some may be in error, but in nearly every case reported a copy of the law has been sent. The superintendent of Nevada at first reported the age at sixteen, but the copy of the law shows that fourteen is the age passed in 1889. The Kentucky law reads: 'Whoever above fourteen unlawfully knows a girl under fourteen can be imprisoned one or two years, or fined five hundred dollars, or both.' With quibbling lawyers I doubt if this would amount to anything."

Lord Hale defines rape to be the "carnal knowledge of any woman above the age of ten years against her will, and of a woman-child under the age of ten years with or against her will." This is common law of England. It is doubtless from this legal definition that the term "age of consent" has arisen. The tabulated statement gives the age in Georgia as fourteen, but Mrs. Webb received from the state superintendent the statement of a lawyer, which says: "There is no statute in Georgia fixing the age prior to which a girl is regarded as incapable of consenting to carnal intercourse in charges of rape, but the common law is followed by our courts, and presumes force prior to the age of ten years. This presumption cannot be rebutted. After the age of ten years the question of consent or force is a matter for the decision of the jury." The common law is the decision of Hale above quoted.

It will be seen that great pains have been taken to obtain authoritative information in regard to this vexing problem. In all probability inaccuracies will be found, but the Philanthropist did not receive absolutely accurate information from all state secretaries, so perhaps we may be pardoned if we have failed in some cases to be entirely accurate. We earnestly request that those who find this statement of legislation at fault will indicate in what respect, giving the correction and the source of their information. I most earnestly desire to have a complete statement to present to the National Convention in my report, which the authorities say must be in their hands by September 15. So all of you who can aid in this matter, please do so very promptly.

WILLARD HALL NOONTIDE LINKS.

Across the twilight hills of faith the day dawns, and on its crest, with more than royal state, the "new woman" comes to her own.

Once more the old song of "Peace on earth, good will to men," rings clear, while principalities and powers throng, incense ladened, to pay tribute at her feet.

All this I seemed to see and hear, while Sophie F. Grubb told us of her years of loving toil for the foreigner on our shores, and all the time my heart was saying, Oh, little woman, great is your faith and souls be for your hire.

. . . . . .

She was from Kansas and at last stood in Willard Hall. It was the Mecca of her journey and her heart was full. She said, "I'll never stand in this blessed place again. No one knows how I've worked to get here. But I've seen it, have had the pleasure of speaking for Jesus in it, and am satisfied."

Straightway before me rose the brave, resolute face of her who built it, and I fancied

The lines would smoother grow,
Could she but know.

. . . . . .

Every eye was on him, for from the crown of his shapely head to the tip of his gloved hand he looked the princely fellow that he was.

"In passing this building I heard your songs and came in to join with you in praise to my mother's God."

A spotless card bore this inscription: "Frederic F. Tonny, Major of Ordnance, Texas volunteer guard."

. . . . . .

Then came Helen M. Gougar, she of ready speech and keen logic, and drove the nail of truth home in a way that made men wince; but the amens came thick when she said, "Stand by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Stand by the women back of this building. Stand by your leader."

. . . . . .

And so the days come and go. I scarce know which is best, but sometimes in my dreams the place is thronged, at noon, at eventime, and on the Sabbath day, and many souls are saved.

The vision waits a little, but is yet to be.

THE CATHOLIC TOTAL ABSTINENCE UNION.

Dear Union Signal:—The twenty-fifth annual convention of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union, which has just been held in this city, will be a memorable event in the history of this organization of temperance workers. It is generally conceded that this national gathering of Catholic advocates of total abstinence was the most successful in numbers, the best attended by dignitaries of the church, and by far the most aggressive in spirit of all the twenty-five annual conventions that the union has held. Father Cleary in an interview after the adjournment of the convention said: "Our jubilee convention has been the largest, the most gratifying and successful in our history. Every session showed evidence of growing aggressiveness and determination. We shall go home to work early and late to increase the membership of the union to one hundred thousand before our next annual meeting."

The most dramatic event of the convention occurred at the mass-meeting on the first evening when Senator Sullivan, generally a welcome speaker to Catholics, was vigorously hissed for advocating a Sunday saloon law and President Roosevelt was enthusiastically cheered for spiritedly replying to him. I think every white-ribboner would have enjoyed the spectacle. It created an immense sensation and went a long way in convincing the popular mind of the absolute sincerity and earnestness of the Catholic union.

Another striking incident was the vigorous speech of Father Cleary, of Minnesota, and the thunderous applause that greeted such aggressive sentiments as these: "Incalculable injury has been done to the Catholic church by the linking of Catholic names with the nefarious business of spreading intemperance. The selling of liquor and the drinking of it desecrates the American Sunday. We are not to be ruled by the customs of other lands. The American is able to define his own Sabbath and conduct his own country. The saloon is the foulest enemy of our church and our country, and is a great and insurmountable barrier which stops the poor man from securing happiness and plenty. Destitution and want are the result of the profligate patronage of the liquor seller's trade. A man cannot be a good Catholic and continue in the unbecoming business of a liquor saloon."

The report of Secretary Doyle showed that there are now eight hundred and sixty-four societies with an aggregate membership of 65,894. During the year one hundred seventy-nine societies were admitted and eighteen withdrawn. The gain in membership has been over 10,000. There are now five hundred and sixty-five societies of men, with a membership of 32,340; one hundred and six societies of women, with a membership of 6,794; and one hundred and ninety-three societies of cadets, with 15,443 members.

The resolutions adopted were as follows:

Whereas, The Catholic Church in the United States is doing everything in its power to lessen the evils of intemperance, and

Whereas, She has through her bishops in Plenary Council assembled approved and heartily commended the laudable practice of total abstinence, and

Whereas, To avoid all cavilling from any source, the holy father commended the prelates of the United States for their action on the question of temperance; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America in its twenty-fifth general convention assembled in New York, reiterates its loyal obedience to the church, and renews its allegiance to the holy cause of total abstinence.

Resolved, That the advice given by the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore urging Catholics to get out and keep out of the saloon business is again reiterated by this convention.

Resolved, That we give the weight of our influence to every legitimate movement that tends to abolish the sale of intoxicants on the Lord's Day, and we urge the complete closing of saloons on Sunday, and on Saturday night at as early an hour as possible.

Resolved, That we urge everywhere by votes and influence the enactment of such laws as the "screen law," the "single entrance law," and all laws which may in any way help toward the strict enforcement of the present excise laws.

Whereas, There is one platform upon which all Americans can stand irrespective of religious belief, namely, the platform of temperance, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we so co-operate with our non-Catholic fellow-citizens in every legitimate effort to restrict the evils of intemperance.

Resolved, That we are pleased to notice the absence of intoxicants at many of the banquets given by Catholics, and we respectfully request Catholic societies to discontinue the use of liquors at their entertainments.

Resolved, That we respectfully require Catholic journals to aid our cause by refusing to publish liquor advertisements.

Resolved, That we urge the formation of total abstinence societies among women, girls and boys, and we urge our male societies to give them every encouragement in their power.

A comparison of these resolutions with those of former years will show the steady advance the temperance cause is making among the members of the Catholic Church. One encouraging feature of this convention was that the spirit was far in advance of the resolutions.

This jubilee convention will certainly greatly encourage temperance workers both inside and outside of the Catholic Church.

SOUTHERN SCHOOL OF METHODS.

Dear Union Signal:—The 2d of July the W. C. T. U. school of methods in connection with the Kentucky Chautauqua opened with Mrs. Susan S. Fessenden as our helper. There was an average attendance of one hundred, the work was well received, all being deeply interested. One feature of the school was a parliamentary drill, and so happy was Mrs. Fessenden in this line that the woman's club of Central Kentucky petitioned us to hold an extra session which Mrs. Fessenden cheerfully consented to do, conducting a second and most successful drill.

Each year we feel to be the best and wonder that any state fails to hold a school of methods. We are sure that a Chautauqua assembly is deprived of a very important department of instruction that omits this feature of our work.

I went from Kentucky to the Alabama Chautauqua assembly at Taladega. Not a great many of our women were present, as it was a new feature of a new assembly, but Rev. Mr. West, the superintendent of the Alabama assembly, is a grand and aggressive man, who proposes to stand by the W. C. T. U. We had one hour each day for a week and made friends for the cause.

I think the Alabama W. C. T. U. is sure of a place on next year's program, if they rally to the support of the assembly management. From Alabama I went direct to Crystal Springs, Miss., for a day's work at the Mississippi Chautauqua. Here I found more of our workers present, though both the president and secretary were detained by sickness in their families. We secured twenty names of young women, and organized a Y. W. C. T. U.; also organized the school of methods, nominating a superintendent and secretary. We also made arrangements to hold a school next year of one hour a day for ten days, which to my mind is the ideal plan. There are many fine women in Mississippi who show the true spirit of the W. C. T. U. The southern work is in a very good shape.

Any numerical comparison between the South and the more densely settled portions of our country is extremely unfair to the former, for the very manifest reason that the people are not there to organize. The state of Florida, for instance, has not the population of the North Side of Chicago. It appears to me that it would require no greater zeal, and less enthusiasm, to add one thousand to the members of a state that has five hundred local unions than would be required to add one hundred in a state with only fifty local unions.

From Crystal Springs I went direct to Mountain Lake Park, Md. Here I had the blessed privilege of assisting our tried and true Vice-President Stevens, and our faithful Corresponding Secretary Stevenson in the National school of methods, held on the Mountain Lake Park grounds at the request of the Assembly management. From Mountain Lake Park I went to Washington, D. C., to visit Mrs. La Fetra, where with my husband I spent a week most profitably and pleasantly. The Y's of Washington thoughtfully gave a reception at which we were the honored guests. From Washington we came to Ocean Grove for a few weeks needed rest. We are charmed to see the faithfulness with which our New Jersey women wear the white ribbon badge. We see scores of these silent testimonies.

MADAME ANTOINETTE STERLING.

Editor Union Signal:—In the issue of August 1, I find an exceedingly interesting sketch by Miss Willard, of Madame Antoinette Sterling, that brings to my mind pleasant reminiscences of the beginning of her musical career. These may, perhaps, interest some of your readers. At all events they will assure her, should they fall under her eye, that some of the friends of her early days, whose very names she has probably forgotten, have ever since followed her brilliant career with deep interest.

In the summer of 1861 I attended a normal music school, in Geneseo, N. Y. Just after the opening of the school came the battle of Bull Run, by which the North were so terribly depressed and the South so unduly elated. Just a few days after, about the second week of the school (in which were included P. P. Bliss and wife), there appeared one day a new scholar, a tall young lady, who took her place among the altos. She soon attracted the interested attention of the entire school by her magnificent, though uncultivated contralto voice and, as well, by her simple, unassuming manners.

As our boarding places were near together I became tolerably well acquainted with Miss Antoinette Sterling and, therefore, watched her musical development with deepest interest. It is certainly a tribute to her native nobility of character that though this young lady very soon reached the highest estimation as a coming vocalist among such musicians as the teachers, and such pupils as Bliss, McGrannahan, Towner, Palmer, etc., so far as I know there was never any feeling of jealousy toward her.

At the close of the school, after several concerts, in each of which this young lady had been increasingly successful, Rossini's "Stabat Mater" was given for two nights in succession, under the direction of Mr. Bassini. Here, for the first time, the new musical star clearly blazed forth. Although she had sung before in concert, and frequently by request before the class, the selections had been comparatively simple and unimportant, as Bassini had been holding her back as much as possible for the great occasion. So magnificent was her success that she carried off the chief laurels of the occasion.

It has never been my privilege to meet Antoinette Sterling since that time, but I have followed her career with deep interest. I am not surprised that she should have developed into a W. C. T. U. worker, for even at that early day she was deeply and earnestly pondering some of the problems concerning the present and the future about which we had some pleasant conversations.

OWNER OF HAINES FALLS PROMOTED.

To The Union Signal:—I have just returned from the burial in the village churchyard of a staunch supporter of temperance work, Mr. Chas. W. Haines, the owner of Haines Falls. He dropped dead in his barn on Friday, July 26, at noon. He was in good health and occupied about his farm and hotel up to the moment when God called him. He was in his sixty-eighth year.

Forty-three years he had walked with God. Rugged in character as these mountains where he was born and reared, he impressed his personality on all about him. He was a Methodist in religion, and Prohibitionist in politics, often voting his ticket alone at town elections. It was his great pleasure one day last summer to invite the two distinguished leaders of the W. C. T. U., who were then staying here, to visit the Falls while he turned on the water for their enjoyment. This was, to his mind, the greatest compliment he could pay them. All over the Union are people, who in the last thirty years have paid him for the privilege of the same sight, and who will learn with regret that the bluff but kindly old farmer is gone from earth.

Mr. Haines was an active supporter of the Methodist Hospital in Brooklyn, and often raised money for it as well among the guests at his hotel. This cottage colony of Twilight Park, which has the honor to count Miss Willard as a cottager, is built on a section of the mountain side bought of Mr. Haines in 1887, and it is due to his strong total abstinence views that every conveyance of property includes a provision to prevent the sale of liquor in the park.

THE SHAM BULL FIGHTS AT ATLANTA.

Dear Union Signal:—Most of your readers will have seen the newspaper comments on the proposed daily exhibition in the Mexican Village at the Atlanta Exposition of representations of bull fights as given in Spain. The Atlanta Constitution announces that the object is to portray the Mexican and Spanish sports in a realistic manner; that as perfect a picture as possible of the real thing will be given, and that the details will be such that when the spectator leaves the scene he will have a correct idea of the manner in which the real fights are conducted; but as the horns of the bull are to be padded, and no blood will be shed, the Constitution considers that the views of those who object to this form of diversion are extreme.

On the other hand, an excellent editorial, which appeared in the Boston Herald of July 9, shows what some of the objections are, and says: "The bull fight as it is conducted in Spain is a reproach to modern civilization, and a relic of that barbarism which preceded the Christian era." It is a realistic representation of this which the Exposition authorities contemplate presenting as an attraction on American soil. It remains to be seen whether or not American citizens will tolerate it. It could not fail to be demoralizing and degrading in its effect. If the excitement is such that the spectacle pleases a certain class, their moral natures will by just so much be debased and prepared for indifference to real suffering.

Beside this, there is the fright and apprehension of the poor animals, more especially the horses. They cannot know that they are not actually to be gored to death (as in the real fights), nor can we be assured that those engaged in the work will be tender-hearted enough to really avoid the infliction of suffering.

For these and other reasons which will present themselves, our good women who are interested in the prevention of all that is cruel and demoralizing, are urged to speedily let their sentiments be known. Letters should at once be written to President Collier and to other exposition authorities, urging tersely but forcibly the unwisdom of even depicting a reality of which the features are so disgusting, so cruel and so demoralizing.

FROM A MEMBER AT LARGE.

Dear Union Signal:—Far away am I from my home state of Iowa, but I can never forget I am in the great host of women who are publishing the word given of God to us to bless mankind with, and everywhere W. C. T. U. vows are upon me. Since I came to Montreal, Canada, I have attended and spoken at all the closing meetings of the various city and suburban W. C. T. U's, on our various lines of gospel work, and find our Canadian sisters thoroughly alive and active. They support various coffee rooms; there is a woman's exchange in connection with the central one, where Miss Barber is a host in herself. Then there is Miss Dougall, daughter of the grand Prohibitionist, John Dougall, who was first editor of Montreal and afterwards of the New York Witness, whose pages ever bear the true ring, and now our Geo. Scott seems to have caught up the falling mantle of the venerated John Dougall, who so entirely spent all for Christ and gave of himself to the uttermost limit of his being. Truly "his works do follow him."

At the closing meetings for the hot summer time, each union provided a simple five o'clock tea, that enhanced our sociability, and the unions are to regather in September or October for a winter's campaign. As I have met different ways of working I find one can learn something by going outside of home and mingling with our neighbors, and these Canadian sisters of ours are a lot of grand, practical women, and our common interests and Christian love know no dividing line. But The Union Signal is not taken nor read as it should be. Sisters, when we remember the liquor traffic boasts of the church being "its right wing of power" we should bestir ourselves and find money to scatter such telling words of truth. If we cannot control our husband's means we can tithe that which comes under our own responsibility and so have God's tenth to use for Him in spreading gospel words that may reach some tempted one and save them from the utter ruin of soul as well as body. It looks as though it might be my lot to be yet longer a "member-at-large," as I expect to spend the winter in mission work in Mexico.

WOMEN IN OBERLIN COLLEGE.

Dear Union Signal:—Your issue of August 1st is in error in stating, under "Signal Notes," that it has been but twenty-five years since Oberlin College opened its doors to women. It is nearly forty years since Emily Huntington Miller graduated there, and nearly fifty since Lucy Stone's class of 1847. In the late Quinquennial Catalogue, I note that the second class that went from Oberlin, in 1838, had one lady graduate, the next six; till the total has placed woman in the ascendency, 1,334 to 1,277 men. This is the statement for the college proper, while in the classical course there have been but 277 women to 1,104 men; though, including theological, conservatory and honorary, the totals are more nearly alike, women 1,415 and men 1,684. Dear Co-Workers:—There is a little pile of letters and postal cards beside me, all bearing on one theme, namely,—Root beer; is it a drink for temperance people, or not?

There has been much division of thought about this summer drink that pleases so many palates, is advertised by so many "safe" journals, and prepared in quantities in so many temperance families. The very fact that there has been a question regarding the beverage has been sufficient to cause many W. C. T. U. women quietly to omit the article from their home menus, but there are now urgent requests for a definite statement regarding it.

Miss Lodie E. Reed, our National press superintendent, has devoted one issue of the National W. C. T. U. Bulletin to "the root beer fraud," and we are glad to quote extracts therefrom, which we fully indorse:

"The pledge of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is against the use of and traffic in 'all distilled, fermented and malt liquors.' The chemist has taught us that the fermentation of sugar, yeast and water produces alcohol. In the manufacture of root beer there is the fermentation of these substances, flavored with the herb extracts; there must, therefore, be alcohol in it, varying in quantity according to the length of time it stands before using. Analyses of the drink by unprejudiced and well-qualified and equipped analysts have shown that the proportion is often larger than in malt beers, which no religious or literary periodical would in these days of temperance enlightenment think of advertising. But the small per cent of alcohol, which not even the manufacturers of the extracts deny is produced in brewing it, makes it a most insidious foe of temperance, kindling and fanning by imperceptible degrees the alcoholic appetite."

A ROOT BEER RECIPE.

"The ingredients are: Sugar, warm water, yeast and the bottled extract. 'Bottle the mixture immediately in strong bottles or jugs, tying down the corks securely. Locate bottles in a warm place to start fermentation. In twenty-four hours it will be ready to drink but will effervesce more freely' if allowed to stand three or four days, etc.

"This is simply a recipe for making alcohol, and all temperance people ought to recognize it as such. All alcohol is made by the decay or fermentation of the sugar in a sweet liquid. Every such liquid (unless put up hot in air tight cans), fermenting in ordinary temperature, inevitably makes alcohol, whether said liquid is the fruit juice with which the ambitious housewife makes her home-made wine, or what the careless one finds in her spoiled jar of canned fruit. In the last there is little danger of tempting the appetite; but temperance people should know better than to be humbugged into making, using and recommending the very article they are so busily fighting."

TESTIMONY OF A PUBLIC ANALYST.

"The Son of Temperance, November, 1894, contains an article by Dr. James Edmunds, M. R. C. P., medical officer of health, public analyst for St. James, and consulting physician for the London Temperance Hospital, in which he gives some investigations concerning 'temperance drinks.'

"In the reports to Parliament of the Inland Revenue Board, he quotes the following from Dr. Bell, the principal analyst of the Excise Laboratory at Somerset House:

"'Report for 1885–6. Of four hundred and twenty-five botanic beers (root beers) and other temperance beverages which were analyzed, more than half contained over the legal two per cent of proof spirit, the range extending from a mere trace up to twenty-five per cent. In nineteen of the cases the samples, although represented as non-intoxicating, contained as much spirit as ordinary ale and porter or more. It was stated on the label of a professedly non-alcoholic beverage that total abstainers who consumed it were both pleased and surprised at its comforting and exhilarating effects; and as it contained twenty-three per cent of proof spirit, the reason was obvious.'

"The reports in succeeding years up to 1891 are similar, showing in an average of about half the samples examined, alcohol in quantities ranging from 3 to 13.7 per cent."

It has been almost pitiful to hear the anxious queries of good people regarding root beer. One would think we had been suffering all these centuries for some thirst-quenching liquor and this was a happy solution of a much vexed problem. With water and milk, tea, coffee and cocoa, lemonade and other fruit beverages, the healthful phosphates and sodas, who need run the risk of patronizing a drink that has the smallest per cent of alcohol in it? Truly, the desires of the flesh are dominant and clamor under such plausible guise we do not recognize the nature of the demand. But does not this very clamor indicate the presence of alcohol in the longed-for drink?

The issue of the National W. C. T. U. Bulletin for June 6, containing much more matter of interest on Root Beer than I have been able to quote, can be obtained of Miss Lodie E. Reed, 66½ N. Penn street, Indianapolis, Ind., at the rate of fifty cents per hundred copies.

Mother Experience.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

Abraham—Who against hope believed in hope, that he might become the father of many nations, according to that which was spoken, so shall thy seed be. He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief; but was strong in faith, giving glory to God.—Romans 4: 18, 20.

If we can trust God for the little things of life from day to day, why not honor Him by asking for larger things, the very things for which His son Christ Jesus died? Why should we limit His power? To do so is to say to Him, "We know you will hear and grant our small petitions, but the greater things we desire are beyond your power of bestowal." Put in words such thoughts seem like blasphemy, and yet, my sisters, every time we are fearful and doubtful of the success of a good cause, we malign the Omnipotent One. This is the reason our prayers go unanswered. They are a stench in His nostrils. Only souls filled with simple, undoubting, childlike trust can hold audience with the King of Kings. To such His scepter is graciously held forth, as He reassuringly says, "According to your faith be it unto you." One of the Temple prayer band has written how hurt she was the other day to hear a National organizer who is most friendly to the Temple say, much as she would like to see the Temple paid for she thought it was an impossibility to raise so much money. "Now," writes our friend with great truth, "this expression of a lack of faith in the success of the enterprise by our seemingly friendly allies, is much more harmful than the bitter opposition of our enemy." Will our lukewarm friends make a note of this and if they have no faith in God's promises will they kindly keep it to themselves?

"Our aim is to fill one thousand wheels," writes Miss H. M. Barnes, superintendent of Temple work for New Haven county, Connecticut, "besides raising as much money in other ways as possible. The inclosed draft for $100 is the first installment. You have the sympathy and prayers of the New Haven women. We shall not be satisfied until every union in the county is credited with $100 at least. The children will help. One little boy who had filled a Wheel told his friends about it, and the next day ten other boys called for Wheels; they all wanted to work for the premiums. Our National building must be paid for, and we are determined to do our part." Would that we had superintendents of Temple work in every county like Miss Barnes, and willing workers back of them like the New Haven county women. Then the Temple debt would melt as the hoar frost before the bright rays of the morning sun.

Before me lies a letter written in the trembling hand of age, but its words are strong and brave. It is from Merrillon, Wis., and signed Elizabeth Perry Irving. She writes: "I send stamps for one mite-box and four Temple Wheels. I think I can get them filled in a short time. I would be glad to help more, but my age is against me. I was eighty-seven years old last February. Maybe an old child can help as well as a little one." Another aged saint, Mrs. L. H. Hyslop, Nebraska City, writes: "I am glad to celebrate my seventy-third birthday by sending the contents of my mite-box ($5). On my seventieth birthday, I said to our dear Father I would like to send you the contents of two mite-boxes every year while I live, and by His help I have been able to do so thus far. If I live long I fully believe I shall see our beloved Temple free from debt." Another aged friend, Mrs. Mary M. Darbin, Texas, Ohio, in pledging some money closes by saying: "I shall remember you in my will; mark it in your memorandum book." The little ones are at work as well as the aged filling Wheels. The bright little six year old daughter of the secretary of the Quincy, Ill., W. C. T. U., Helen Worrell, filled two Wheels. In reply to a man who said, "You are too young for such work," she wittily answered, "Not in this cause."

The Hannibal, Mo., W. C. T. U. have completed their hundred dollar pledge by the payment through their treasurer, Mrs. A. L. Allen, of $12. Mrs. Alice M. Reynolds sends $30 from the Peekskill, N. Y., union on their pledge. This money was raised by a parlor social and mite-box collection. Fourteen dollars and fifty cents has been received from Mrs. M. L. Cookson, from the New Concord, Ohio, W. C. T. U. The money was raised by a mite-box social.

All orders for Temple Wheels, mite-boxes, and Baby Band lists, and everything pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, The Temple, Chicago. Send two-cent stamp for either the Temple Wheel or mite-box. Money orders and checks should be made out in the name of Mr. G. B. Shaw, treasurer, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, Room 1111, The Temple, Chicago.

THE MISSING STEP.

BY MARY M. CURRIER.

The steps are long and many that we take
As on from life to higher life we go;
But of them all the longest that I know,
And lowliest that for His glory's sake
The Lord doth teach a willing soul to make,
Are those which lead from love of self, the low,
To love of God, the high, when is not seen
A true, pure human heart to love between.
For as we mount from earthly regions fair,
To those more fair, more holy and more blest,
As one by one we lay aside each care
And fill with peace their places in the breast,
A step is wanting on the winding stair
Below the chamber of eternal rest.

AZALEA.

In Three Chapters.

BY FANNIE B. DAMON.

CHAPTER II.

When she awoke she was about as completely dazed as ever was cat in a strange garret; for Miss Hepwie had come out at the close of the meeting, unhitched Sarah Jane and driven off softly and slowly down the green common to the village street.

Azalea roused herself and, still lying on the bottom of the carriage, raised herself dizzily on her elbow and looked out; looked at the moon whiter and stranger; at the stars farther away and dimmer; at the elms and maples and apple trees, standing tall or reaching out bountifully and roundly; at the scattered houses and the hills and pastures unfamiliar; smelt the wild primrose, and heard the click of the horse's feet and the occasional sound of Miss Hepwie's pleasant voice and the easy slap of the reins.

Little by little Azalea grew distinctly and sensibly conscious of her whereabouts. Every sense was awake and alert, and on her mind every twig and twinkle and tone etched an enduring etching. Her heart thrilled with fear and excitement that was almost delight. Sarah Jane's pace quickened, turn by turn, and brought them up smartly at last through a broad, beautiful farmyard, and in through the open doorway of the carriage house.

Azalea crawled up into a heap and held her breath, while Miss Hepwie took the horse from the thills and led her out through an alley into the stall. Then she came back and pulled to and hasped the great doors and picked out the packages from the carriage, and stumbled along through the darkness with now and then the rattle of a latch till she was far out of hearing.

Cramped and nervous, Azalea let herself down out of the wagon and stole along after until she came to the light of a window which showed the door from the carriage house into the woodshed. It took her a long time to screw up her courage so as to open the door, the latch clattered so at her touch; but she did it at last and, shutting it carefully after her, thumbed her way along tiers of wood till she thought she was lost beyond hope of ever again finding daylight. She had the luck in groping about to fall over a step, and hastily she clutched at a latch and tumbled into a rough room with windows on both sides through which the clear evening light streamed unhindered.

A big black cat sprang out of a barrel and, arching his back affectionately, rubbed against Azalea's bare legs till she caught him up and hugged him to her frightened heart. Then she assaulted the next door. It was fast. She ferreted about the room among barrels and boxes, back again to the door, turning the knob softly and uselessly. There was a small window quite high in the wall, not far to the right of the door,—a foot square, perhaps, and covered with a white curtain. As Azalea tried to pull herself up to peer under the curtain, the cat clambered up on her shoulder and scrambled through and disappeared with a jump and a splash on the other side of the partition.

Not long after came the sound of hurrying feet and excited voices. The light of a lamp shone cheerfully out into the rough room as the door opened and Miss Hepwie in undress came out of the kitchen—but not before Azalea had hidden behind the barrels. The black cat, dripping and white-footed, skulked under the wash-bench.

"Cæsar, you miserable rake-about cat!" said Miss Hepwie severely, dragging him out by one fore-paw and deliberately cuffing his ears. "You know better. You know you've done a wicked, mischievous thing—to climb up like a thief and a robber and jump into a pan of milk in the middle of the night. You ought to be lynched, Cæsar Hepwie!"

She let him drop hazardously and stamped her foot at him. He retreated meekly in Azalea's direction, while his mistress, lamp in hand, went down the steps into the woodshed. Azalea seized the opportunity to scoot into the dark kitchen, into the darker sitting-room and under the sofa.

"I can't understand," called out a querulous voice from another room and evidently from bed, "I can't understand how that cat could get into that window without help. He never did it before and what's more we never had a cat in the house that ever did. That Larabee cat was always prowling round wherever she could get her nose in, but she never got up to that window. And Cæsar never has been a mischievous cat, never. I call it mysterious, Loretta."

"It's a queer freak for Cæsar to take, I admit, mother," said Miss Hepwie loudly, setting the lamp on the center table, "but he probably thought he heard a mouse in the wall and must get him alive or dead."

"But, Loretta! he couldn't have jumped up there alone."

"Oh, well, mother, when you come to that there's no telling what a cat like Cæsar can't do when he really sets his heart on it. I've examined all the doors and windows and found everything straight and safe. So pull down your eyelids and go to sleep."

"I'd leave the lamp burning, Loretta, 'pears to me."

Miss Hepwie laughed a little but answered only, "So I will, mother. Good-night."

A little after the clock had sounded with deep solemnity the hour of three, the querulous voice called out again:

"Loretta! I'm just as sure as I can be that somebody's in this house. Loretta, wake up, do!"

Loretta within an adjoining room turned in her bed and asked drowsily:

"What is it now, mother?"

"There's somebody here, I say!" cried the old lady imperiously. "Hear 'm! It's a snore—as near as anything."

"Oh, you've been dreaming, mother. Try to be quiet and go to sleep," answered Miss Hepwie with a cheerful yawn.

"Hark, I say, there it is again. Listen, Loretta!"

"I should like to know if that cat has found his way back or if this house is haunted," said Miss Hepwie hurriedly getting out of bed and coming into the sitting-room.

There on the sofa with her ragged tow-colored hair and her bare feet and legs painted on the black haircloth, lay the uninvited inmate of the house. Miss Hepwie's lips parted and closed without utterance, though astonishment stood out in every feature of her face. Then she smiled broadly.

"There's nothing to alarm you," she said, going into the old lady's room, "but there is somebody out in the sitting-room lying on the sofa. It's a little Bree girl, who lives down to the village. No, I don't know how she came here a bit better than you do, but she's sleeping very soundly, and doesn't look at all dangerous. I'll sit up the rest of the night, so go to sleep if you can. We'll ferret this thing out in the morning."

It was not at all a difficult matter to turn the night's mysterious maneuvers into a curious and mirth-moving tale, even in the ears of the old lady, when the fear-dispelling dear old sun had lighted up the whole house, awakened Azalea and unloosed her tongue.

"What do you s'pose your father and mother will say to this?" said Mother Hepwie, half admiringly. "Don't you s'pose they're feeling dreadfully cut up not to know where in the world you've been spirited away to?"

"They have so many children I don't imagine they make much account of missing one," said Miss Hepwie. "Anyway, the girl must have her breakfast and get spruced up a bit and look about the farm an hour or so, and then we'll drive down to the village."

With her hair trimmed and evened, her face glowing from a bath, and a clean napkin spread over the front of her untidy dress, Azalea sat at the breakfast table for the first time in her remembrance, the center of interest and the object of lavish attention. It was a novel and delightful experience to be asked if she would have a little more of this or a little more of that, even when "this" meant doughnuts and "that" meant custard pie. Under the exhilarating and expanding influence of the sweet summer morning, the pleasant faces, the clean, cozy kitchen, and especially the bountiful breakfast, Azalea unfolded her life till it showed itself a worm-eaten, pale, nipped sprig of existence, with poor prospect of ever blossoming into anything rich and fragrant.

She was so happy about the farm that it was ten o'clock before Miss Hepwie firmly made up her mind that the girl must go back to her mother, and as Sarah Jane was slow in her pace when going toward the village and the distance was nearly three miles, and there were some berries by the roadside which Azalea wanted to pick, it was eleven o'clock when they drove up to the door of the miserable house where the Brees lived. Miss Hepwie tied Sarah Jane to the corner of a tumble-down fence, and, stepping across the littered entry, knocked loudly on the inner door, which was open into the kitchen. A small woman with a baby in her arms came forward.

THE MINISTER'S PLEDGE.

BY J. S. HUGHES.

The work accomplished by the W. C. T. U. has been widened and varied until it reaches many fields of usefulness undreamed of when its noble leaders first arose from kneeling in front of the saloons of Hillsboro.

The current of the Crusade thought may not have deepened, for deeper it could not well go, but it has widened into new and practical channels of effectiveness, and become beneficence systematic and almost universal.

One of the most successful fields of work is scientific temperance instruction in public schools. Parallel with this line of work is another which I believe neither the W. C. T. U. nor other Christian bodies have yet promulgated—a work no less important than that just mentioned and to the neglect of which much hindrance to our cause must be credited.

The minister of the gospel is the highest teacher, and his school must be won for temperance and from all manner of complicity with the liquor traffic. When we consider a minister's influence with his converts, who in his hands are as clay in the hands of the potter, we realize in a measure his responsibility and obligation. Custom requires, and personal interests impel, ministers to teach denominational doctrines, many of which are practically inoperative and obsolete. That these divisive doctrines should have a place in the primary teaching of converts, while other matters of practical and present importance go uncared for, is a matter for intelligent solicitude.

It is a feature of the White Star Conduct, a Christian order, of which the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL have already heard, that the minister take the following pledge:

"I hereby pledge my calling as a minister for Christ that I will teach all who are converted under my ministry that as 'no political party has a right or ought to receive the support of Christian men so long as it stands committed to the license policy' so no Christian can consent to support any such party and hold a place of honor or of office in his church."

If we could but compute what would have been the result had all the converts of the last twenty years been specifically instructed and disciplined against license we might see in this country to-day the mightiest army of invincibles, the godliest host of enemies to public crime and sin that heaven ever looked down upon.

Let us look after the new converts and see to it that they are educated up to the line of present Christian intelligence.

O MOTHER, looking on your boy with troubled, anxious heart, because he is so noisy and boisterous, because he plays so hard and studies so lazily, because he runs so fast when he goes to play and walks so slow when he is going on your errands, because he is so much of an animal! do not be afraid; take care of your own heart, brood him, keep your own courage, your own love, your own faith clear, and then brood him, simply brood him; love him, teach him to love you, hold on to him and teach him to hold on to you, and you need not be afraid. There is more power in prayer than there is in the saloon; there is more power in the mother's love than there is in the beckoning of a thousand prostitutes. I do not say that the animal may not run away with him, but it will not be forever. O moral reformer, sometimes discouraged, looking on this slow process of the world's uplifting, and saying, "I have worked long enough; I am going to give it up," do you know what you say? It is as if the seed should say, "I will not germinate." To give up is to go back into the soil. If the faith and hope and love and courage are alive in your heart, you will yet win the day—you and God together.—Dr. Lyman Abbott.

GO FORTH at eventide,
Commune with thine own bosom, and be still;
Check the wild impulse of wayward will,
And learn the nothingness of human pride.
Morn is the time to act, noon to endure,
But oh, if thou wouldst keep thy spirit pure,
Turn from the beaten path by worldlings trod,
Go forth at eventide, in heart to walk with God.

MY LITTLE BE'S.

Bees busy in a hive, we learn,
Make honey which is sweet;
My little Be's are better, though,
Than anything to eat.

"Be Gentle" makes the children dear,
Both good and sweet, you know;
One never hears them fret and cry,
Or snarl, "I told you so."

"Be Thoughtful" makes the little ones,
Like their mammas, polite;
They always try so very hard
To do whatever's right.

"Be Truthful" makes the little folk
Most careful what they say;
I hope you'll have my little Be's
To help you every day.

THE CAMERA IN ASTRONOMY.

Sir Robert Ball, the great astronomer of Cambridge University, England, gave the following facts in a recent lecture:

The naked eye can see five or six thousand stars; three hundred thousand can be discerned in the Northern hemisphere with a spy-glass, millions and millions can be seen with telescopes. Within five years we have learned to put a photographic plate in the camera, point it to the heavens, when, behold, it brings out millions of stars of which heretofore we were ignorant.

Sixteen thousand stars have been taken on a single photographic plate. These plates are exposed seven hours—sometimes more, sometimes less. There are now no limits to the number of stars, there are simply millions upon millions and the light from most of them must have started from them before the human race appeared upon this planet, till we cannot even know that these stars are there now.

One-tenth as many women and four men out of every thousand are color blind. A Quaker was once known to buy a suit of scarlet thinking it was gray. The photographic eye is the most penetrating one of which we have any knowledge; it is not a bad figure of the penetrating Omniscient Eye.

For instance, when the Great Eastern was lying in the harbor at Liverpool, a friend of Sir Robert Ball took a photograph kodak of the great steamship, and to his surprise he found on looking at his picture the word "Lewis" (I think it was) painted on its black hull in large letters. But remembering that there was no such word on the ship he went back to make himself certain and saw nothing but the huge black hull. Astonished by this he inquired of the owners of the ship or of the captain who said that the word "Lewis" had been there but they had recently given a heavy coat of tar to the ship's sides, so that it should have a smart and new appearance, and no human eye would have been able to see that there was a name upon it but the more penetrating photographic eye discovered.

The process of this discovery was that besides the seven rays of the sun that we see when we analyze a sunbeam there are several other colors so delicate that they do not make an impression on our retina; there is also what is called an actinic ray, which means a vital or chemical ray that lies below the spectrum, but the more sensitive photographic plate reproduces whatever these colors, invisible to us, can bring out.

The earth moves eighteen miles per second, the sky has now been mapped out into ten thousand squares, and astronomical photographers in all parts of the world are photographing it. There is a star called Algol, which means demon star, it is also called a winking star because at intervals it disappears. We have now learned that the cause is that in making its revolutions an invisible star—perhaps a burnt out star—that radiates no light comes between us and Algol.

A photographer requested a sitting from a beautiful young lady; when it was granted he found on taking off an impression that her face was all broken out; he was surprised at this, could not account for it and went to the young lady's home to ask her to give him another sitting. But the servant who answered his ring told him she was sick in bed with measles, of which the photographic eye had discerned the little diseased germs under her skin that were to appear to the coarser human eye on the day following.

THE PINE AND THE LICHEN.

On a great bare rock near the base of a New Hampshire mountain grew a little gray-green lichen. It seemed scarcely more than a stain upon the surface of the stone, yet it drank the dew and rain of heaven, and absorbed nourishment from the surrounding atmosphere. Occasionally dust from some distant region, borne on the wings of the wind, settled upon the rock, and was held by the rough surface of the lichen. Nor did it live upon these alone, for the acid with which nature provides lichens dissolved a portion of the very stone itself. So the tiny plant grew and spread till it had prepared soil enough for a bit of moss. The moss held the moisture better than the lichen, and kept the part of the rock on which it grew always damp, so that it dissolved more easily. Moreover, tiny insects lived and died amid the moss, helping to enrich the soil, till, after a time, there was enough earth to support a rock fern.

The fern spread its bright green fronds over the surface of the rock, and stretched its roots down into a tiny crack, which became wider as they expanded. The rain fell into the crack, and the frost came and widened it still more. Summers and winters passed away. Every year the green fronds withered and turned brown, but by their fall and decay they made more soil for the nourishment of the plant. The fern grew into a bed of ferns, and after a time there was soil enough for the growth of a small shrub.

The shrub grew and flourished. Every spring it budded and put forth green leaves. Every fall the leaves turned red, and then brown, and fell upon the ground. Some of them blew away, but many remained to enrich the soil upon the rock. Summers and winters passed away. Other plants grew there, and what was left of the solid rock was now pretty well covered with soil and vegetation. You would not have known it for the same place where once grew the humble lichen.

In the course of time there chanced to fall in that spot a seed from a pine cone. Many years before, the same thing had happened, but then there was not soil enough to sustain even a small tree. Now it was very different. The lichen, the moss, the fern, the shrub, had all done their work. At last the day of the pine had come. Year after year it grew and flourished, till, in the course of time, it became a mighty tree. Its pointed top reached high toward the heavens. Its plumy boughs spread far over the mountain side. Summers and winters passed away. Though the pine was always green, every year it shed millions of needle-like leaves, which in time formed a part of the soil that nourished the tree, and buried the rock deeper and deeper. With each new year its strong roots penetrated farther into the earth, its pointed spire reached nearer the blue heavens, its waving boughs stretched over a wider area. Birds built their nests and sang their songs in the pine, men and women rested under its cool shade, breathing its health-giving fragrance, and listening to the plaintive music of its wind-swept boughs.

Meanwhile little gray-green lichens were working at the rocks all about. Most people passed them unnoticed, while everybody praised the pine, not knowing that, but for the humble lichen which grew there years and years before, the pine never could have lived upon the rock.—Emily Tolman, in S. S. Times.

READING.

If young people only knew the value of their youth! A half hour each day steadily given to the vanquishing of some real books in history, science, literature, is three hours a week; is more than twelve hours a month; is more than twelve solid days of twenty-four hours each a year. What can not the busiest man accomplish by such seizure of the fragments of his time? Oh, if the young people only knew the culture possible for them by such simple means! And forevermore it is the man who knows who gets to be the man who does, and to whom the chance for doing comes. Merely frittering newspaper and novel reading—a youthhood devoted only to that, how pitiably sad! No ship drifts into harbor. No young person drifts into an achieving manhood or womanhood.—Wayland Hoyt, D. D.

Charley had been going to Sunday-school some time, and he had learned that the penny for the missionary-box was a very important part of the service. It was missionary Sunday, and the teacher had told a number of stories about the people in heathen lands and the missionaries. Charley must have listened with one ear only, for when the teacher asked him what a missionary was, Charley replied: "One penny."—The Outlook.

Reigate Priory, Aug. 1, 1895.

Beloved Young Readers:—I recently received a letter from a dear lady in Ohio, who is one of our white-ribbon sisters. She lacks but a year of being fourscore, and she dearly loves our cause.

I think you will be better, as I hope I am, for having heard the account of her dear little grandson, who recently passed to a better world than this. Here is her letter:

My Dear Sister:—I am sending you a letter written to you by my little grandson, Charles Hamlin Phelps, who brought it to me to direct to you. It was written out of the fullness of his own little heart without the knowledge of any one.

The little fellow was born here in my home, and since his mother died has clung to me. Within the last three years he had several attacks of inflammatory rheumatism, and on April 5 the end came. His father was supporting him in bed, but he could not get air. He said, 'Fan me as hard as you can!' and suddenly he reached forward, extending his arms upward, and cried out with a transfigured face, 'Oh, there is Jesus and mamma!' He then said, 'Take me to the window,' breathed a few times, said 'Good-by, papa,' and was gone.

My son, who is a physician, told me he had seen more than a hundred people pass away, but never anything like this, for the boy's mind was perfectly clear, and he realized that in his great suffering his best Friend came to strengthen and comfort him. No language can convey to you the gratitude and glory that filled our hearts in presence of this scene so real and heavenly.

In the letter to you his convictions are expressed; they were deep and strong, a part of his little life. I had been faithful in his early training, and his very inner consciousness cried out against liquor. Your name was a household word to him, the name of a dear honored friend, and he looked upon you as the embodiment of the belief which he accepted. He was of a very spiritual nature and thoughtful beyond his years. What would have been his mission in life I do not know, but young as he was he left his impress upon his little friends. Nothing could have given him more pleasure than a line from you in reply, and nothing could so gratify his father as a line from you, assuring us that the message penned by the hand now cold in death and indited by a spirit now with the angels had reached the heart and eye for which it was intended.

The above letter was written by Charlie's grandma. Here is the dear little fellow's letter:

St. Mary's, O., 1895.

Dear Miss Willard:—I am a little temperance boy. I go to Lakeside every summer. I belong to the W. C. T. U. I have a big picture of you. I found a little one in the Harper's Weekly. I have a little sister. Mrs. Wisner taught me at the temperance school, and she was so kind to me. I am eight years old. I would not enter a saloon. My papa is not a very good temperance man. I would never put tobacco in my mouth, or wine or whisky or a cigar or anything. I will drink the pure water. Mamma died when I was yet very little. But when I heard the Salvation Army sing with such happy faces I said I would never go into a saloon or walk with a boy that did. I have a temperance box, with a picture of the Temperance Temple on the side of it. I learned a piece at the W. C. T. U. school, and said it at the auditorium. I must close my letter. Love to all.

Charles H. Phelps.

When I think of the army of boys and girls who, like Charlie, "would not enter a saloon," I know that the great victory for temperance is sure. God bless you all and keep you faithful!

Frances E. Willard.

NEPHEWS AND NIECES.

A FAITHFUL WORKER.

We have an L. T. L. here, and although it was started but a short time ago, there are now about forty members, and nearly all have signed the pledge. I am a member, and have a badge, which I think very pretty. I have persuaded six others to join the Legion. A number of the members assisted our leader in making bouquets, which we took to the hospital and presented to the patients there on flower mission day. Carolie Miller.

GOOD NEWS.

This spring the saloons were voted out, and they closed in July. Isn't that good news?

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

We have this week received a letter from Mrs. Anna M. Bunting, editor of The Union Worker, the state paper of Nebraska, which convinces us that intelligent work is being done in that wide-awake state. This zealous (I use the word advisedly for we journeyed across the ocean in company) sister writes:

"I do not think there is a state paper that has so large a subscription list as ours. Every woman in Nebraska who pays state dues is required to take (and pay for) the state paper, and if too poor to do so her union must in some way devise means to do it for her."

We felt like waving a banner when Ohio loyally declared, "No woman eligible to office who does not take The Union Signal, the state paper and State Minutes," but think of it, dear friends—each and every member of a Nebraska union a subscriber to the state paper!! We dare not try to estimate the outcome, if the great National W. C. T. U. would thus recognize its official organ. Said a keen business man to me when discussing circulation, "Of course every member of your great organization subscribes to its own paper." "Well, not exactly every one," I replied, and before I could explain, he added, "It should be so, it should be so. When men enter upon a work of reform they include the representative organ in the yearly dues."

A day later came the good tidings from Nebraska and I said, "Now I can tell Mr. ——. The keynote is struck, other states will fall into line, and when once the state paper goes with the dues, the National is sure to follow."

Over the sea comes the following resolution which was unanimously adopted at the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union Convention held in June, 1895:

Resolved, That we hereby indorse the manual of practical methods put forth by the President of the World's W. C. T. U. and entitled "Do Everything," also the book descriptive of our various leading workers entitled "Thumb Nail Sketches," edited by Mrs. C. C. Chapin; and that we hope Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew will complete her sketch of the World's W. C. T. U. movement at an early date.

We are expecting by the next steamer a supply of "Do Everything," for which we are holding many orders, but can send promptly "Thumb Nail Sketches" when your fifty cents or dollar are received.

* * *

Did you read "Publisher's Notes" date of August 22? If so, we hope you are arranging to take advantage of our "unparalleled offer," "our special offer," our premium offer. These are all good to October 1. The beautiful aquarelle picture of Miss Willard can be secured for twenty cents. At this price, the life-size portrait should hang on the wall of your union and in your home. One dollar, with the name of a new subscriber will secure for you "The White Ribbon Hymnal," and for five dollars you can obtain until October 1, eight dollars' worth of literature. This is an opportunity for doing good which you will have only for a short season.

OUR NEXT RED-LETTER DAY.

No meeting of the year seems to us more important than that appointed to be held on Mrs. Leavitt's birthday, September 22, and called World's W. C. T. U. day. By holding such a meeting, the local union announces its relations with a world-wide movement and strengthens its hold on the respect and interest of the community. It also introduces a new element—indeed, it is the up-bubbling of a spring of cosmopolitan inspiration and teaching to the group of people in the midst of whom the local union has its home. By careful preparation for the collection, money enough can be taken at that meeting not only to cover all expenses but to be of practical service in spreading the temperance propaganda to all lands. It is really the missionary meeting of the year in the W. C. T. U. If each local union would ask the young women who are interested in its work to make a pretty banner that should be displayed on all public occasions and should be called the World's Banner, the educational effect would be good. We would suggest a globe as the center of the banner with the words, "Christ for the World," and under it the motto, "For God, and Home and Every Land, World's Women's Christian Temperance Union."

THE RELATION OF OUR DEPARTMENT WORK TO TEMPERANCE.

One of the constantly recurring questions in the W. C. T. U. work is, How does this or that department promote the cause of temperance? It matters not that it has been answered again and again; both in the public presentation of W. C. T. U. aims and purposes and in the practical results of department work all along the line, this question will not "down." It is continually cropping up in the most unexpected quarters, to the surprise and oft-times the discouragement of many a white-ribbon worker. For instance, note this extract from a recent letter: "At the last meeting of our local union some of our members were expressing much concern that the W. C. T. U. does not work more directly for temperance. One of our brightest and most intelligent women could not see the relation of our departments to temperance—not even of the evangelistic, or the narcotics or the franchise department," and the writer asks for literature which deals specifically with this point. "As for outsiders," she continues, "the question is forever being asked, What are you women doing for temperance? What do your parlor meetings, your suffrage and purity departments have to do with temperance?"

The fact that this is a standing question inside as well as outside our ranks should make clear to every W. C. T. U. woman her first duty, which is, whether she be officer or "private," to make herself thoroughly familiar with the rationale of our many-sided work; she should know how each department came to be, its reason for being, and something of the practical work it has accomplished.

For any W. C. T. U. woman to express concern that the organization does not do more for temperance is proof positive that she has never yet actively coöperated with its outbranching lines of effort. If a woman who cannot see the relation of any given department to temperance be set actively to work in that department, either as superintendent or aid, she will very soon be declaring it to be "the most important of all." Nothing opens the eyes so effectually as lending a hand. Nothing explains the tactics of an army, or vindicates the policy of its generals so satisfactorily as the record of victories won. No woman who keeps herself informed of the doings of the W. C. T. U., who reads The Union Signal, who attends conventions and schools of methods, who studies the addresses of the World's and National presidents and the reports of superintendents, will ever express concern that the W. C. T. U. does not make more directly for temperance.

As to the kind of literature best calculated to educate our women who do not do these things we recommend, first, the Annual Leaflet of the National W. C. T. U. (Sent free on receipt of one cent postage.) This gives the Declaration of Principles of the organization, a W. C. T. U. "catechism," and the aims and methods of each department. Take it for granted that all, whether they "belong" or not, are able to see how the W. C. T. U. pledge is related to temperance, we ask them to note the declaration which follows it: "To confirm and enforce the rationale of this pledge, we declare our purpose to educate the young; to form a better public sentiment; to reform, so far as possible, by religious, ethical and scientific means, the drinking classes; to seek the transforming power of divine grace for ourselves and all for whom we work, that they and we may willfully transcend no law of pure and wholesome living; and finally we pledge ourselves to labor and pray that all these principles, founded upon the gospel of Christ, may be worked out into the customs of society and the laws of the land."

Here in a few words is set forth the relation of the different departments to temperance. And note further this question and answer from the Catechism: "What is the Woman's Christian Temperance Union? It is an organization of Christian women banded together for the protection of the home, the abolition of the liquor system, and the triumph of Christ's Golden Rule in custom and in law."

Here is Christian temperance in a nutshell! The triumph of the Golden Rule involves the laying of deep foundations. The W. C. T. U. works not only for the present but for future generations; it works not only to reform but to form and transform; it has, "through the clear vision which has come to its membership of the basic unity of all reform sources and the inter-relation of each evil with all other evils, widened its scope until there is no wrong against which it has not lifted up its voice, nor good with which it is not allied." May every white-ribboner seek early and earnestly the clear vision!

Second, we would recommend as an indispensable in the education of every intelligent W. C. T. U. member, Miss Willard's recently published handbook, "Do Everything." This is, as stated by its author, "a defense of our policy and a recapitulation of our methods," and there is hardly a question a W. C. T. U. woman can ask regarding the work, or an outsider either, which is not answered in its pages. It is a text-book which no white-ribboner who "wants to know" will neglect to study. Indeed, in view of the questions that come to The Union Signal we had almost said it should be one of the qualifications of W. C. T. U. membership that "Do Everything," which tells everything, be learned "by heart." We cannot refrain from quoting a few words from its preface—so germane are they to the subject in hand:

"A one-sided movement makes one-sided advocates. Virtues, like hounds, hunt in packs. . . . . An all round movement can only be carried forward by all round advocates; a scientific age requires the study of every subject in its correlations. It was once supposed that light, heat and electricity, were wholly separate entities; it is now believed and practically proved that they are but different modes of motion. Standing in the valley, we look up and think we see an isolated mountain; climbing to its top we see that it is but one member of a range of mountains, many of them of well-nigh equal altitude."

Let the dwellers in the valley of the temperance reform at least believe that their sisters whose vision sweeps the horizon from the mountain top have abundant reason for the do-everything methods; let them at least believe that the broader the outlook, the more distinctly is seen the fraternity of reforms, and hence, that to "make a chain" whose links are welded together in a common purpose is the wisest way to work for temperance.

We must mention a third help to a better understanding of white-ribbon banyan-like proclivities, and that is Mrs. Andrew's forthcoming book, entitled, "The World's White Ribbon." It gives the origin, history and methods of the W. C. T. U. and will be when published a necessary adjunct to the outfit of every well-equipped white-ribboner. With all that has been said and written upon the subject, and with all the opportunities for personal effort, it is surely not too much to ask of every W. C. T. U. member that she "study to show herself a workman that needeth not to be ashamed."

THE ATTITUDE OF CHRISTIAN EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS TOWARD CHRISTIANITY.

It seems very like a contradiction of terms to suppose that Christian institutions of learning can sustain other than one attitude toward Christianity. The truth is, however, that some professedly Christian institutions are, in their actual influence, very far from reinforcing as they should the principles and doctrines of Christianity.

It may be urged with some show of justice that we can scarcely complain if ungodly amusements and worldliness of every description creep into Christian colleges, since the church itself, of whatever denomination, fails to keep them entirely without its own bounds; that the college cannot be blamed if skepticism makes havoc of the young people within its walls, since even the church fails to hold them. There is truth in this, but on the other hand, it is to be remembered that the educational institution possesses by virtue of its character and work the confidence of the young people to a degree which the church can with the greatest difficulty attain. The admiration, love, loyalty and pride with which the young man or woman regards the educational institution with which he has cast in his lot is proverbial. The influence of the professors over the students is equalled by very few persons. It is almost impossible for any minister to approximate this influence; his work is such that he cannot possibly hold the same constant, close contact with his young people, and while the average professor in all leading institutions remains almost a lifetime and has behind him the prestige and reputation of many years, the term of the minister of almost any denomination is usually short.

In addition to this, the Christian college has, as a rule, the picked young men and women of the country. It is not the thoughtless and frivolous who are attracted to such institutions, but those who have some appreciation of life's meaning and purpose, and who are therefore the most easily persuaded to acknowledge the claims of God upon them. It therefore seems that if anywhere in the world young people from Christian families could be held and trained for the work of Christ and his church; if anywhere in the world young people who have not had the training of Christian homes could be won for Christ, it should be in Christian educational institutions. And often this is the case. There are, however, some such notable and lamentable exceptions to the rule that it becomes a legitimate subject of discussion both as to cause and remedy. In some instances the failure of such an institution to exercise the influence that it should over its students is due to professors who are lukewarm in their own religious experience, and who hold erroneous views as to the proper work of such an institution. We have known such professors to say openly that, so far from its being a cause for pride for Christian colleges to have large religious revivals, it was a matter to be ashamed of; it showed that such colleges had no proper appreciation of high scholarship, and argued that they were deficient in it; they were neglecting their own work to do that which belonged to the church. Such a statement shows an ignorance of what education is not to be expected from such a source.

Practically, we have never reached in any of our systems of training the true ideal of education; but the tyro is usually able to state correctly the theory; that education means the most perfect development of the whole man, the physical, the intellectual, the spiritual; and that the result sought is no more a mere intellectual giant than it is a physical Hercules, but symmetrical, perfect character. And it is an amazing thing to find those who have devoted their lives to educational work, who have fitted themselves for the career of college professors, to be thus ignorant of the true meaning and purpose of education.

It is manifestly cause for regret when the intellectual and spiritual are cultivated to the entire neglect of the physical and a diseased body renders valueless the trained intellectual and spiritual powers. It is, if possible, even more to be regretted when the spiritual is developed and the intellectual neglected, when unbalanced judgment and lack of knowledge neutralize the influence of true and noble purposes. But it is infinitely more to be regretted when the case is reversed. The unwise zeal and narrow bigotry of the man or woman who is upright and unselfish in his own life, is very generally forgiven when people thoroughly know the person, and his purity of purpose is not altogether without its helpful influence; but the one who has cultivated either of the lower parts of his nature to the exclusion of the higher, exercises in the main an influence injurious to his fellows.

The brilliancy of a Byron, the genius of a Napoleon, invest selfish ambition and immorality with a glamour not their own and blind the eyes to the real value of noble character. For this reason, the custom of some Christian institutions to place in their scientific departments men whose influence is negatively, if not positively, in favor of the skeptical ideas of the day, is to be strongly condemned. Better that our children should not be quite so well up in some of the modern, unproved theories of science, if we must make the choice, than that they should be unsettled forever concerning the truths upon which life itself is based.

THE AWAKENING NEEDED.

It is a frequent experience while considering the magnitude of an undertaking that a sense of its almost infinite nature takes such possession as nearly to paralyze energy. For a time we can scarcely bring ourselves to take up such loose ends of the tangle as may be found here and there. These are times to pray that we be given faithful persistence, for though it be weary work, may God preserve us from the soul's death sleep of indifference!

Such a feeling arises when studying the great mass of women outside those organizations which suggest a purpose in life above self and realizing the enlightenment they need. Even their religion is such an amiably selfish thing. It sometimes almost seems that one must be rough—say hard things that would make gentle souls regard us with pained surprise—to startle them into the knowledge that there is a fresh revelation from God to womanhood; that new power is given and new duty required. Oh, we want women to open their hearts and minds to something besides the details of material living, to let their souls grow; give them something to grow on, and that something must be the germ of an unselfish purpose.

A poet has said that nothing makes us so great as a great sorrow, but a young thinker of our day says: "I hold that stronger still is the power over us of a great cause, because it takes us vastly more out of ourselves, and whatever does this lifts us up and allies us to the highest forces of the universe." Herein lies the antidote for selfhood.

The power of the great cause which engages us has transformed and elevated the lives of thousands of women. "There has come into them the realization of the duty we owe to every human being, weaker, wickeder, more tempted than ourselves."

Into thousands of lives this realization has come, but greater thousands are selfishly at ease in Zion. They would be much hurt if charged with selfishness. It seems a harsh term to apply to those whose life is one long self-effacement for the welfare and happiness of those God has given them, but their devotion is so confined to their very own—"me and my wife, my son John and his wife, these four." Even the Pharisees do the same.

And how they overreach themselves! This neglected duty relates to the very elements which come in and despoil the home, and we cannot help ourselves!

It may not be well to appeal to a selfish motive to impel to a more philanthropic course, but it is to be found in the reflex action from the outer world whose bitter waters reach one and all of us. Here and there the woman is found who is only waiting for her commission; here and there the tinder awaits the spark of enthusiasm, and, with a touch, a whole set of new influences are set at work: the silver medal oratory, the Loyal Temperance Legion, scientific temperance instruction in the school—who can estimate what may be included in that spreading circle? We must not neglect to follow our clews wherever we find them—it will lessen the tangle. We can remember when we did not give much thought to these things, and when the awakening came to us; yes, and the sources of fresh inspiration along our course.

The awakening is sometimes painful; with it comes a weight of responsibility, ours before, but not before accepted. Sometimes there is an almost entire re-cast of companionships; those nearest and dearest do not come with us, and there is cause for prayers and tears and heaviness of spirit. We must expect to be the victims of "aggressive misinformation," and, to be guilty of a Hibernicism, expect it from unexpected sources.

Even ignominy is often our portion; we may confidently expect something of this in those ministrations which Christ says are the same as unto Him, but there is honor somewhere for those who fearlessly do the right thing. Doubtless cultivated, exclusive women in Jerusalem expressed much horror and contempt for those bold, dreadful creatures who mingled with the blasphemous crowd, and even jostled among the soldiers to get near the Master at the crucifixion. Grant, Lord, that we shrink not from any reviling or persecution for Thy sake!

Could we choose we would not return to the old selfish ease. Winged life is often stormbeaten and torn, yet it never seeks again the chrysalis shell. Oh, women who withhold your hands, could you but realize the awful weight of things not done because of your faithlessness! Could you but gain some faint conception of what is prevented from coming to pass by your indolence and folly! Could you but understand, and be appalled by your crime in the death of souls which might have lived had you helped to hasten the dawn!

In a National Convention Frances Willard quoted words like these: "Sacrifice to the mob! Sacrifice to the unfortunate, disinherited, vanquished, vagabond, shoeless, famished, repudiated, despairing mob. Sacrifice to it, if it must be, and when it must be, thy repose, thy fortune, thy joy, thy country, thy liberty, thy life. For the mob is the human race in misery; the mob is the great victory of darkness. Sacrifice to it. Sacrifice thyself. Receive its complaint, hear its accusation. Give it thy ear, thy hand, thy heart. Alas! it suffers so much and it knows nothing. Hold thy book wide open; show it the alphabet of reason; teach it to read virtue, probity, generosity, mercy. Be attentive, vigilant, kind, faithful, humble. Light up the brain, inspire the mind, extinguish selfishness, and thyself give the example."

Are these like to any words in an unknown tongue? Then you have not yet felt the awakening touch. Oh, seek the interpretation with prayers and tears; find it in Christ. "He had compassion on the multitude."

At the annual memorial meeting of Chautauqua, August 11, three of our own white-ribboners were reverently remembered, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap and Mrs. L. E. Trott. Mrs. Alden (Pansy) spoke of Mrs. Woodbridge, and Mrs. B. T. Vincent of Mrs. Lathrap. As Chautauqua this year celebrates its twenty-first anniversary, and these two noble women helped to inaugurate the movement and were identified with it during all the years, it was eminently fitting that their names should have been prominently introduced with those of Philip Phillips, Dr. Broadus and Professor Swing.

Somehow these lines, from one of our poets, are in my heart to-day, with reference to the dear sisterhood everywhere. Perhaps we each need the blessing of the thought, and so I pass it on:

"Go thou thy way, and I go mine,
Apart, but not afar;
Only a thin veil hangs between
The pathways where we are.
And 'God keep watch 'twixt thee and me,'
This is my prayer;
He looks thy way, He looketh mine,
And keeps us near.

. . . . . .

"And though our paths be separate,
And thy way is not mine,
Yet, coming to the mercy seat,
My soul will meet with thine.
And 'God keep watch 'twixt thee and me,'
I'll whisper there;
He blesseth thee, He blesseth me,
And we are near."

What the bicycle is doing to make the dress of women more reasonable the Christian Endeavor Society of young people may yet do for women's headgear. At the request of the presiding officers the ladies in the great convention meeting in Boston this summer removed their hats amid the applause of the bareheaded half of humanity, and the newspaper comment is that this innovation bids fair to stay, so that it will become the custom for women to sit in public assemblies without their hats as men do. If this should come about it would undoubtedly add to the good health and good looks of the gentler sex, and to the comfort of men whose view of stage, platform and pulpit is now perpetually impeded by the hats of the "fair sex."

"I must let you know," writes Rev. F. D. Green, "how the great meeting in St. James Hall, London, affected the Sassoun refugees. The significance of the meeting was in the human throbbings of the nation's heart, and this our Armenian friends understood 'in the original,' without any need of an interpreter. On reaching home the two strange men were so filled with profound and grateful emotion that they could not be induced to come to the happy tea table, nor would they eat a mouthful in their rooms. Not so the young child bride, 'the poor dear,' as Miss Willard affectionately calls her. She who has hitherto been inconsolable was now fairly hilarious, eating and laughing and chatting like a magpie, to the delight of all at the table. Then suddenly serious, and even pathetic, she remarked in her own musical tongue, 'Ait medz gunig amenen lav khasets, amen mart latsoots' (That great woman of all [Lady Somerset] best spoke; every one she made weep.) So say we all of us."

One of Chicago's litterateurs is Mrs. Helen Hinsdale Rich, also known in the lecture field of reforms. Her latest production is a charming brochure, bearing the title, "Madame de Staël: The Rival of Napoleon." This little booklet has received warm press commendations. Throughout, it is rare in apt expression, clear analyses and the keen insight of one woman into the thoughts, sufferings and ambitions of another, though that other lives only in the pages of history. The brochure is a glowing eulogy in polished literary setting.

"In the death of Rev. Dr. Miner, of Boston," writes Miss Willard, "every phase of that modern movement which seeks to enthrone the spirit of Christ in the customs of society and the laws of the land has suffered an irreparable loss. He was one of those men 'who know no variableness, neither shadow of turning.' What he was yesterday, that he was to-day, and would be to-morrow. He had such intellectual integrity that he was not tempted to be in thought or deed, 'Now here—now there.' His truest emblem is the oak, which stretches out its roots as the foundation of a wide coronal of leaves, and is at once the steadiest and most hospitable of trees. Great sheltering nature gave repose to all who dwelt within his peaceful shade. Total abstinence, total prohibition, the enfranchisement of women, the abolition of war, all these were in the sturdy strength of his lifelong advocacy. But we have lost him—he is gone."

On Duty.

MINNESOTA.

DISTRICT CONVENTIONS AND LOCAL ITEMS.

District No. 2 held its eighth annual convention in the beautiful city of Rochester. Fifty-two delegates were present, and the convention was favored by the presence of Mrs. Susanna M. D. Fry, state president; Mrs. Stella B. Irvine, state and National superintendent of Sabbath school work; Mrs. Effie Burgan, state superintendent of work among woodsmen; and Rev. Geo. F. Wells, state secretary of the Prohibition party. Such topics as "Our greatest need," "Shall we use alcoholic medicines?" "The Bible and the liquor traffic," "Our work and our influence," and "Unfermented Sacramental Wine," were ably presented and discussed. A lady present who was not much acquainted with the work said, "I did not know the W. C. T. U. was such an able and energetic band." Tuesday evening the address was by Mrs. Hannah Mullinex of Grand Meadow, who took for the text, "Curse ye Meroz, because she cometh not up to the help of the Lord against the mighty."—Judges 5: 2 and 3. The address was full of fine temperance points, greatly appreciated by the large audience. Wednesday evening, Mrs. Fry, in an able speech, held the attention of the audience for over an hour. At the gold medal contest on Thursday evening, Miss Florence Jones, of LeRoy, won the medal. This closed the convention, which had been helpful and encouraging throughout. The secretary's report showed the district to be alive and at work, while the treasurer reported a balance in the treasury.

The press superintendent of Le Roy union in the above district begs that we do not think they are asleep or dead down there, rather "too busy to report." The town for the first time in several years is cursed by licensed saloons, but the workers are keeping bravely at work, the superintendents of the fourteen departments organized vying with each other in endeavor. Medal contests and mothers' meetings are held frequently and the last county convention was held in this place.

District No. 3.—The union of South Branch held a good old-fashioned Fourth of July picnic dinner in a delightful grove, with singing and speaking and recitations in the afternoon. "Old-fashioned" in its neighborly goodwill and sociability, but new-fashioned in the blessed way of these days, in that there were no cigar and liquor fumes, no gambling devices and no temptations for the young.

Delavan union has met with losses by removal of their treasurer and press superintendent, but unselfishly comfort themselves by thinking of the gain to other places. One of the sisters said when going, "If there is no union in my new home and I cannot start one, I'll have one all by myself," but the president predicts that she will not be alone long, for her warm heart will draw others to her. This union entertained the county convention. The local editor personally attended the convention and devoted more than a column in an editorial notice.

District No. 5.—Edgerton had a grand celebration on the Fourth, among the speakers being Mrs. Sarah Wilson, county president of the W. C. T. U., an intrepid spirit, whose seventy-eight years cannot hinder from active work. A grand temperance rally under the auspices of Rock county W. C. T. U., was lately held in Luverne. Prominent speakers from abroad as well as the local talent, were present, and a procession was part of the program.

Worthington union, organized by Evangelist E. O. Taylor a little over a year ago, has fifty members, which rapid growth was due largely to the work of Mr. Alexander Cooper, who began a series of meetings last February at the invitation of the union. For four weeks he spoke every evening, and great interest in the temperance cause was awakened. At the close of each public meeting the pledge was passed, and over six hundred names thus secured. On election day victory crowned the untiring efforts of the friends of prohibition. Forty members of the union turned out to labor, lunches were served and personal appeals made to the voters. The president of the union is Mrs. Ramage, to whose untiring efforts and constant zeal the society owes much. A delegate was sent to the district convention, who brought back with her Mrs. Julia B. Nelson, who gave two lectures in Worthington. A petition to the common council to refuse license to billiard and pool rooms was extensively circulated and so generally signed that the request was granted.

District No. 6 held its sixth annual convention at Springfield. Reports from the superintendents of departments brought forth many interesting and helpful thoughts. A paper on the tobacco habit, by Mrs. Ruth M. Barnes, was followed by a spirited discussion; "Local Option," by Mrs. Coglan, was an able paper. The W. C. T. U. of Marshall circulated a petition among the farmers in the vicinity and ascertained that the majority was in favor of no-license for the town. The farmers around Sacred Heart even went further, pledging themselves to neither sell grain nor buy supplies in Sacred Heart if that village went license; thus silencing the oft-repeated objection that prohibition will kill the business interests of a place. Mrs. Lutz lectured on the second evening of the convention on equal suffrage.

Chippewa county convention was held in Montevideo. Mrs. Fry was present throughout, and Mrs. Barnes, who reports the convention, writes, "Mrs. Fry gave us a fine address, and we thank God for our state president." Medal contests were held at the closing exercises of two district schools in this county. The contestants were all Scandinavians. The attendance was large at both places, and the seed sown will surely give an abundant harvest.

Pipestone county convention convened in Jasper early in August. For the ensuing year Mrs. E. C. Frisbie was elected president; Miss Mary E. Smith, secretary; and Mrs. Anna Jencks, treasurer. Fourteen superintendents were appointed.

Redwood Falls union has a president who insists upon observance of parliamentary rules. Special half hour meetings are called occasionally purposely for drill in this direction, members taking turn in presiding. The mothers' meetings of this union have marked success. The mercy and help committee of the Epworth League rendered valuable aid by going to the homes and offering to take care of the babies so the mothers can go. This has been greatly appreciated. One mother upon her return from the meeting exclaimed to the young girl in charge of her little ones, "Oh, Miss! you don't know how much this means for me. It is like a release from prison," while the tears and trembling voice bore witness to her sincerity.

District No. 8 held its convention in Litchfield. It was the largest ever held, there being nearly forty delegates in attendance. Mrs. Julia B. Nelson was present and gave a logical address on equal suffrage. At the election of officers Mrs. Ruth M. Barnes was chosen for president.

Yellow Medicine county held its convention in Granite Falls. Mrs. Fry was present and gave an address the first evening which was well received. The second evening was devoted to suffrage; recitations, songs and brief speeches entertained the audience and made converts to the cause.

Granite Falls union has been busy in the blessed work of taking care of the "fresh air children" from the cities. Wood Lake union has lately held a medal contest. A new union has been formed at Clarkfield, and so in various ways the work is going on.

Litchfield union is increasing in membership. An evening parlor meeting was lately held. It was well attended and a pleasing program presented. The press superintendent regularly fills a column in each of two local papers, and the secretary furnishes a third paper with reports of the meetings. This union not long ago made a pleasant and profitable visit to the union at Spring Grove, and the visit has been returned, the members coming in a body to a regular meeting, at the close of which light refreshments were served. Why might not this idea be carried out in other places and much good result?

The Atwater union mourns the loss of Mrs. M. E. Strong, who died in June. She was a faithful counsellor and unchanging friend to the temperance work.

District No. 9 held its ninth annual convention in Monticello. The district president, Mrs. O. C. Gregg, being absent, Mrs. Fry presided. An able paper on "National Prohibition" was read by Mrs. C. H. Cilly of Minneapolis. Mrs. Fry gave a short talk on state work, especially scientific temperance instruction and school suffrage. Mrs. F. C. Nickerson read a strong paper on "Unfermented Wines," written by Mrs. M. B. Smith. An interesting paper on "Wine Drinking in Paris" by Mrs. C. S. Winchell, was read by her daughter, Mrs. F. N. Stacy. Mrs. Winchell was Minnesota's delegate to the World's convention in London, and had previously spent a time in Paris with her husband, Professor Winchell. Mrs. Fry gave an address in the evening to a large audience. The second evening was occupied by a medal contest by eight young ladies. The medal was awarded Miss Nora Cummings, and presented by Mrs. Fry in a few appropriate words.

Anoka union, which has not been heard from before for sometime, reports twelve members and five department superintendents, besides a class studying civil government, which meets every two weeks. Mothers' meetings are especially interesting and well attended. One of the most faithful members of the union was called to a brighter home last fall, and in the death of Mrs. C. D. Green the union sustained a sad loss.

District No. 10 recently held its second annual convention which is so enthusiastically reported by Mrs. W. R. Mandigo that it would be a real pleasure to give the report verbatim did space allow. Each session was well attended, all unions in the district being well represented. Mrs. Fry, Mrs. McCurdy, state secretary, and Mrs. Burgan, state superintendent of work among woodsmen, were present. The convention was held in Stillwater, where is the state prison. Warden Wolfer of the prison gave a stirring address upon prison life, in which he outlined the parole and grading system of Minnesota state prison, in operation in this state only, but is receiving universal attention from the other states. He paid a high tribute to the W. C. T. U. and mapped out a plan whereby the organization can aid materially in caring for the paroled prisoners. This will probably be presented to the state convention. After the address, the convention and friends were invited to lunch with the warden and his wife, which invitation was gratefully accepted. At five o'clock street cars were at the door of the church and conveyed something over a hundred ladies to the prison. After lunch they were shown over the prison and saw all the prisoners marching in to their supper. Mrs. Fry's address to the public audience in the evening was one long to be remembered for its conciseness, eloquence and delivery. The address to mothers by Dr. Helen Bissell, of St. Paul, was very helpful along the line of social purity. Mrs. Burgan was a great help to the convention with her singing and address upon lumbermen's work. She afterwards held an enthusiastic meeting with two hundred and fifty lumbermen in Stillwater. The district pledged one hundred dollars to the Temple as a memorial to their beloved district president, Mrs. Stella B. Irvine. A unique plan was adopted for raising the money. One hundred ladies are to be found who will pledge themselves to earn a dollar, then write out their experience in prose or poetry, and these are to be published in book form as a souvenir of the work. The district also pledged twenty-five dollars again this year to state work. Last year the same pledge was given and redeemed by piecing a quilt, each block having places for twelve names, and ten cents charged for each name written thereon. Over forty dollars was realized from it, and the quilt then presented to the Woman's Christian Association, of St. Paul.

Cover union, of Stillwater, observed flower mission Sabbath in Oak Park chapel, and the basket containing the beautiful bouquets of flowers was taken to the city hospital. Another basket filled with groceries and provisions was sent to assist the women of the Relief Corps in the relief department of their work.

INDIANA.

CONVENTIONS AND LOCAL WORK.

Interesting reports come from some localities, which I shall quote in the language of the press superintendents. Jessamine Quigley writes concerning

HAMMOND.

"We were given charge of a daily paper here, and edited it for one day, realizing twenty-five dollars, five dollars of which we sent to the Temple. The paper was filled entirely with original matter, written by our own women. We have charge of a column in our daily paper, and all our notices are published gratis. We have just established a W. C. T. U. home for homeless, erring girls, and have already put one in a good position, where we can look after her. We hold our meetings in the home. We have contributed twenty-five dollars to the Florence Mission of Chicago. Our literature superintendent has distributed thousands of pages, keeping three depots and several barber's shops well supplied. We have an active L. T. L. of fifty members. A special committee looks after the enforcement of the Nicholson Law."

RICHMOND

is reported by Letitia Smith, as follows:

"The Richmond and Mary Thomas unions meet regularly each week. The former seems to be bending its energies to complete the payment on the comfortable headquarters which it was enabled to purchase by the liberal donation of one of the members. We are working in fourteen departments, distribution of literature, jail and prison, flower mission, press work and suffrage, receiving the most attention. Several of our members are carrying on a gospel mission in a neglected part of the city, which is doing much good, and we feel that the jail and prison work has the seal of God's blessing upon it. We had the national secretary of the Young Men's Prohibition League, Mr. Goebel, of Philadelphia, with us this month who gave two excellent talks to appreciative audiences."

MT. VERNON.

Sadie Eves writes:

"We celebrated the Fourth of July by having a W. C. T. U. picnic. Five hundred were in attendance. An excellent program was carried out. Rev. Defur, son of our W. C. T. U. county evangelist, delivered the address of the day.

"Two new unions have been organized, one at New Harmony, and one at Griffin.

"The 21st of July being the birthday of Miss Anna Gordon and the writer, was celebrated by organizing an L. T. L. of fourteen members. We propose to have several home classes, and as often as thought advisable, bring them together for public meetings. The union has arranged with Mrs. Gougar for a suffrage convention early in September."

KOKOMO

is reported by Letitia Trueblood:

"Our union commemorated Mother Wallace day by having a mass-meeting in the evening. Had music, a brief account of Mother Wallace's life and work and a paper by Miss Simmons, an Indian graduated at Wabash. She is only nineteen years old. Her subject was 'The Nineteenth Century Woman.' It was an able article. Had a large, delighted audience.

"The jail is visited every Sabbath. Gospel meetings are now held every two weeks on Sabbath afternoon at the county infirmary. We have a bed-linen loan connected with our flower mission. We find many poor and sick ones get no public help except from the W. C. T. U. We have a standing committee to look after the interests of a 'rescue home' which we hope to establish within another year."

COUNTY CONVENTIONS.

Allen, Delaware, Cass, Shelby, Tippecanoe, Newton, Lake, Dubois, Wayne, Henry, Steuben and Noble all report good county conventions. Those of Henry and Steuben were followed by medal contests, that of Noble by a gold medal contest. Some of our state officers attended most of these conventions.

Greensburg sends this word: "Mrs. Lake gave us the finest lecture ever given in Greensburg. She talked nearly two hours to an interested and appreciative audience. Father Stegerwald gave us a hearty Godspeed in the good work we are trying to do."

An important feature in our work is the W. C. T. U. Day of Bethany Park Assembly. This Park, owned by the Christian church of Indiana, has a large tabernacle that will seat thousands; cottages and tents are interspersed over the park, and a small lake adds coolness to the atmosphere and beauty to the scenery. One day is given to the W. C. T. U. who thus present their cause to thousands. An association is organized called "The Bethany Assembly School of Methods of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union."

NORTH CALIFORNIA.

SCHOOL OF METHODS.

The annual session of the school of methods brought together a considerable number of white-ribboners at Pacific Grove. One of the encouraging features of such a meeting is the appearance of new workers. The first department considered, Sabbath observance, under its superintendent, Mrs. Christian Armstrong, whose "Sabbath Roll-call of the Nations" was a striking paper, introduced also Mrs. C. C. Kyle, lately from Nebraska, who spoke on the "Saloon and the Sabbath."

Mrs. A. B. Gove, our Elizabeth Fry, touched every one with sympathy for them that are in prison. She has won her way into our state prison as no one else ever has, and goes Sunday after Sunday to this strange parish to speak to the congregation of the things that pertain to salvation. Her ministrations have been highly blest and many may thank her under God for showing them the way to better lives.

Mrs. Laura Knowles, president of San Joaquin county, gave many practical thoughts on county work. Mrs. Nellie B. Eyster led a profitable hour on juvenile work, and Miss Helen McLean on the Demorest contests.

Perhaps no department was more earnestly dealt with than that of the press. There was evidence of very much done and of still greater opportunities, which the impending constitutional suffrage amendment makes most emphatic at this time. Mrs. Nevins, superintendent of young women's work, spoke impressively of the need of consecrated young womanhood. Mrs. Churchill, whose talks are always timely, pointed out the duties of this special time very forcibly, and all departments now converge to one point—franchise. Our superintendent of viticulture, Mrs. S. M. M. Woodman, than whom there is no greater specialist in her own line, gave a masterly address on "Citizen Suffrage" that made us sigh for the "men people" all over the state and wish they might hear it.

Our franchise superintendent, Miss Severance, has a way of calling for a franchise experience meeting, that commends itself. Miss Severance gave a most effective lecture on "The Evolution of Woman," illustrated by five tableaux, showing her conditions under barbarism, civilization, servitude, equality, etc., that spoke to the eye as well as the ear.

Mrs. E. G. Greene, superintendent of kindergarten and mothers' meetings, presented her department in a scholarly way. Her work shows the years of careful and thorough study she has given it,—acquiring not only a perfect knowledge of the subject in hand but a systematic method of imparting instruction. Since the opening of Stanford University she spent a year in that institution in scientific study of child nature. The interest shown in the special topic under consideration, the training of a child's will—showed how earnestly our women are studying these domestic lines, and goes far to prove that the more the intellectual life is stirred, the more faithfully will the home duties be discharged, making one hopeful of the result of all round development of women.

Another new personality of this year was Mrs. Lilian H. Shuey, one of our own, who came to the front in a remarkable paper on physical culture, "The Power Behind the Throne." Yet another was Miss Jessie Norton, superintendent scientific temperance instruction. That department is the special and long ridden hobby of the official reporter—and she being so delighted with Miss Norton's paper, induced the agent of the associated press to telegraph its whole seven hundred words to the city. Fellow reporters, take warning—for thereby the paper was lost. None of the city dailies would accept it, and having been sent the original copy became the property of the Western Union Telegraph company and could not be recovered. The experience may be worth something to others. However, there was a gratifying willingness of the Associated Press to give space to the general work.

A ready adaptability to emergencies has become a matter of course at these schools, and is always in evidence. Mrs. Stephen Mathews, of England, was to have preached the annual sermon, but being suddenly called away, her place was admirably filled by Mrs. E. G. Greene. The emergency fund of resources was also drawn upon for an entertainment by which the money to meet expenses was to be produced. The idea is worth passing on to others. A picture frame was suitably arranged, behind which a person could stand, representing the portrait of some distinguished character, successfully dressed to resemble the original, while a sketch was given by the exhibitor to the audience, making altogether a pleasant and instructive affair. Mrs. Bailey, superintendent of song, is unfailing in her helpfulness, both in her own fine voice and in bringing together other musicians whose efforts help the cause.

The Chautauqua Assembly gave one day to the W. C. T. U., in which our president, Mrs. Peet, the corresponding secretary, Mrs. Brown, Mrs. E. G. Greene, Mrs. G. M. Kimball and Miss Jessie Morton were chief speakers.

The state president, Mrs. Peet, as usual, is everywhere. One of her late successes was a lecture on scientific temperance instruction before the Salvation Army. Nothing could have been more effective. The burning zeal of these soldiers of the cross makes them eager listeners, for each one realizes that this instruction is equipping him for better service, and "thus saith the Lord," may be said to be the official phrase for "thus saith science."

Temperance workers are waiting with bated breath the results of the law passed last winter, known as the sanitary district law. Under its provisions districts may be laid out, in which, by a vote of the resident population taxes may be levied for sewerage or other sanitary requirements, and liquor license within the district be regulated or ruled out by the local commission elected by the people. Steps have been taken in many counties by the temperance element to avail themselves of the benefits of this law, but grave fears are now entertained that the law is virtually defeated by that feature of it which authorizes a tax levy. There seems to be nothing else so terrifying to men as the word tax, unless it be that other hard word, tariff. A skillful brandishing of those two words will intimidate the average voter. A careful study of the sanitary district law does not justify the belief that taxes will be levied or expense created unnecessarily.

NEVADA.

AMONG THE UNIONS.

The W. C. T. U. of Mottsville still maintains a lively interest. This union is in a country neighborhood and practically illustrates what can be done by the organized effort of a few consecrated, persevering women.

One of the latest aggressive efforts is the organization of a Sunday-school that has an enrollment of fifty members.

Systematic giving has enabled this union to give more largely than any other to the Temperance Temple, generously aiding the state tablet fund. Regular meetings, all members when possible present, The Union Signal read and utilized, have been some of the features adopted that have made the Mottsville union a force in the state. "We are preparing for the annual convention and shall be with you," so writes the secretary.

The Virginia City union has not suspended operations to wait for favorable silver legislation, as desirable as that might be, but holds the white ribbon banner aloft to display the truth that can bring the only lasting prosperity.

Various departments have received the attention of the union. Much study and work has been given to the suffrage department. As you have already been informed both houses of the last legislative session voted to submit a constitutional suffrage amendment to the people.

But suffrage work has not occupied all of the union's time; visiting from house to house, work among the children, studying plans and methods best adapted to the field, and carrying out plans—all of this, and much more, has kept the workers busy.

Reno union mourns the loss of two faithful members, Mrs. Cook, a former president, and Mrs. Fitzgerald. The union attended the funeral services in a body, at the special request of each of the sisters. There are ties that bind our hearts together that even death cannot sever.

The union has emphasized the study of the Word, devoting the first half hour to reading and discussion.

Boxes in the depot are supplied with literature that finds willing readers during these days of enforced leisure.

With the Mothers' Friend, issued by Mary Wood Allen, mothers' meetings have not only become a possibility, but an appreciated fact. A mothers' meeting tea was lately given by the union; each member extended invitations, and the result was the bringing together of a goodly number of mothers to enjoy the program, and to be mutually helped by each other's cheerful presence and thoughtful suggestions.

Through the evangelistic department much work has been done visiting from house to house, studying the Word, holding cottage meetings, and the workers have been blessed by seeing souls won to Christ.

Temple wheels are revolving, and thus, little by little, our work goes forward.

MICHIGAN.

ETCHINGS.

I am reminded very forcibly of a little poem upon "Companionship and Death," as these last two weeks have glided by without a Union Signal. Plenty of other papers, but a lonesome vacuity, indeed—

"And so the blessings heaven daily grants
Are in their commonness forgot;
We little heed what answereth our wants
Until it answers not."

Thrice welcome to the entire staff of The Union Signal!

This month we of Michigan have been favored with two W. C. T. U. schools of methods. At Bay View the largest, and the sight of our beautiful Evelyn Hall; Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson is leader of the meetings. They have been fully attended and quite up to former years in interest. Hackley Park, the newer Assembly grounds, is gaining in favor for beauty of location and attractions added to program. The teachers have a fine building, as also the Good Templars. The Mary T. Lathrap Hall, for which she planned so wisely and worked so liberally, is nearly "ours." The school of methods was under the superintendency of Lucy F. Morehouse, whose way of putting things is new, concise, yet forcible: her assistants were state superintendents, district presidents and two of the general officers, our president, Mrs. Benjamin, having the same dates at Mountain Lake Park. We have also had tent meetings in different parts of the state, county mothers' meetings at lake resorts, and verily my people this summer do not suffer for lack of knowledge of the whys and wherefores of temperance agitation.

Mrs. Benjamin, as your columns say, was most acceptable at Mountain Lake Park and at the five places in Nebraska—where she gave drills and addresses. In the president's column of our state paper occur these words, "Having come to the kingdom for such a time as this, what manner of women ought we to be? Manifestly warm-hearted, cool-headed, all-around women, asking each day for such heavenly guidance as shall make us instrumental in hastening the coming of Christ's kingdom, for this, after all, is the object of our organization to set up in each heart, in each home, and and in each country Christ's kingdom."

Our corresponding secretary, who is compiling Mary T. Lathrap's poems, says: "As much as has been known of Mrs. Lathrap, there is a surprise in store for those who read her beautiful poems. They are as strong and graceful as she. They deal with dignified subjects in eloquent and masterful expressions."

The first district, with the exception of one union, is in vacation until September. At Wyandotte will be held the annual convention. The annual of Plymouth union was a success, the children rendering "There's a Shadow on the Home." The district president's, Mrs. Andrus, address was upon "Some Forward Movements of To-day."

The second district convention was held at Reading. One hundred and thirty-four members have been added this year, Monroe county being the banner one on this line. Petersburg union at each meeting has read items from The Union Signal; some members come six miles, and we can truly say interest in the work is increasing.

Calhoun county, third district, reports new unions, and the outlook all over the county never was better; every union alive and working. All report an increase in membership.

Fourth district held its convention at Berrien county. Three grades of the school at Buchanan gave exercises that did credit to the children and their preceptress. Six prohibition ministers gave short addresses which were to the point, fearless and forceful. Mrs. Brown, district president, makes it a point to be at all her county conventions, as she herself says, being at first meeting and staying until the close of the last, which is a statement with a sermon involved.

The fifth district reports are out. Their president says for the work, "plan, pray and labor, results will be sure to follow."

Our president is in the field of the sixth district. A new union is reported at Ortonville, thirty-five members; county presidents wide awake, superintendents earnest. Central union at Lansing most aggressive, throwing the net of pleasant things, and then by literature, song, address, giving sound doctrine, open reading-rooms, public meetings, ice cream for sale once a week with the added attraction of a chorus of children's voices (Anna Gordon's songs, of course). A fine gavel from wood grown on Lookout Mountain keeps this union in order. God bless these women who labor with so many difficulties in our state's capitol city.

union of Port Huron does a grand work for the poor under head of flower mission. The fifth ward has headquarters as has also Lapeer union, and good meetings. Berlin union had a narcotic meeting at which all were asked to write short papers.

Two county conventions have been held in the eighth district, one at Greenville, the other at Merrill. They were both well attended and programs too full to be carried out; at the former place the collection was taken up by the two pastors—a novel idea. Why not?

Manistee union, of the ninth district, has done good work, made the last payment on a piano, holding a praise service at their freedom from debt. Bear Lake held a suffrage contest and supported one child in a kindergarten. This union endeavors to hold meetings with outsiders to awaken interest.

Reed City reports a mothers' meeting on the "Science of Motherhood," and a Bible Reading on "Missions." Evart sent greetings to the G. A. R., with a wreath of flowers. Hart reports sixty-two visits to the sick. Shelby are supporting a reading-room. Big Rapids had a wagon of children in the Fourth of July procession who sang temperance songs and carried flags. Sherman observed flower mission day with a visit to the poor farm with floral gifts.

In the tenth district Cass City reports a successful annual meeting with the election of a competent corps of officers and superintendents.

The report of the eleventh district is full of school of methods at Bay View. Seven states were represented in the school as members. Mrs. McWhirter, of Indianapolis, was accompanied by her husband who is chairman of the state Prohibition committee.

Mrs. Hollister's parliamentary lessons were eagerly sought and well given with charts; here let me say, Mrs. Farley, president of Battle Creek union, wrote me that to Mrs. Hollister's book, "Convention How," (which they not only read, but made a study of) is due whatever success was attained at the convention. The lecture in the auditorium was pronounced one of the best. The eleventh and twelfth are planning for district meetings in October, uniting on Mrs. Benjamin as speaker at both.

Gladstone, twelfth district, duplicates seven departments; has an L. T. L. Escanaba union holds gospel temperance meeting, the churches uniting at the last, Rev. Haynes (Baptist) gave an address "The Ideal Young Man." Mrs. Bradbury read a paper on "Consecrated Fatherhood." Miss Fennimore ably presented the Y work. Menominee union is active as ever. Rev. F. L. Thompson has given them two lectures recently. His subjects are sensational, therefore attractive and the matter most helpful. The unions cannot say too much of him as a lecturer and a friend of the union. This union has a sewing class of one hundred, meeting weekly. Material for the work is donated and with the sewing they are taught temperance songs and temperance pieces are read to them.

THE second annual convention of the Mary Allen West district of North Dakota was held in the Congregational church of Carrington on August 7. Lack of space prevents other than a mere notice of this gathering, though a full program well carried out made the occasion one of inspiration to all who attended. The annual convention next year will meet at Minnewaukan.

MRS. SARAH B. COOPER, president of the Woman's Congress Association of the Pacific coast, in making public acknowledgment of the services of Mrs. Van Pelt, editor of The Pacific Ensign, said: "I recognize in Mrs. Ada Van Pelt, vice-president-at-large, and acting secretary of our congress, one of the most efficient, devoted and unfaltering workers with which it has ever been my privilege to be associated. To her quick perception, keen insight, superb tact, gentle and discriminating judgment, the congress owes more than it can ever thoroughly understand. The presiding officer never turned to her in vain. Many a crisis was met and triumphantly carried by that strong, instinctive sense of fitness and wise forethought, that is worth more than hours of patient afterthought. To this calm, brave, efficient officer and to all the members of the board I tender my warmest and most grateful appreciation and my heartfelt love."

A CO-OPERATIVE CONFERENCE.

Recognizing the impossibility of holding satisfactory conferences with workers during the sessions of the National Convention the superintendents of physiculture and purity have united to call a coöperative conference of workers in these fields of labor to meet in Baltimore, October 17, the day before the opening of the National Convention. It is hoped to make this conference exceedingly practical. The three sessions of the day will be under the charge of the National superintendents of these departments. The subjects will be presented in addresses by capable and experienced speakers and a question-box will be a feature of each meeting. The needs of the departments, their relation to the work as a whole, the methods of work that may be followed by local unions, etc., will be among the subjects discussed. A fixed program cannot now be announced, but we may say that Miss Willard will be present. She gives the plan her hearty endorsement and promises to help us coöperate. Our white ribbon sisters of Baltimore also offer most practical coöperation by assuring us that delegates to the National who desire to come a day earlier in order to attend this conference will be entertained if they will send in their names at once. Send names of those wishing to avail themselves of this opportunity, either to Mrs. Margaret V. Green, Towson, Md., or to Mrs. Dora Webb, of Kent, O. Trusting that this conference may be of great practical benefit.

Treasurer's Corner.

News has just reached Headquarters of the death of Mrs. Stevenson's aged father. The warmest sympathy of the white ribbon army will go out to our sister. We had hoped that after her hard work at Mountain Lake Park and Chautauqua, she would have a quiet rest at home, but this affliction will, we fear, prevent this.

Dues have been welcomed from North California, Vermont, Ohio, Michigan, Alabama, District of Columbia, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Iowa, Illinois and Maine. Donations from Dorchester, Mass., $3.78; Union Congregational church, Providence, R. I., $3; special offering from Vineland, $2; for Hospital, from New Jersey, $9.80; birthday gift, Sarah Arletta Packard, New Jersey. Lathrap fund, $1, from J. D. Boardman, Massachusetts, with promise of more.

Illinois is unusually active just now. Camp and grove meetings in many localities, and every one emphasizes the temperance and prohibition work. Just out of Decatur Albert Smith has held a prohibition camp-meeting, annually, for several years with increasing interest and numbers. We were privileged to listen to an excellent address by Hon. Eli Ritter, of Indianapolis. He is an able lawyer and our champion for the unconstitutionality of license of the liquor traffic. I wish his clear, convincing arguments could be heard in every city of America. Mr. Smith is doing good work for the cause by his ten days' meeting. At Lithia Springs, near Shelbyville, Rev. J. F. Douthitt is also educating public sentiment by his camp-meeting, where are such speakers as Bain, Ambrose, Sobieski, Woolley and others. These grove meetings offer excellent opportunities for the W. C. T. U. to meet and get acquainted with each other and to gain new inspiration from the stirring speeches heard each day at these meetings. Both of these meetings are well conducted and attended by the most intelligent people of those sections, and are doing a world of good for the cause. W. T. P. A. literature ought to be on sale at all these camps.

TWENTY-FIVE LETTERS ON
ENGLISH AUTHORS,
For Teachers, Literary Clubs, and the General Reader.

By MARY FISHER. 12mo, cloth. 406 pages. Price $1.50.

This work treats of those eminent writers who for more than five hundred years have most influenced the thought of the world. The author makes the reader acquainted not only with the character of their works, but, what is of greater interest, with them as men—what they felt and believed, their way of looking at life, and their experiences.

The work is a departure from its class in its omission of the hackneyed judgments which pass from book to book; its fresh, telling matter, from original sources; and its special notice of the effects of weak and vicious literature upon young minds—its mission being to inculcate a taste for the "best that has been thought and said in the world."

The Chicago Inter Ocean says:

This is a book marked for its simplicity of style and its directness in clear statements of the literary characteristics of eminent English authors, from Chaucer in 1400 to Mrs. Humphry Ward in 1891. Such a broad field can give only epitome sketches, but her characters are wonderfully clear in their delineation. She does this not so much in words of her own, but allows each to speak, and thus clothes each in living character; what each thought and believed; how they lived and acted and labored. The reader will seldom find more of positive value in such small space, told more vigorously and pleasingly, than in the neat, compact volume. Teachers and literary clubs will find the book boundlessly suggestive—inviting to wider fields—while the intelligent, thoughtful reader will find richness upon every page. It is not often a book of the kind is more deserving of full commendation.

Organizers' Corner.

In May and June I spent five weeks in Virginia organizing five Y and four W. C. T. unions, and giving thirty addresses. London county, where I first worked, is settled largely by the Friends, who are always firm friends of our cause. At Lincoln, Mother Stewart formed the first union in the state, several years ago. Now the county is well organized, a successful Bush meeting held yearly molds public sentiment aright and the county went "dry" at the last election. Mrs. Howard M. Hoge, the efficient county president, is also state superintendent of Demorest contests and this department shows steady growth. The Y's at Lincoln and North Fork I found doing good work, especially with and for young men. Hamilton Y had grown somewhat discouraged through loss of members, but a reorganization was effected. At Upperville is a promising union one year old. For the first time I spoke here in an Episcopal church, the rector being in hearty sympathy with our work and his wife president of the union. The dear sister who entertained me said, "I want to organize an L. T. L., and," pointing to her large family of children, "I've enough in my own home to begin with." I could but contrast her enthusiasm with the indifference of the many mothers who, with fewer cares, sit at ease, not realizing their duty toward the children.

At Hillsboro, a quaint old town at the foot of the Blue Ridge, the workers are holding their own against much prejudice and slowly winning their way. The county president had secured a club for the state paper at Round Hill and as a result, there was little difficulty in organizing. How much more could be accomplished if our workers everywhere would sow the towns "knee deep" with our papers, in advance of the organizer's coming! Charlottesville gave me one of the best audiences of the entire trip. This union is prosperous and entertains the state convention. At Ashland I was pleased to meet Mrs. Newton, state organizer.

"On to Richmond," was now our cry. The heat there was intense and audiences small, but Mrs. Jobson, the energetic Y president, secured me a hearing before an Endeavor society and also at a Sunday-school celebration, as well as an entire evening later. For a week Mrs. Miley, of Norfolk, business manager of the state paper, cared for me in her hospitable home and planned my meetings. Here, too, it was my privilege to meet the beloved state president. I organ zed a Y at Atlantic City. Newport News I found rejoicing over the erection of a fine W. C. T. U. fountain on Main street, erected largely through the efforts of the untiring president of the union, Mrs. Dr. Charles. A large audience attended the dedicatory exercises and showed their appreciation of the beautiful gift.

Great credit is due all our earnest workers in "Old Virginia." Through their patience and persistence the shadows of false prejudice and conservatism are slowly lifting from that fair domain.

I was summoned home by the illness and death of a brother and thus obliged to cancel my last Virginia appointment, as well as some in Ohio. In July I conducted the state Y conference at Lakeside, O., and later on spoke for the W. C. T. U. at the Franklin Grove, Ill., annual gathering.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE THIRD BIENNIAL CONVENTION OF THE WORLD'S W. C. T. U., LONDON, JUNE 16-24.

Resolved, That we hereby reiterate the resolution first adopted by the Crusaders at the rally of the clans in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1894, and which reads as follows:

Resolved, That recognizing the fact that our cause is, and is to be combatted by mighty, determined and relentless forces, we will, trusting in Him who is the Prince of Peace, meet argument with argument, misjudgment with patience, denunciation with kindness, and all our difficulties and dangers with prayer.

Resolved, That the conflict in which we are engaged is so desperate that we need a union of all the forces we can command, and in the same catholic spirit which has characterized us in all the past, we welcome to our love and our labors all true women who will unite with us on the basis of faith and prayer and honest hard work.

IN MEMORIAM.

WHEREAS, since we last met we have lost Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, secretary of the World's W. C. T. U., and Mrs. Ella F. M. Williams, treasurer of the World's W. C. T. U., and president of the Dominion of Canada, be it resolved that we hereby put on record our sense of the high character and devoted labors of these two veteran white ribbon workers who helped to lay the deep and broad foundations for the World's W. C. T. U., and whose passage to the larger life and greater work beyond binds us by holy ties to the better hope, the higher life and more untiring toil in the days and years that remain to us on earth.

Also, That our tenderest sympathy be extended to Mr. Woodbridge and Mr. Williams in their sad bereavement, and that we desire to express our deep appreciation of the great assistance they have rendered our cause.

Resolved, That the name of Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, of Michigan, that foremost Prohibition orator; of William Jennings Demorest, of New York, founder of the Demorest medal contests which have been of incalculable value to our cause; John N. Stearns, for thirty years secretary of the National Temperance Society and Publishing House in New York city; Rev. Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, and Prebendary Grier, of England, than whom we had no better friends among the clergy; and Mrs. Jane Stapler, our Cherokee Indian comrade,—we have met with losses that cause us sober second thought as Christian workers who lift up their hearts to God asking that a measure of the same spirit that inspired these blessed comrades may rest upon us, each and all.

Resolved, That the basis of this society is total abstinence, total prohibition of the liquor traffic and the opium trade, the enfranchisement of women, purity of personal life, and international peace and arbitration, and we invite all earnest women who are like-minded with us to join our organization, put on the white ribbon and become soldiers in our peaceful war.

Resolved, That we deplore the action of the commission to investigate the opium question in India, whereby it takes sides with the government in its pursuit of revenue and against the people and their interests, and that we equally deplore the one-sided report of the commission in Canada appointed to investigate the results of prohibition which also in the interests of revenue for the government, as we believe, used its influence against putting the liquor traffic under the ban of law. While we applaud the House of Commons, of Canada, which as we learn, notwithstanding this adverse report has passed a resolution for National Prohibition pending the action of the Privy Council.

Resolved, That this Convention hereby expresses its earnest thanks to H. J. Wilson, Esq., M. P., who dared to "stand alone" on the opium commission as the friend of truth and righteousness.

Resolved, That our thanks are due to W. Cremer, M. P., whose work in the cause of international peace and arbitration has done more to advance the prospect of an international treaty between Great Britain and the United States than that of any other person, and that we beg him to redouble his efforts at this time when the rise of a new power in the East makes it apparent that the interests of the English-speaking nations must closely coalesce if they would continue to lead the nations of the earth in the procession of progress and of power.

Resolved, That the indorsement of the abolition of the C. D. Acts in India is, in our opinion, the first duty of the Government, and that the resolution of the House of Commons should be wrought into statutory law and applied to all the dependencies of the British Empire.

Resolved, That we are unalterably opposed to the compulsory medical treatment of women under any circumstances, when this is done in the interest of impure relations between men and women.

Resolved, That we call public attention to the fact that the desire and purpose of women as a class to retain their personal independence and purity of life is evinced by the hardships under which they persevere in earning their bread honorably, when the temptation meets them at every turn to secure it without labor at the cost of personal purity, and this has been so always.

Resolved, That we believe this instinct of a pure womanhood is a gift to the future mothers of the race, without which the race could not survive, and that in the great battle of the world not enough emphasis has been put upon its sacred significance and its incalculable value in the development of mankind.

Resolved, That we express our warmest thanks to Lady Henry Somerset for her editorial in The Woman's Signal in which she sounded a rallying call to women against the immorality of the theatrical representations popularly known as living pictures, and to Mrs. Ormiston Chant for the splendid courage and skill with which she conducted the crusade which has resulted in a world-wide movement for the purification of public amusements, and that we approve the bill introduced by the white-ribboners of New York into the legislature of that state, and which provides a penalty for women who exhibit themselves in unseemly attitude or attire, and for those who employ them thus to exhibit themselves. We make the broadest possible distinction between pictures that are beautiful and elevating, and pictures the sight of which is sought from motives that are sensual rather than artistic.

Resolved, That the sex novel is, in our opinion, no minister of grace or a good conscience, that its effects are harmful, and that we deplore the multiplication of books by men and women whose abilities could be turned to account for the uplift of humanity, but who, under a morbid spell, are putting forth literature which can but prove hurtful to the young and harmful to the great cause of human rights as represented by the woman movement of our time.

Resolved, That we are utterly opposed to lynching at all times and everywhere, and that we hereby pledge ourselves to use our influence against the infliction of penalties for crime except by due process of law.

Resolved, That this Convention cannot express itself too strongly in opposition to the atrocities in Armenia, and that it urgently calls upon the British government to use its utmost power to afford protection to our Christian brothers and sisters in Armenia, Macedonia and other provinces where they are ground under the heel of an intolerable tyranny.

Resolved, That it behooves all right-minded people carefully to consider the condition of morals revealed in the trial of a well-known playwright now suffering the penalty of his misdeeds, and that we call upon all who have the care of the young, especially where they are herded together in the public schools and other institutions, to unite in the effort to devise better safeguards in future than the past has witnessed. Also,

Resolved, That while we do not consider the penalty too great that has been inflicted on the aforesaid prisoner, we protest against those one-sided laws whereby crimes against men are heavily punished, and personal cruelty and outrages worse than death, when committed upon women and girls are passed over so lightly as to reveal the fact that offenses against the purse are considered far more heinous than those committed against the person, in view of this injustice we call upon women, everywhere, to seek the ballot that they may help good men to enact more equitable laws against bad men in every land and nation.

Resolved, That the prevailing style of fashionable dress is one of the heaviest handicaps that hold women back from the highest and most helpful development of character and work, and that we rejoice in the rapid growth of wholesome outdoor exercise and amusement for those who are, or are to be, the mothers of the race.

Resolved, That THE UNION SIGNAL, the official organ of the World's W. C. T. U., the Woman's Signal and Woman's Signal Budget, published in the interest of the B. W. T. A., the Young Women, and The Young Crusader, and all National white ribbon organs are papers that show forth the spirit and method of the white ribbon movement, and should be in the homes of our workers to help develop that intelligent zeal which is essential to the steady growth and the enlistment of new recruits in the white ribbon army.

Resolved, That we send to our National lecturer for India, Pundita Ramabai, founder of the woman's educational school at Poona, our sisterly love, and pledge to her our co-operation in her great enterprise.

Resolved, That we hereby endorse the manual of practical methods put forth by the President of the World's W. C. T. U., and entitled "Do Everything," also the book descriptive of our various leading workers entitled, "Thumb-Nail Sketches," edited by Mrs. C. C. Chapin; and that we hope Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew will complete her sketch of the World's W. C. T. U. movement at an early date.

Resolved, That Mrs. Hauser's plan of enlisting scattered members in India to join the W. C. T. U. be made a part of the general plan of the Somerset W. C. T. U., which seems to us fully to meet the case.

Resolved, That to Lady Henry Somerset and our sisters of the B. W. T. A. we desire to express the love and honor that we feel toward them, one and all, and our appreciation for the complete preparation made, and the beautiful hospitality extended toward us. We shall carry to our respective countries the impetus received in this Convention, and by the grace of God we propose working more zealously than ever in the future in token of the gratitude we feel toward our Heavenly Father and our noble comrades that we were permitted to share the unequaled inspirations of these red-letter days.

Resolved, That with these names we desire to associate those of Mrs. Ward Poole, Miss Helen L. Hood, Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Osborn and Miss Gertrude Hunt at the Headquarters, who have spent themselves in the arduous labors essential to perfecting on a grand scale the arrangements for this grandest of Conventions.

Resolved, That to the Temperance printing firm of W. J. Hutchings, we express our sincere appreciation, and to the seven faithful stenographers without whose work these preparations could not have been adequately made.

Resolved, That we cannot forbear expressing our admiration for Miss Mary Gorham, superintendent of evangelistic work in the B. W. T. A., to whose intelligent zeal is due the opening of nearly two hundred pulpits on the occasion of this Convention, in London and its suburbs, and that we thank those liberal-minded men who accepted her invitation to preach temperance sermons themselves and admit white ribbon women to their pulpits, chapels and mission halls.

Resolved, That we rejoice in the presence of our beloved Mother Stewart, and applaud the courage that led her to cross the sea in her eightieth year that she might impart to us the inspiration of her presence and her voice.

Resolved, That to Mrs. Judge Thompson, of Hillsboro, Ohio, leader of the first praying band, we hereby send the assurance that we have missed her gentle and womanly presence and that the Crusade Bible and the Crusade Psalm have been to us hallowed reminders of the brave stand she took when called to lead the women of Hillsboro, Ohio, in the great Crusade now known and felt the world around.

Resolved, That to our round-the-world missionaries, each and all, we send the earnest and grateful assurance of our admiration, esteem and warm affection for all they have done and suffered to carry the white ribbon to the nations of the earth.

Resolved, That we appreciate the action of our President in placing the birthday fund, raised for her in her fiftieth year, at the disposal of the World's W. C. T. U., to serve as the nucleus of a fund for the benefit of the work of these missionaries, and we call upon good people everywhere to help increase its amount an hundredfold.

Resolved, That we send our sisterly sympathy and tender greeting to that brave, great-hearted pioneer in Canada, Mrs. Letitia Youmans, deeply regretting that we have lacked the inspiration of her presence and eloquent voice at this greatest camp-fire that our cause has ever known.

Resolved, That we tender thanks to Miss Alice Briggs, for many years office secretary of the World's W. C. T. U., for the faithful and excellent work accomplished by her especially in her relations to the Polyglot Petition.

Resolved, That this Convention sends its thanks to Miss Morgan, of Wales, superintendent of petition work, for the devoted and capable efforts put forth by her for the Polyglot Petition, and that we sincerely regret that one so remarkably endowed for the work should feel it necessary to resign the position which she has held so long and filled so well.

Resolved, That to Mrs. Rebecca Shuman, of Evanston, near Chicago, Ill., "who made the petition by not less than two years of patient work at an average of eight hours per day," we send the assurance of our admiration and grateful regard in that she "has borne and labored and had patience." We wish that these three loyal comrades were with us that we might show them tokens of what our hearts cherish toward them for their zealous efforts on behalf of this great international enterprise.

MRS. STODDARD, president of the Texas W. C. T. U., Mrs. M. Watts, president of the Kentucky W. C. T. U., Mrs. S. M. Walker, president of the Nebraska W. C. T. U., all spoke on the second day of the World's Convention, as did Mrs. J. Fowler Willing, of New York, the World's evangelist, and Miss Clara Parrish, National organizer of the Y's. Devotional exercises were conducted on that day by Mrs. Blaikie, president of the Scottish Woman's Temperance Union.

Kernels.

A village humorist was asked to suggest a motto for the new grocery, and he proposed this: "Honest tea is the best policy."

A father was once asked by his daughter if there was any easy way of acquiring a knowledge of German. "No, my daughter," was his judicious reply; "it must be learned by main strength."

Johnny—Doctor, if I was to ask you whether it's goin' to hurt or not, would you tell me the truth about it?

Dentist—I certainly would, my boy.

Johnny—Then go ahead an' pull it without tellin' me.

A contemporary remarks that a boy sometimes goes wrong because of a misplaced switch.

A little fellow who wore striped stockings was asked why he made barber poles of his legs. His reply was, "Well, ain't I a little shaver?"

"There now, is my new picture!" said a young painter to a friend. "What's the matter with that, eh?"

"I don't know," answered the friend, "but I should say it was a case of art failure."

"My dear," said Mrs. Wilson to her husband, "what makes you think that Tommy disturbs the neighbors with his drum?"

"Oh, nothing," said Mr. Wilson, "only Mr. Smith gave him a new jack-knife to-day."

An amateur poet found himself in a sad quandary.

"I don't know what to think," he said. "Last year she gave me a pencil to write poems with, but this year she has given me a silver-mounted eraser."

"Maria! Was that phonograph open during a cat fight?"

"No, I turned it on last night when you were sleeping. Perhaps you will believe now that you snore."

Congress had been in session all day, and, as a member was met passing out from the hall, he was asked:

"What has passed in Congress?"

"Ten hours," was the caustic reply.

THE IDEAL LACE THREAD.

For Honiton Lace—which formerly had to be made with imported threads—Mexican Work, Point Lace, Monograms and all kinds of art work, there can be nothing better than Glasgo Twilled Lace Thread.

The twilly appearance, peculiar to this thread alone, is imparted to the lace; tatting done with it has a remarkably fleecy look, while for drawn work and embroidery, it is absolutely perfect. It is far superior to ordinary thread for button-holes, and is unapproachable for knitting and crocheting. Equally good for hand and machine sewing, it is at once the finest and cheapest thread made.

A finely illustrated hand book of crocheting, knitting, embroidery, drawn-work, etc., has been published by the manufacturers, which may be obtained of dealers in art and embroidery materials, or it will be sent postpaid to any address on receipt of ten cents, by the Glasgo Lace Thread Co., Glasgo, Conn.

Roy's grandpa to Frankie (aged five)—Frankie, Roy's grandpa was a little boy like you once.

Frankie—My grandpa wasn't never a little boy, I know. Coz I was to his house a great while ago and he wasn't then!

Two-years-old Nellie was ill last spring and had to be kept in a darkened room for some days. During that time the dandelions blossomed thick everywhere. The first morning Nellie was allowed to go to the window, she cried, delighted, "Oh, mamma, see! the stars have tumbled right into our yard!"

Father—Tommy, stop pulling that cat's tail.

Tommy—I'm only holding the tail; the cat's pulling it.

"I wouldn't ride over those fields if I were you," said a gentleman out hunting to a sporting farmer. "They belong to a disagreeable sort of fellow, and he might make trouble about it."

"Well, sir," said the farmer, "as him's me, he won't say nothing about it to-day."

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address.

Home Hints.

It is surprising how few people understand the simple mechanism of a spring shade roller. The wooden roller is, nearly the whole length, a hollow tube, and in it is placed the spiral wire spring. When the shade is torn from the roller if tack larger than one ounce is used for fastening it on, it goes into the spring, and of course ruins it. If the spring is too weak to run the curtain up readily draw the shade down, remove it from the brackets, roll it up by hand and replace it. If too strong reverse the process, that is, remove the shade rolled up, unroll it and replace. If your holland or opaque shades are soiled rub them with stale bread.

Powdered borax is one of the indispensable articles on the toilet table and in the bath room, after one learns even a few of the uses to which it lends itself. It is one of the best things to use for washing the hair, as it easily removes the oil and dirt, making the scalp clean and the hair soft and silky. It is equally good for the bath. A little of it used in a glass of water is a purifying rinse for the mouth and teeth, and is an excellent dentifrice, preventing decay, and hardening the gums.

Before washing colored cotton goods, such as the pretty ginghams and lawns so much in vogue, soak them in salt and water to set the colors.

How many things we accept year after year, without question or thought of possible improvement. Why do women bend over a cook stove, kitchen table and sink until back and shoulders ache, when these necessary pieces of furniture can so easily be raised from six to ten inches higher? In the latest improved kitchens, one by one these old-time mistakes are being corrected, but if you don't have a new house you can have these things done.

Tortoise shell combs should be rubbed with chamois skin after each wearing. This will keep them bright. If they get dull and oily looking clean with rotten stone and oil, applied with chamois.

Rubber can rings, which have become stiff and hard, may be made pliable by soaking for about a half hour in two parts water and one of ammonia. The rings are so inexpensive, however, that in the end it will probably prove cheaper to buy new ones.

If you have some dainty linen or lace handkerchiefs which you fear will be ruined if sent to the laundry, it is an easy matter to wash them yourself. Use warm water, ivory or other pure white soap and borax. Wash thoroughly, rinse in several waters. Wipe the surface of the window pane and on it carefully spread the handkerchiefs, smoothing out the corners perfectly. Do not wring them too dry or they will not adhere to the glass. You will find they come off with a slight gloss and stiffness, much nicer than when ironed.

A little butter rubbed on fingers and knife when stoning raisins will do away with the stickiness which so tries the patience of the cook.

The Household gives us the following dainty breakfast dish—cheese and egg toast. Break into a bowl as many eggs as you will require, one for every two slices; beat thoroughly with salt and pepper, add a generous quantity of grated cheese; put into a pan containing a tiny piece of butter; place in the oven for seven minutes; remove and spread quickly on toast; serve very hot.

Gum arabic and gum tragacanth in equal parts, dissolved in hot water make the best and most convenient mucilage to keep in the house.

The splint fruit baskets now accumulating in every home can be utilized in many ways. The smaller square ones make good lunch baskets to take on a journey, and are none too good to throw away when emptied. The same, or the larger sizes, can be lined with cretonne or any material fancied, add pockets and you have a serviceable work basket. The same treatment, using dotted Swiss or mull, and the baby basket is provided with almost no expense. The tall baskets, trimmed with interwoven ribbons, finished with enamel or gold paints, and behold a scrap basket. These are only a few of the many uses to which they can be put.

Publisher's Notes

Thumb Nail Sketches of White Ribbon Women. Official. Edited by Clara C. Chapin. Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, Chicago. Price, paper, 50c.; cloth, $1.

This attractive and suggestive volume contains the roll of "immortals" who serve with honor in the ranks of the W. C. T. U. The first edition was issued in 1891 under the supervision of the late Julia A. Ames, and is now re-issued with improvements under the present editor. It is designed especially to aid workers in the local unions in advertising speakers, but it will, at the same time, go far to "emblazon the names and fame of the persons herein sketched." The book contains a large number of miniature, snap-shot biographies of women, many of them already known to fame, while others have interesting records, and will no doubt be better known in the future. Hardly one of the sketches is without interest to the general reader, while to the members of the W. C. T. U. the volume must prove invaluable.—From Zion's Herald.

PHILANTHROPY FUND.

We have not called attention to our "philanthropy fund" for many weeks, so slight have the additions been, but August has been a red-letter month, and it is worthy of comment that the contributions have been from the Eastern states: $10 from a consecrated white-ribboner in Massachusetts, and now comes a "thankoffering" of $5 from Connecticut, the neighbor just across the line, and we are hoping the wave may come westward.

It is from one of the "pilgrims to the old country," who writes: "An angel of life visited one of the happy homesteads in Norfolk, Conn., on July 8, 1895, leaving a charming little daughter." A happy thought to thus consecrate the little life to the work of temperance reform.

FROM THE WATCH TOWER.

Under the title, "Never be Discouraged," is most interestingly described the experience of a member of a union who desired to do something more than "pay dues and attend meetings," and fortified with this spirit went forth to urge the claims of The Union Signal and her state paper, The Watch Tower. Twenty families represented in the union were visited, and the zeal of the would-be active worker sorely tested when she found in the homes of the twenty, poultry papers, local papers, farm papers, church and Sunday-school papers—three Union Signals and two Watch Towers.

In ordering literature from our publishing house two things should be regarded as essential: first, a knowledge of the needs of the people among whom it is to be distributed; second, a knowledge of the W. T. P. A. catalogue of publications. The first women readily and naturally acquire in the pursuance of W. C. T. U. work. But we wish all white-ribboners, especially all superintendents of departments, would realize more than they do the importance of the second. Every mail brings us evidence of the fact that many, even if they possess a catalogue, do not take the trouble to consult it. "What literature have you on such and such a subject, and what the price?" is in substance the question we are continually answering—a question which the writers with a catalogue at hand could readily answer for themselves.

From Ontario, Can., come cheering words: "We often have short stories read at our gospel temperance meeting, and I am frequently asked 'where I get such nice temperance stories.' I both tell them and give the papers away, to let the good news spread."

IN TIME OF NEED.

"Have you a copy of the Birthday Book?" "Have you an extra silver pin?" were two questions asked us frequently on the outward-bound steamer, and it occurred to us that no white-ribboner should start from home without these essentials. Fountain pens were pressed into service constantly, and the possessor of a Birthday Book had an air of conscious superiority as she saw her neighbor asking for autographs on an ordinary pad of paper. Just what you need at state, county and National conventions is the White Ribbon Birthday Book. Price $1.

The School on Luneburg Heath. Translated from the German of Gustav Nieritz, by Mrs. Mary E. Ireland.

This is a plain story of a plain people. A wealthy family of Hamburg is forced to separate and hide because of difficulties between the German and French. The children of the wealthy merchant are taken for safety to a humble home on Luneburg Heath. There they learn priceless lessons of the true riches of love and piety.

In The Saddle. Second volume in the series "The Blue and the Gray—On Land," by Oliver Optic.

In The Saddle continues many of the characters which are prominent in "Brother against Brother," the preceding volume of the series. The real military operations of the war now commence and the residents of the section where the scene is laid see and feel the terrors and anxieties of Civil War. It requires the genius of Mr. Adams to convey to the youthful reader of the present day a realistic view of the exciting scenes and events of that trying time. The main incidents are historically correct, and Mr. Adams' faculty of clothing the facts of history in a fascinating way was never used to better advantage. Not the least important of the merits of the story is the sturdy patriotism which runs through it.

The Narrative of Captain Coignet, Soldier of the Empire, 1776–1850. An autobiographical account of one of Napoleon's body-guard. Edited from the original manuscript by Lorédan Larchey. Translated from the French by Mrs. M. Carey.

The present interest in everything that pertains to the career of Napoleon cannot help being intensified by the "Narrative of Captain Coignet" who was one of his body guard and fought in many of his campaigns. It is interesting to note that this was the last book which General Sherman read. Hitherto Mrs. Carey's excellent translation has been procurable only in a rather expensive edition; but the publishers have now decided to re-issue the work with all the fine illustrations in a popular edition at a price that will place it within the reach of all that are interested in whatever pertains to the life of Napoleon.

A Soulless Singer, by Mary Catherine Lee, is one of the choicest stories of the year. The thought upon which the author has built her narrative was expressed by Jenny Lind's teacher, who said that if he could but bring pain to her heart her singing would then be faultless. Mrs. Lee's heroine received a deathblow to all her hopes for fame when her master said, "And is it possible that a body should go out with the purpose to move the world to enthusiasm without its soul? . . You have a voice,—a voice quite remarkable. That is the body; but it needs that you should find its soul." His pupil answers him, "I shall find that soul! I must find it!" How she found it, how through suffering she learned to sing to souls, the author has told in a story of uncommon pathos, bright with gentle humor and relieved by ample touches of incident and description.

Ten New England Blossoms and Their Insect Visitors, by Clarence Moores Weed, is a charmingly readable little botany. The research is limited to a brief study of the habits of a few well-known plants and those insects which depend on them for their food and honey, and which in their turn are as indispensable to the existence and reproduction of the flowers. We are led to fresh realization and understanding of the inter-relation of the plant and animal world. The willow with its attracted insects, which carry the pollen to the pistillate flowers, is the first subject. The lessons are vivified by dainty illustrations which lead one from page to page with increasing interest in the Mayflower, Spring Beauty, Trillium, Jack-in-the-pulpit to the common Thistle which closes the series. The writer says "a plant is not to be studied as an 'absolutely dead thing,' but rather as a sentient being with 'the potency of life in it to be as active and as vigorously productive' as the surrounding conditions render possible."

Dr. Gray's Quest is a novel by Frances H. Underwood, LL.D. The scene is laid in a Massachusetts village, called Little Canaan, dating back to the days of Daniel Webster. The character sketches are varied and vigorous and the plot markedly original and well sustained. Amid the almost morbid clamors in the literary world for "something new," it is positively restful to come upon a book that handles well the commonplace virtues of commonplace people and pays a just tribute to quiet worth while it unmasks without any flourish that may be mistaken for approval, the common sins of a humanity, "the same all the world over." Just such a quiet, strong, restful story is Doctor Gray's Quest.

The Golden House. A novel by Charles Dudley Warner, is in the first place the perfection of book-making. No country except America could produce such a work of art; paper, type, pictures, binding, everything is delightful to the eye, the touch and the taste. The pictures are not intimations of life but reflect life itself, and it is enough to say of the letterpress that it is in keeping with the material execution. We have seen no more complete picture of life among the plutocrats. Whoever would know just how they sit and stand, walk and recline, eat and smoke, coquette and court, will get a far more complete and satisfactory idea from the book than he is ever likely to obtain by observation, for Mr. Warner knows his subject and reveals its "true inwardness" with microscopic clearness. Some will criticise his story because it is not sufficiently poetic; but the plutocrats do not lend themselves readily to the ideal. The best thing we can say about the book is that its whole teaching tends towards a clearer conception of true values, makes for the higher life of brotherhood, prophesies the day when such monstrosities as now fatten on monopolies shall be no longer possible. Any book that imparts as much knowledge in a style as masterly as that of Mr. Warner is well worth reading, and we wish our young people especially might read, ponder, and inwardly digest the teaching of The Golden House which does not come as an exhortation or a canting homily, but is embodied in the characters.

Russian Rambles, by Isabel F. Hapgood, fulfills one's expectations of bright and entertaining glimpses of that far-away land of the Czar. Realizing that we are being conducted by one unusually well equipped by her knowledge of the language, the people and their literature, we see through her eyes, and she has much to show us. Indeed, she gives us from her personal experiences very different ideas on many points from those formed on the testimony of other notable travelers. Visiting with her the office of registration of passports, the office of the chief of police, and the postoffice, we conclude that while admission to the high officials is obstructed by much formality, it is possible for one to be courteously received and permitted to remain in St. Petersburg, Moscow, or other large cities without being under continual espionage. Her experience with the censor, whose official duty it is to examine all foreign dailies and magazines, and to cut out objectionable articles or confiscate them entirely, is very amusingly told and not at all to her discredit as a quick-witted woman. The Century, for very obvious reasons, is one of the proscribed periodicals. It is on the black list and can only be received unopened by special permit which the censor grants at his discretion. Following is a partial account of her interview: "I explained my desire to receive, uncensured, a journal which was prohibited. 'Certainly,' said he, without inquiring how I knew the facts, 'just write down your application and sign it.' 'I don't know the form,' I answered. He seemed surprised at my ignorance of such an everyday detail, but fetched paper and dictated a petition, which I wrote down and signed. When we reached the point where the name of the publication was to be inserted, he paused to ask, 'How many would you like?' 'How many copies of the Century? Only one,' said I. 'No, no; how many periodical publications would you like?' 'How many can I have on this petition?' I retorted in Yankee fashion. 'As many as you please. Do you want four, six, eight? Write in the names legibly.' I told him I preferred to devote my time to Russian publications while in Russia, and that I would only add the name of the weekly which I was already receiving, merely with the object of expediting its delivery." A visit to the country home of Count Tolstoi brings us into comradeship with that variously estimated reformer. The book is delightfully bright and one of the best for summer reading.

"DO EVERYTHING"

has been brought out by our beloved Chieftain at her own expense, and is placed upon the American market by the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association that it may aid white-ribboners in the "all-round movement" it advocates.

"Everything is not in the temperance reform, but the temperance reform should be in everything."

"'Organized mother love' is the best definition of the white-ribbon movement, and it can have no better motto than, 'Make a chain, for the land is full of bloody crimes and the city of violence.'"

"If we can remember this simple rule, it will do much to unravel the mystery of the much controverted 'do everything policy,' viz.: That every question of practical philanthropy or reform has its temperance aspect, and with that we are to deal."

These extracts from the preface will suggest the helpfulness of the new manual. It should be purchased by unions in quantities at the nominal price of 25c.

Mrs. Barney's Bible Readings are so well known, and Mrs. Barney herself is so well loved of white-ribboners, that in announcing a Reading from her pen we feel sure of giving pleasure. As World's superintendent of penal, charitable and reformatory work and National evangelist, Mrs. Barney is, as may be imagined, one of the busiest of busy W. C. T. U. women; nevertheless she consented (at the urgent request of the editor) to prepare upon short notice the Reading for September. Her subject is "Heart Enlargement," and her words breathe that consecrated, uplifting spirit, that closeness to the divine and to the human, which is possible only to the soul whose life is "hid with Christ in God." The Reading is one which cannot fail to reach the heart and quicken the spiritual life of every reader.

Signal Notes.

Mr. Berry, an ex-hangman of London, England, is now lecturing on his former gruesome craft. He says that he has conducted over five hundred executions, but has never hanged a teetotaler.

George S. Montgomery, a wealthy member of the Salvation Army in California, is about to extend the missionary work of the army to Japan. General Booth will send a few recruits from London, and the party will sail in about a month under command of a Japanese lieutenant who was converted at Oakland, Cal.

In Berlin a law still exists prohibiting women scholars and apprentices joining a political society. Recently a few women formed a suffrage committee for the purpose of obtaining for women, equal political rights with men. The leaders of the movement were arrested and brought before a magistrate, who fined them and ordered the disbanding of the society.

An exchange reports that Siberia has a very peculiar temperance society, whose members are strict teetotalers every day of the year but one. On the first day of September each year the members meet, pledge themselves to abstain from the use of wine, beer and spirits for a whole year from the morrow. So for September 2 they are free from their vow, and indulge in intoxicants if they so choose.

In a recent sermon Dean Farrar stated that during the last year 8,000 cases of accidents were admitted to the London hospitals. One-fourth of the population of that city received medical or surgical aid from the hospitals. The annual expenditure exceeds by £25,000 the income of these institutions. "Londoners do not subscribe to them a sum equal to the sum which would give a glass of beer apiece to each inhabitant of the city."

Tadzu Sugiye is a Japanese young woman, for three years a student at Wellesley College, who is now teaching at Osaka, in a Christian school for girls. She has three classes in Chinese literature, two in English, one in the history of Japanese literature and one in botany, besides correcting Japanese composition of all the classes, and giving a lecture each week on Japanese rhetoric. Besides all this she gives lessons in "Yankee cookery."

The International Order of Good Templars, which met in Boston recently, had delegates from all the leading countries of the world. Its ritual is written in twenty languages, and it was the first temperance society that admitted women on terms of equality, away back in 1851, when it was organized in Oneida county, New York. Its best known exponent at this time is Conseulor Joseph Malins, of Birmingham, who has had more to do with extending its influence than any other living man.

The Woman's Improvement League, of Minneapolis, Minn., is engaged in carrying out plans for the beautifying of the city, and bettering the condition of its people. Shade trees have been set out on several streets; 7,108 school children have been furnished with flowerseeds, with instructions how to use them for the best results. They intend also to interest the children in exterminating the Russian thistle. The League will soon open cheap bathrooms with competent persons in charge.

Dr. N. S. Davis, at the annual meeting of the American Medical Association, held in Baltimore, read a paper on "Does Alcohol Ever Act as Food, as a Generator of any Natural Force in the Living Body?" in which he stated, that while men had been kept alive forty or fifty days on water, he had found no case, although he had sought diligently, where men had been kept alive half that time on diluted alcohol. "Vital force, heat force, motor force, nerve force, and muscular force are all impaired," said he, "by the influence of doses of alcohol."

In 1874 Mr. Wellesly C. Bailey, on his return to England from India, enlisted the interest of a few Christian people in the sad condition of the lepers of India. From the efforts of the committee then formed the work has grown until this year they report seventeen asylums of their own, eleven other similar institutions are receiving aid from them, and in eight places homes have been founded for children of lepers where it is hoped many may be saved from the sorrowful lot of their parents. The work is in operation in India, Burmah, Ceylon, China and Japan, and the mission works in connection with fifteen churches and societies.

February 8th, 1895.

The Dr. J. H. McLean Medicine Co.,
St. Louis, Mo.

Gentlemen: I feel it my duty to inform you of the great good I have received from Dr. J. H. McLean's Liver and Kidney Balm. I am sure it saved my life. I suffered for several years with Bright's Disease, aggravated by gravel in the left kidney. About two years ago the trouble got so bad that I could not leave my bed; had night sweats, extreme weakness, chills and my flesh had a blanched look. I did not expect to get well again. Eighteen months ago I began using the Liver and Kidney Balm. I used at first two bottles, which helped me so much I could leave the bed and go about my household duties; so I continued with it. I also began to pass the gravel. In all I passed five stones. I am now feeling entirely cured, but still taking the Balm occasionally to make sure. Doctor, I am unable to express my gratitude to God for my restoration to health, and I owe it, even my present existence, to your Liver and Kidney Balm. It is a grand medicine.

Yours respectfully,

Mrs. H. J. D.,
Cannellton, Ind.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

The Peruvian Congress opened at Lima, Friday.

Sixteen miners were drowned in Colorado mines, August 29.

Li Hung Chang has been appointed Imperial Chancellor for China.

The National Letter Carriers' Association convened in Philadelphia, September 2.

A dispatch from Tiflis announces a renewal of Armenian outrages at Kemath and several villages.

China has granted the French missions an indemnity of four million francs, fully covering the loss occasioned by anti-missionary riots.

Mrs. Eva A. Weed has received the official title of "draughtswoman" at Brooklyn, N. Y., eclipsing one hundred and eight men competitors in a civil service examination.

The government engineers have reported that the Chicago drainage canal is liable to lower the level of the great lakes, and the vessel owners are agitated over the possible results to navigation.

The Sultan bitterly complains of the attitude of Great Britain regarding the Armenian outrages, and appeals to France and Russia to use their influence with the English government to modify its just demands.

The Chinese minister called upon the United States Secretary of War, August 29, to deliver a cable message from his government to the effect that China intends to protect the American missionaries in her borders.

THE New York saloon-keepers' organization has pledged itself to expel any member who violated the excise law by opening his saloon or selling liquor on Sunday. The justices thereupon gave notice that all who would plead guilty August 30 should be fined only twenty-five dollars. Four hundred and twenty-five law violators rushed to take advantage of the opportunity to escape their full penalty.

THREE decided victories for women were experienced last week. The Montana conference of the Methodist church, on August 28, voted by an overwhelming majority (thirty-four to four) for the admission of women to the general conference, on August 30, the Cincinnati conference gave a unanimous rising vote (one hundred and thirty-three) for the Baltimore amendment which reads, "Nor more than two delegates for an annual conference and said delegates may be men or women," and on August 31, the Washington conference swelled the popular sentiment by a vote of forty-four to four. The arena of sex equality is broadening.

IT should be known to temperance people generally that the festivities attendant upon the coming of age of Mr. Somers Somerset, only child and heir of Lady Henry Somerset, and which involved well-nigh two thousand guests, were conducted without the use of intoxicant liquors in any form, nor did the fact excite sufficient remark to be reported by the press. All honor to Lady Henry Somerset for her staunch adherence to principles, and all honor to the great public that begins to comprehend the reasonableness of woman's work to advance the cause of a clear brain and steady hand. The tenants of the estates presented Mr. Somerset with a handsome present of gold and silver plate, and an address in which his mother's noble example was most highly commended. In replying, the loyal son said that he desired to keep the memory of his grandfather and grandmother before him, whose aims and wishes were always to help their tenants, and so long as his mother lived he hoped he might be able to assist her in promoting the welfare of her tenants on these estates, and assured them in conclusion that it was his highest purpose to maintain the tradition of his mother's family.

THE sorrowful tidings have come to us of the death in Bombay, of Rev. James L. Phillips, M. D., D. D., one of the best and truest men that ever gave his life for any cause. Dr. Phillips was the husband of our president of the W. C. T. U. in India and forwarded her as no other could in all her laborious efforts to promote the white ribbon movement. She traveled with him and together they accomplished an admirable work. Mrs. Phillips writes that she will carry forward the work in tender and devoted remembrance of him. "Indeed," she says, "I dare not leave it. So many doors are open for me, though I feel as if nearly all of the real me was now in heaven. The last article that swift pen of his sent out was for the White Ribbon—our little paper in India, and almost his last discourse was given before our India convention of the W. C. T. U." This honored and beloved brother was the son of the famous missionary, Rev. Dr. Jeremiah Phillips, and, born in India, he prepared himself in America for both medical and evangelistic service, and returned to the country of his birth in 1865. He gave twenty years to missionary work, returning to the United States from time to time to raise funds. He founded the Bible school at Midnapore and was its principal for many years. He wrote extensively and was honored by election to the moderatorship of the general conference at Marion, O., in 1886. We have but few to lose so precious to our cause as Dr. Phillips. May his mantle fall on that loving and faithful wife who is left in the great lonely country of the banyan tree.

APROPOS of the discussion of the peace and arbitration question in this issue of our paper we take pleasure in noting the recent action of the French Chamber of Deputies in this direction. By a unanimous vote the Chamber invites the government to negotiate as soon as possible the conclusion of a permanent treaty of arbitration between the French Republic and the United States of America, that the friends of peace in France and in our own country will take all the necessary steps to bring about the speedy consummation of this idea. With the treaty of permanent arbitration among American republics already concluded, a treaty of the same nature between the United States and England (unanimously recommended by the House of Commons in 1893) and one between this nation and France, the world may be said to be well on its way toward the realization of the pacific dreams of its poets and seers from Isaiah to the devout follower of the Prince of Peace in the nineteenth century.

WE sincerely commiserate our Canadian sisters in the removal of two of their prominent leaders. Mrs. Charles Archibald, president of the Eastern Maritime provinces, who returned from England less than a month ago, has been suddenly called back by the news of her only sister's death. She has resigned her office as she may be kept in England a long time, her mother being in very feeble health and alone. Mrs. Archibald's bright, energetic grasp of the position in the provinces will be a great loss, and she will be much missed at the approaching Dominion convention to be held in Quebec in November. Mrs. Todd, of New Brunswick, acting president of the Dominion W. C. T. U., and who was a prominent figure in the executive committee of the World's Association at the recent London Convention, is constrained by circumstances to make her home in Boston, Mass., for the next year or two. On this account she feels obliged to sever her connection with W. C. T. U. work in the Dominion after the convention. To say that this is a sorrow but lightly expresses not only Mrs. Todd's feelings but those of all who know of her intention.

WE have had many good things to say of the Illinois Woman's Alliance for its protection of women in the police courts of Chicago, but it has just adopted a new line of reformation against which we must raise our voice in protest. Dr. Luella Underhill, chairman of the police committee, has issued a circular in which she advocates as the most "rational" method, the licensing of disorderly houses, with medical inspection of the women and the building of a state home in the country on the cottage plan, where illegitimate children can be raised and trained to industrious pursuits. They would be known as "children of the state," and the home as a state institution. We are appalled at this plan—the deliberate fostering by the state of a hideous evil. Of what sort of sons is she cursed that grand old Illinois is thus asked to disgrace herself! And to think that this proposition comes from a woman's organization! If the plan had proposed state homes for destitute children and state hospitals for betrayed or sinful women, with a denunciation of the terrible wrong which brings about the terrible need, we could indorse it. But to make as its first provision the establishment and protection of these places of sin, through a legalized license fee, is enough to make the vilest man or woman shudder for the safety of the state and nation. We recall nothing in the history of "reformatory" work in which the evil to be reformed was made the principal agent in the reformation. Could there be greater encouragement offered to vice—free hospitals for the sick, free homes for the offspring and municipal protection to the offender? It is patent that the Woman's Alliance knows little of the heroic work of Mrs. Andrew and Dr. Bushnell in India, where government license of sin has produced the most appalling social conditions.

THE SIEGE OF JERICHO.

BY MARDIE E. GARNITZ.

Hush, not a tear! Here, in the region of the enemy,
Tears are mute oaths; we will proceed
Not as the others do, with shout and song
And rattle of the implements of war,
But as the federation of the clouds,
The massing of whose downy forms
Portend the coming tempest.
Why seven times instead of once,
The selfsame weary and unpleasant road
I find it hard to comprehend,
But since I cannot understand
And do not know the reason why,
I will keep on in the appointed way,
Nor heed the missiles from the wall,
Nor words more difficult to hear,
Nor doubt that when the time is come
And it is given us to shout,
Impediments shall fade away,
And every man proceed from where he stand
Straight, straight before him to the thing he will.

A WHITE RIBBON STRIKE.

In Two Chapters.

BY ADA M. MELVILLE.

CHAPTER II.

On the platform sat the ten "strikers;" many in the audience were quietly curious, others looked amused, still others were grave-faced and thoughtful. When the opening hour arrived, the Little Old Lady rose and in a low voice, yet so clear it was heard by every one, said:

"We are here to-night in the interest of our homes, yours and mine. I will not make a speech, for you all know me. There is one here, though, whom we call in our W. C. T. U. meetings, our Silent Member, and she will make the first plea for home—your home and mine."

Every one knew the Silent Member, too, and as she rose in answer to a signal from the Little President, many memories were busy with the young girl's life, remembering her beautiful mother who eighteen years ago had defended her three helpless little ones from a murderous knife brandished by their drunken father. There were scores in the room who had not forgotten the awful day later, when the mother and her two babes were found dead beside a raving maniac who had once been their protector, and how the eldest little girl was found speechless by her dead mother, stricken into lifelong silence by the horror of the hour. Her presence always made a deep impression on her audiences—for she was a skilled musician; to-night the effect was indescribable.

She was dressed in white with a pure white rose in her hair. As she faced the people, instead of her customary modest bow and smile, she stretched out one hand as if in appeal and swept the upturned faces with her prayer-lit eyes. Hardened sinners averted their gaze; little children looked at her as they might have looked upon the face of an angel; many were moved to tears. Then the music began. Her appeal was made through the old, old melody, "Home, Sweet Home."

As you listened you could see the home of your childhood with mother moving about the fireside tasks; father was coming down the road in the glow of the sinking sun; baby was crowing with glee because papa was near. You could see father and mother sitting by the evening lamp. You were sleepy and it was almost time for the Trundle Bed song. "Has my boy been good to-day?" Oh, how you wished you had been good! "We'll tell Father all about it—Heavenly Father." How sweet it was to kneel with one hand in mother's and father's hand upon your head and be forgiven. You could hear again mother's low song—

"Hush, my babe, lie still and slumber," while baby crooned a sleepy accompaniment; . . . The tones of the Silent One's Violin Voice changed. You were a young man now. The quick step of life was yours. You paused—once—twice—beside open graves in the little churchyard. Father and mother were there. You could hear faint echoes of the old lullaby amid the solemn strains of the funeral hymn:

"Holy angels guard thy bed."

But life and love called you; a wedding march filled out the measures and then—the lullaby was heard again mingled with children's voices. There is a jar in the Violin Voice—the sweet home melody is disturbed. There are sounds of falling tears and bitter words—drowned by the clink of wine-glasses and maudlin laughter—a baby's cry—a wife's appeal; . . . The music stops, then goes on again,—a bitter, bitter wail, an awful, awful cry, a dirge. The drink demon has done his worst; these are the Voices of despair, desolation, degradation, death. Does death end all? The audience sits hushed. The Silent Member holds the trembling bow poised in air. Her burning eyes search theirs. Does death end all? She raises her eyes to heaven with a smile that thrills them, the bow drops and again the old melody fills the hall,

"Home, home, sweet, sweet home."

There was no applause—it was an appeal too deep for tears or smiles. The Little President rose. "We will pray," she said, and moved by a mighty impulse the whole audience knelt with her before the Throne of Grace. The sound of a slamming door jarred on the silence—a saloon-keeper had gone down to his house condemned.

It fell to the Emphatic member to make known the program of the hour and very emphatically she told the story.

"We of the white-ribbon army are banded together against the saloon for our homes," she said. "We have prayed and toiled. Are you helping us? Are you helping us? Are you helping us? God forgive you if you are not. Yes, we have struck. We have struck a blow for God and Home and Native Land. Some of you came to our homes full of curiosity to learn the nature of our strike. We think you went away in sympathy with us. We pray you did."

She continued by outlining the work of the union and the work of the saloon in her own emphatic way, closing by an appeal to mothers.

Then the others spoke, each outlining her department in its relation to the home and against the saloon. Finally those who had made a call to find out about the strike were invited to the platform. Not all responded, but a goodly number. Testimonies were called for regarding their experience and most earnest witness was given to renewed interest in the work of the W. C. T. U. because of the faithfulness of the ten strikers.

The Society Girl was there. She was pale but brave. "I went to make fun," she said, "and I went to the home of the Little Old Lady. But I—I—stayed to pray. I will try to be a better daughter and a white ribbon daughter." She was a popular girl for her pretty face and merry ways and the audience applauded.

Well—the meeting went on and on. Total abstinence pledges were circulated and signed. Money pledges toward the work of the union were called for and many given. New members were canvassed for but not admitted until they had expressed themselves as determined to attend as many meetings of the union as they possibly could and contribute as much to W. C. T. U. work as they thought the Lord really wanted them to spend for God and Home and Native Land.

The Crank of them all made a vigorous plea for her beloved UNION SIGNAL and succeeded in getting the names of ten business men, three clergymen, five "interested" women and fifteen of the ninety delinquents in the local membership.

Six prominent church-workers promised to devote one night each to the reading-room, to be present there all evening and give invitations to men and boys on the streets as they went to and from their work.

The meeting did not remain a formal one all this time—it had broken up long before but one of the Ten Original Strikers was at each door and it was almost impossible to get out without pledging yourself to something.

But the strike was not "declared off" even after all this. Every one of the ninety was called on and with the exception of two who had good reason for their apparent neglect, were made to pay over again the dues for the last year during which they had so failed to give of their time, also their dues for the coming year to make good their promise of reform.

The Alert Treasurer did not resign. What is more she gave five dollars to the Crank of them all for leaflets for free distribution, and each department was given a small sum to help its cause along.

When the first business meeting of the year was announced, there was a full house. The saloon-keeper across the way was standing at his door when sweet music reached his ears and he recognized again the Violin Voice of the Silent Member. It was "Nearer, my God, to Thee," blending softly into "Home, Sweet Home." He could not bear it. He had been warring with conviction for days. He strode across the street and pushed the white-curtained door wide open. The violin spoke on in lowered tones while he promised before God to stop his iniquitous business. He was an abrupt fellow, shy in the presence of good women, and as soon as he had stated his errand he dashed out again. The Silent Member caught the victory-note and her responsive Voice gave out the jubilate strain,

"Praise God, from whom all blessings flow,"

while the Little Old Lady led in a prayer which was all praise, and the Little President on her knees among them all shed tears of joy out of the fulness of her faithful heart.

PEACE AND INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION.

A Symposium.

[The following contributions from well-known peace advocates are sent to THE UNION SIGNAL in response to an invitation to present in a few words the necessity for maintaining peace among Christian nations, the advisability of arbitration methods and the importance of training the youth of to-day in the principles of peace. —ED.]

WAR SPIRIT OFTEN CULTIVATED BY MOTHERS.

The true honor of a nation is conspicuous only in deeds of justice and beneficence, securing and advancing human happiness. He is the benefactor most worthy of honor who carries comfort to wretchedness, dries the tear of sorrow, relieves the unfortunate, feeds the hungry, clothes the naked, enlightens the ignorant, unfastens the fetters of the slave, exalts the hours of life, and by generous example inspires love for God and man. The honors of martial victory are still often chanted by the lips of women. The mother rocking the infant upon her knee, stamps the images of war upon his tender mind; she nurses his slumber with its music, pleases his waking hours with its stories, selects for his playthings the plume and the sword, and when the youth becomes a man his country invites his service in war, and holds before him the prizes of worldly honor. Even in the church of God is heard the ear-piercing fife and the thump of the drum, with the parade of bristling bayonets. It is not strange that the spirit of war finds a home among us and its honors continue to be coveted.

To Louis Philippe belongs the honest fame of first from the throne publishing the truth that "Peace is endangered by instruments of war." He thought the time was coming when we should get entirely rid of war in all civilized countries. This time we hail! It is surely coming. God has promised it. See what has already been accomplished through arbitration from the time of the arbitration between the United States and Great Britain about the lake boundaries, in 1816, to the treaty signed by the Pan-American congress of 1890. Thus the day is hastening which the prophets told about and which the angels sang of at the birth of the Prince of Peace.

Highland, N. Y. EMILIE U. BURGESS.

"NEITHER SHALL THEY LEARN WAR ANY MORE."

The inhabitants of the islands of the seas, who had no written language, and were strangers to the arts and sciences of civilization, when first visited by missionaries had a military training for the young, the objects of which were identical with those of the Christian (?) military instruction of to-day. Skill in taking human life, victory over enemies, and the glory of the warrior! The first duty of the successful missionary was to teach these people that war and bloodshed were contrary to the will of the God of Love; that man must love his enemies and forgive all who trespass against him; and to this end he must not "learn war any more." Many received the glad tidings of the gospel; they destroyed their carnal weapons, and those who were once enemies rejoiced in Christian fellowship.

Under such circumstances how discomfiting to the missionary for a huge war vessel from his native Christian land, to put into the peaceful port, display their deadly engines of war, their gaily uniformed officers and men and their artful military evolutions! No human logic could enable the native mind to see a moral distinction between the refinement of cruelty displayed in civilized warfare with its more destructive appliances, and the barbarism of cruelty enforced in uncivilized conflicts.

Many eminent missionaries and ministers of the gospel are learning by experience that they can not favor one method of carnal warfare and denounce another, and are now sounding the anthem of peace.

Zanesville, O. H. W. BLACKBURN.

TRUE PATRIOTISM.

In proportion as Christ's gospel spreads and is accepted throughout the world, so the peace idea, which is one of the phases of the gospel, grows in the minds of men and influences the nations and sovereigns of the earth. Bowed down under burdens of taxation for the support of standing armies, the people are longing for relief, and their rulers, in view of the constantly increasing destructiveness of the weapons of warfare, are beginning to listen to the voice of wisdom and to accept propositions for arbitration.

With the consequences of war so vividly before us, and the vision opening to our comprehension of this reign of Christ applying to us in a temporal as well as a spiritual sense, we owe to our children the strongest obligations to teach them the principles of peace.

We cannot do this by placing in their hands the weapons of warfare, by giving them the army drill, by impressing their minds with the attractiveness of army parade, or the pomp of war. True patriotism will restore life, not destroy it, will suffer rather than do wrong. We should teach the children the love of Christ for all mankind. We should teach them to shun every thought of jealousy, malice or hatred and all use of the weapons of death.

ELIZABETH B. MILES,
State Supt., Peace Dept.

Newberry, Ore.

METHODS OF TEACHING HISTORY AT FAULT.

As civilization advances we are coming nearer to that period when nations shall learn war no more, when swords shall be beaten into plowshares and spears into pruning-hooks.

England's Queen will be honored in future ages for this—that time and again she has dispelled the clouds of war that were gathering over her kingdom. A little womanly tact, a timely letter to a Prime Minister, these have been the peaceful influences that have saved the lives of her subjects. She has been a student of the Bible, and the Golden Rule, to her, has a meaning.

Duelling was once the code of honor in our own and in other countries. But the law of the land, sustained by public opinion, has put a stop to the dreadful practice. Even so may all war be ended.

We ask that more history shall be taught in our public schools. But histories as now written are largely a record of the wars of the people. The years of peace and plenty are not dwelt upon. This is wrong. We need better books to be placed in the hands of the young. Our young people are fascinated by the lives of the old heroes of war; their eyes sparkle at the exploits of Alexander the Great, and of Napoleon Bonaparte, while the precepts of Christ and of the loving John are carefully excluded from our public schools.

Mothers are to be blamed for placing the toy drums and firearms in the hands of their children. Our religion is one of peace and good will to men; and if we faithfully followed the teachings of Christ we should have peace in our homes, in our neighborhood, in our country and in the whole earth.

MRS. S. M. PERKINS.
Cleveland, O.

NOBLER CHANNELS FOR CHRISTIAN PATRIOTISM.

Taxation! Why such enormous accumulation of money in the treasury of the United States? Is it to enable the followers of Christ to build forts and arsenals and ships of war, or to boast of a powerful navy? Is it to make our neighbors afraid, instead of feeling friendly toward us? The meek and lowly Jesus tells us to love our neighbors as ourselves. Christian nations should be always on the alert to settle every misunderstanding, every disagreement, and to cherish the mutual welfare of all concerned. A tribunal composed of wise statesmen, selected from each of the principal governments of the world, would tend mightily to this end.

What means the marching through our streets of boys in military dress and armed? Why are classes, met to learn the Sermon on the Mount, equipped in gay uniforms and officered by lads, whose ability to lead should be directed into nobler channels? Do we realize how much is at stake when instruction is given in military tactics, and the paraphernalia of war is brought, not only into our secular schools, but into our places of worship?

When we place the implements of war in the hands of our youth, and train them in the manipulation of destructive weapons we must expect a rapid growth of the military spirit. Let us teach our young people growing into citizenship to be true heroes by becoming champions of every good cause.

INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION POSSIBLE.

The terrible picture presented by Japan and China in their recent sanguinary conflicts, and the horrible atrocities to which the Armenians have been subjected at the hands of their present masters, have opened the eyes of many to the evils of war and the necessity of arbitration. If, when Corea was a bone of contention between Japan and China, other nations could have arbitrated, it would have been far better for Corea, which now stands a fair chance of being spoiled and conquered by Russia. Arbitration succeeding in the first instance, would have prepared the way for similar success in the other, and peace would have continued to reign.

Every Christian must see the inconsistency of a follower of the Prince of Peace engaging in, or in any wise sanctioning, an aggressive war, with all its attendant horrors. While some may advocate the protection of home, and "the honor of the flag," when patriots are needed on the battle-field, others are distressed at the bare idea of shedding human blood, and so shrink from war that they are sometimes charged with cowardice and want of patriotism. Better be cowardly than brutal. Best of all is it to be brave, and a peacemaker. That the United States should be an arbitrator in differences between nations is an honor to our government, and a credit to the discernment of the nations who ask for arbitration and accept it. Our future statesmen and stateswomen (for our land has both) can only be fittingly prepared for this honorable work among the peoples of the earth, by the training which makes the idea of the possibility of peace among all nations a desired and expected end. Hence, the brigades of boys in day and Sunday-schools, and the drilling of both sexes in some places, is greatly to be deprecated. Youth should be inspired to wage war only with evils, not with human beings.

PREPARE FOR PEACE.

Nothing destroys Christianity so effectually as war. John Wesley, in referring to his work in certain towns, says, "What a glorious work of God was there from 1740 to 1744. But the war that followed tore it all up by the roots and left scarce a trace of it behind, insomuch that when I diligently inquired a few years after I could not find one that retained the life of God." Every commandment in the decalogue is broken in time of war. The Sabbath is wholly disregarded as a day for worship or rest. Theft and robbery are encouraged and licentiousness is almost universal. Napoleon said, "The worse the man the better the soldier." How can we expect Christianity to advance in the world if men are taught to disobey Christ's teachings because of a so-called necessity?

As we teach the youth of to-day the men of to-morrow will act. If we train our boys to be soldiers they will act the part of soldiers when they become men. We should think it wild fanaticism to teach our children how to run a saloon after the most approved style and then expect them to be total abstainers. Total abstinence from war is more clearly taught in the New Testament than total abstinence from intoxicants.

The patriot may more surely serve his country by living for it than by fighting and dying for it. "Nations best prepared for war oftenest engage in war." So if we expect to live at peace with other nations and establish Christ's kingdom on earth we must prepare for peace. Missionaries tell us that before they can induce barbarous nations to accept Christianity they must get them to give up their tribal wars. Surely organized warfare by so-called Christian people is no less a hindrance to Christianity!

WAR FORBIDDEN BY THE GOSPEL.

"Put up thy sword into his place, for they that take the sword shall perish with it."—Matt. 26: 52. Wickliffe said, "When Christ said that to Peter He sheathed the swords of all Christians to the end of time." The early Christians understood that the gospel forbade all carnal warfare; and we are told by numerous early writers that for more than two hundred years after Christ no Christian could be found in the armies of the world. They refused to bear arms, and suffered themselves put to death rather than disobey Christ by killing people. In no part of the Christian era has Christianity spread so rapidly as during the first three centuries when Christians refused to fight. They became a majority in the provinces of Rome before the end of the third century. But when Constantine professed to be converted, and continued at the head of his troops, he soon led Christians into his armies. The result was a thousand years of moral darkness known in history as "The Dark Ages."

War is sin. We impugn no man's motives. Through ignorance of the truth, men with honest motives have done most unrighteous deeds, from Paul imprisoning Christians down to the last war in which Christians split each other's heads open about some boundary line. War is irrational. The mind is the only agency that can determine a question of rights. There is no sense of right in the muscle, none in swords nor in powder and lead. Man should be distinguished from other animals by his reason. But a contest by war is a contest of unreasoning brute force.

You ask me if I believe in military training. I will answer with a story. A Friend (Quaker) took his son to a state college, asking that he be excused from the required military drill.

"On what grounds?" said the president.

"Because we Friends believe war to be forbidden by the gospel, and it is a relic of barbarism. Besides, I agree with John Wesley who said, 'War is the business of hell.' And I am not sending my son to college to learn the 'business of hell,' but to learn only that which will make him a useful citizen."

"But one doesn't need to go to war because he takes the military drill," said the president.

"If you don't propose to follow the devil's business, what do you want to learn his trade for?" said the Friend.

Of course the president excused the young Friend from military drill.

ALL CAN HELP.

An international court of arbitration is the hope of the present, the certain realization of the future.

Such a court can only be instituted by insisting upon the present maintenance of peace among the nations and by educating the children of to-day in the belief that true glory consists not in physical feats of warfare, but in mental and moral ability. Fame means a great deal to the young, and so long as they are taught to honor the military man above any other, they will, on reaching mature years, be loath to resort to arbitration as a means of adjusting national or international difficulties. This long desired court will doubtless arise through the direct efforts of the legislators of the foremost civilized nations. Eminent statesmen of England and the United States have within a few years been agitating this very important subject.

But all have a part in this work; mothers and teachers by their instructions to the young, clergymen by their sermons—all, by sending petitions to our halls of legislation, can help bring in that glad day which the angels announced nearly nineteen hundred years ago.

The present is an admirable time for the agitation of this subject. Old feuds are being forgotten. All over the world there are comparatively few occasions for "the digging up of the hatchet." If nothing occurs to incite international animosity, and if the present efforts in the interest of peace continue, there is nothing to prevent this court of arbitration from becoming an accomplished fact in the near future.

It is true there seem to be obstacles in the way—such as the increased navy, the large number of military stories now being published, the efforts to introduce the military drill into the schools, and, most important of all, that enemy within the encampment of the Prince of Peace—the boys' brigade. We can gain encouragement, however, from the following anecdote. A soldier at Thermopylæ said that the arrows of the barbarians were so numerous as to hide the sun. Leonidas replied, "Then we shall have the great advantage of fighting in the shade."

ALICE MAY DOUGLAS.

A HINDRANCE TO CHRISTIAN PROGRESS.

First, it is heathenish to settle disputes by force of arms. As our own General Sherman said, "War is a barbarism that cannot be refined."

Second, it hinders the spread of Christ's kingdom. If Christian nations would use their influence to prevent war semi-barbarous nations would be impressed with this Christlike action, and be led to follow their example.

Third, higher civilization is impeded by war. When war devastates a country, commerce is at a standstill, the government is impoverished and it takes years, perhaps a century, to recover from its ravages.

Fourth, the wisest and best statesmen advocate the settlement of difficulties by arbitration. Prince Bismarck said in his birthday speech only a short time ago, "I have always been a friend of peace, and to that end have not shunned sacrifices." Even the Mikado of Japan when peace was proclaimed with China, tells his people that "through peace national prosperity is best promoted."

When boys' brigades were introduced it was with the hope that they might attract boys to the Sunday-school and hold those already in. Christian workers did not and do not think of the warlike spirit they are fostering, of the insult to the King of Peace in whose house they are training the men of to-morrow to ignore the teachings of Christ. We should show our boys a better and more Christlike way of settling disputes than by the gun or the sword. We should teach our youth that there is more honor and glory in conquering our tempers, in forgiving our enemies, in refusing to fight, than in being captain of a boys' brigade. We should show them the horrors of war, its dark side rather than its "pomp and circumstance."

PEACE SENTIMENT GROWING.

The necessity for maintaining peace among Christian nations demands the attention of every follower of the Prince of Peace. Aside from biblical commands human prosperity demands it. Property destroyed, commerce crippled, nations laid waste, are sad enough blots upon God's earth, but visit Arlington Heights, where 11,800 white stones mark the dead, slain by the hand of their fellowmen, even while their eager, bloodthirsty passions were at their height. Ah! such condition for a soul to meet its Creator!

One monument tells the legend, "To the memory of over 4,000 unknown dead." God pity the broken-hearted wives, mothers, sisters and friends! And this is but one among our national cemeteries, and ours with its thousands slain, but one nation among many!

There is no moral right that humanity should carry on wholesale murder, for such is war. Can any one tell us of benefits derived from war? We praise God that each year brings renewed courage to the various Peace Associations, for "peace hath her victories no less renowned than war." Our educated young people are holding the standard high; from primary schools where the peace bands gather the eager little members, through high schools and seminaries to college halls the clarion call hath gone forth, boys' brigades notwithstanding—"We make for peace by arbitration!" The young manhood and womanhood of our nation are going forth to work for peace in a world where prejudice has already been broken down by pioneers in this cause. Our hope lies in the glorious youth of to-day, and when—

"All hearts in sweet attune
Shall swiftly link in ringing chime,
Then shall our peace be wafted soon
To every nation, every clime."

TWO LINES OF SUCCESS.

It is often said by apparently sensible people that the nature of men is such that from time to time they will necessarily fight; that for this reason war has always existed, and hence will always exist. Tens of thousands of Christian men and women reason themselves into indifference about war, if not into positive support of it, by this irrational and essentially immoral mental process. Having gone so far, they naturally take another step and land in open approval of army extension and naval development and enlargement of the militia and military training for all boys, in order that the country may be ready for the fighting which is certain to come. The counter argument may be briefly stated in two parts.

First, war being wicked and inhuman ought not to exist, and whatever ought not to exist, in the way of social, organized evil, can be abolished if men and communities and nations will do their duty. If some are disobedient this does not excuse others. The faithful are to work with absolute assurance of success, because our Leader has told us that every plant which His Father has not planted shall be plucked up.

Secondly, war can be abolished, totally and irrevocably, because it has already been prevented in a large number of cases. This prevention has been brought about chiefly by two means, neutralization and arbitration. Mediation, conciliation and peace-diplomacy have done something, but of these I cannot here speak.

Switzerland was neutralized in 1815, at the downfall of Napoleon, by the congress of Vienna. Belgium was neutralized by the Treaty of London in 1831, and this neutralization was made permanent in 1839.

Who shall say, reasoning from their previous history, how many wars have been prevented by the neutralization of these two countries alone, to say nothing of the neutralization of other territory? At a public meeting in Boston a short time since a speaker asked, Why not extend this idea and neutralize all the world? Why not, surely! It can be done, it will be done.

Even more conspicuous in preventing wars has been the process of arbitration. This policy—the outgrowth of the moral protest against war—has, in a period of eighty years, settled one troublesome case on the average each year. Why, then, can it not be made hereafter to settle all troublesome questions between civilized countries? This argument of success, with its eighty bristling points, ought to appeal even to the most stubborn doubter and convert him to sound thought and sound speech on this question.

TRUE HEROES.

Peace has brought out more and greater heroes than were ever developed in war.

"The drying up a single tear has more of honest fame than shedding seas of gore."

It is doubtless better, braver and more patriotic to live for one's country than to die for it. It requires more courage to stand the fires of persecution, misunderstanding and misinterpretation without faltering than to stand firm amid the firing of shot and shell. A person who can brave unjust slurs and repulsive criticism must have more stamina than it requires to stand before a cannon's mouth. The bulwarks of opposition are harder to surmount than the armies of the enemy in martial array. The fortresses erected by the saloon-keepers and by the "Brewers' Union" are far more difficult to demolish than was Fort Sumter; and American politicians are more impenetrable and immovable than a Monitor, a Merrimac, or any other iron-clad "man-of-war."

A philanthropist is greater than a general. A Howard, a Lincoln, a Phillips, a Garrison, an Elizabeth Fry, or a Frances Willard is more worthy of a world's homage, I believe, than a Bonaparte or a Wellington. And there are many not known to history, but whose names are recorded in heaven, who in humble homes, in retired sick-rooms, in the recesses of their own hearts, have been victors in silent battles. Many a brave warrior in physical combat has suffered in vain, but these moral heroes never. They advocate principles that never die.

Great achievements have been accomplished by arbitration, and the results have been quite as satisfactory as when obtained by physical strength and force of arms.

The W. C. T. U. department of peace and arbitration is arrayed against international and civil war, capital punishment, prize fighting and slugging matches, and against all cruelty and every form of "man's inhumanity to man." It claims that to take human life under any circumstances is overstepping the bounds of human rights, and that to do so cannot be morally legalized.

WILLARD HALL NOONTIDE LINKS.

RESUME.

It is now five months since the "Voice" said to me, "Set thy hand to Willard Hall." These months have been pleasant, full of work, study and results. The most critical observer will concede a marked improvement in the character of the meetings, and those gifted with prophecy say we are on the eve of victories.

Between two and three hundred people come each day, and it goes without argument that we have the largest noon meetings in the city.

One of the sweetest of women is Mrs. A. S. Kessler, who has been my constant helper and wise counsellor, faithful at the pledge table, mighty in prayer, with faith strong and clear, and true as the stars.

Miss Thomas, of Bethesda Mission, has been faithful at the organ, and the janitor, Edward M. Harris, a student from the Moody Institute, has led the singing each day, and found time to save three boys besides.

For seven Mondays and seven Wednesdays, Rev. M. H. Lyon, of Harvey, and Rev. J. D. Leek, of Batavia, came to expound the Word. They came at the right time and won all hearts, grand young men, of whom the world will hear much later on.

Then the Lord sent us A. H. Kaylor for ten days, and I used to think that if he fastened his eyes on a sinner, that sinner might as well make up his mind to be saved first as last.

Not the least behind him, but entirely different, is W. H. Murphy, evangelist from Englewood, who, during these hot days has been pleading the cause of the Nazarene, to the convincing and convicting of souls.

Two of our best days were when Katharine Lente Stevenson, National corresponding secretary, and Helen M. Barker, our National treasurer, came to speak for us.

The leader has made a number of mistakes, and confidently expects to make more. She needs "grit, grace and gumption" and the prayers of the saints, and is very glad when now and then some one writes to say, "I read the Links."

CORRESPONDENCE

CHAUTAUQUA COMMENCEMENT.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—This has been a great day for Chautauqua; lectures, concerts and entertainments were forgotten and the day devoted entirely to one great event, the graduation of those who have completed their studies in the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle (C. L. S. C.) There were processions, banners and music. Graduates from our leading colleges for men and women, and old gray-haired patriots who never enjoyed the pleasure of searching for truth behind college walls, marched side by side through the golden gate and up to the great amphitheater where the commencement address was delivered by Mr. Hamilton Mabie, editor of The Outlook.

The Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle is a home school; its members are in every state in the Union and in foreign lands. They are men and women of every occupation. It is essentially free to all; it is a people's school, there are no walls or fences to keep away those who wish to learn. This great university has no ancient buildings covered with ivy, no venerable foundations. Its graduates have never all met anywhere in one body, and yet they are one in heart and purpose, one in the common companionship of study.

The working man or woman may go home at night and enjoy an hour with Tennyson or Shakespeare or read the history of great and good deeds. The C. L. S. C. is a system of self education, a system which has had a great influence upon the educational life of the century. The books for this course of reading cost about five dollars a year, and the subjects, while varied, are related and within their limits form a true education. The reading imposed upon the members requires about forty minutes a day for ten months. It keeps people up-to-date, it keeps them young, it drives the cobwebs from the brain.

Dr. Mabie said in his commencement address, "There must be a connection between morality and art. No man can rightly interpret life for us who is not a healthy, moral, sane man. An author who helps us must be a man who lives in harmony with the fundamental laws of life, and a man whose artistic nature is not limited by the grosser passions, but who seeks for all that is good and pure and creative. The ability to accomplish great things comes only from the realization of our own immortality.

"Zest in work, freshness of spirit and delight in life are the things we lose first when age comes upon us, but it should not be so. It is grand to see old people taking an interest in great questions. If we are immortal let us be immortal. A great human life should have no dying out of the fires, no lessening of youthful enthusiasm. Even with the dying body there comes maturity and power. Sharing in noble deeds preserves our youth."

Our W. C. T. U. conferences this year were very interesting. Chautauquans were charmed with our National secretary, Mrs. Stevenson, who presented our work in a friendly, gracious and womanly way. Our hearts ached for her when she was called away by the great loss of her father. The remaining conferences were conducted by Mrs. Emily D. Martin, who at one meeting presented the department of purity in literature and art. She said many things which were a revelation to some women present and urged their coöperation. She asked that if any one knew of any impure literature circulating in their town they would communicate with her. A discussion of "Trilby" followed, and it was the opinion of many leading women that "Trilby" is not a fit book to read because of its impurity. A lady who is at the head of one of our colleges said that out of twenty of her college girls who read "Trilby" nineteen denounced the book. We were delighted to have the pleasure of listening to two original temperance stories read by Mrs. Alden (Pansy) at one of our conferences. The subject of the Temple was presented at one of our noonday meetings, and all agreed that it behooved every W. C. T. U. woman to do what she could. Many words of praise were spoken concerning the work done by our "clear-headed" Mrs. Carse.

On Sunday, the 11th of August, a beautiful memorial service was held for those who have been connected with Chautauqua but have been called to that greater field. Loving words were spoken of Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge and Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, whom Chautauquans long ago learned to love.

The young women at Chautauqua often visit our room. Last night three bright girls spent the evening here and we talked of the Y work and this morning one of them, a dear, bright college girl, said to me, "We talked last night until after twelve o'clock and we have decided that we must have a Y in our college if you will tell us how to begin."

There are many dear saints who do not talk much but who work a great deal and we realize this more and more as we meet the quiet home women here from all parts of the world and their eyes glow as they say, "This cause lies nearest to my heart, it is the Lord's work." People are beginning to say good-bye and the Girls' Club closed last week with beautiful exercises. Three prizes were given by Bishop Vincent for the three best essays on "True Womanliness."

Chautauqua is the place to find much which is uplifting and helpful. Here we are brought into sympathy with great literature and great men, we are strengthened, our hearts are warmed, our ideals enriched. We learn how to find something true and beautiful in our own lives no matter how shut in they may be, we learn to make bold war against self and sin and to do our best to be right and help our fellowmen to be right. Don't fail, dear white-ribboners, to come to Chautauqua next year.

RHENA E. MOSHER.

IN MEMORY OF DR. PHILLIPS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The July number of the White Ribbon for India brings the sad news of the death of Rev. Dr. J. L. Phillips, husband of Mrs. Mary Phillips, the beloved president of the W. C. T. U. for India. Many hearts will be uplifted in prayer for her in this great bereavement, and our deepest sympathy is hers. How greatly and wisely Dr. Phillips aided the W. C. T. U. work in India since Mrs. Phillips took up the presidency can never be told. One of his last and most touching addresses was given before the W. C. T. U. convention of the Northwest Provinces. The last article he wrote was for the "Young People's Corner" of the White Ribbon. It closes with this quotation:

"Life is a leaf of paper white,
Whereon each one of us may write
His word or two—and then comes night."

"His word or two" for more than thirty years has been in India seed of the most fruitful sowing, largely in that best of soil, the hearts of children. For long years to come, not only Christian missionaries and ministers, but our W. C. T. U. and temperance societies of all names, will continue to gather in rich sheaves of his sowing. The loss to India of Dr. Phillips as a beautiful exponent of Christian living, as a missionary, evangelist, Sunday-school union secretary, and always and everywhere an ardent temperance worker, is incalculable.

The White Ribbon gives fresh evidence of success in four added pages. The reports of the crowded meeting of the W. C. T. U. convention of the Northwest Provinces in a fashionable hill station seem almost incredible to one who knew the absolute apathy in regard to temperance among all, save in a few brave hearts, in that section of the country less than two years ago. A most substantial evidence of the active interest in temperance in these Provinces is the decision of that division of the W. C. T. U. to defray the expense of Miss Vardy as private secretary to the White Ribbon and the best interests of the work, a post which she has filled so faithfully during the last year. The division of the Northwest Provinces alone reports as many unions and Loyal Temperance Legions as there were in the whole of India less than a year and a half ago. The call for temperance literature in English and the vernaculars is imperative, and funds for this are urgently needed. Miss Rhoda Lazarus, of Benares, is hard at work in her department of literature. Benares will be the headquarters for literature for the Northwest Provinces. Here will be available English, Urdu and Hindi literature. These languages in that section of India alone are used by more than one hundred million of people. From the native state of Baroda on the other side of India where Gujerati is spoken comes this note: "The Dewan of the Baroda state, in sending a donation for the translation of temperance literature, wrote that he wishes us every success in the noble work which we have undertaken. We have also received congratulations from other officials who have kindly helped us with donations."

The White Ribbon is a power in India for the temperance cause, and one of the most manifest evidences to English speaking natives, that Christianity teaches temperance and not drunkenness, as too many of them have supposed. If any one wishes to further the cause of Christian missions in India they cannot do better than to aid the vernacular temperance literature fund, or to become a shareholder of the White Ribbon by paying one dollar a year for five years, or a subscriber to this most interesting monthly for fifty cents a year.

Delaware, O. JEANNETTE G. HAUSER.

THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT IN NORWAY AND DENMARK.

NORWAY.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—This year the Danish and Norwegian temperance workers have had a grand union meeting at Christiania, Norway. Great preparations were made in Norway for the reception of their Danish visitors. The Norwegian Parliament had even appropriated five thousand kroner (5,000 dollars) and Christiania city council two thousand kroner to be used on this occasion. About nine hundred Danes visited Norway, and they received a royal welcome in the land of the Midnight Sun. They had chartered two steamboats to take them over the Skagerak. As Denmark is what we in Danish call an "Eng Land (a land of meadows)—a name which they also gave the home of the present Englishman hundreds of years ago—this visit to the rockbound Norway was a novel thing to them. This grand temperance demonstration did much to strengthen the land and cheer the hearts of our temperance friends north as well as south of the Skagerak.

The Norwegian Total Abstinence Society has just held its twenty-eighth annual meeting. I am pleased to give the following statistics which I have taken from the official report presented by the managers of the general meeting: The managers had received reports from 868 local societies with 110,606 members. Of them 47,984 were women over sixteen years, 45,197 men over sixteen years and 17,425 were children under sixteen years of age. But as all the local societies had not reported, the general society has a larger membership than the 110,606 as given above.

The Norwegian Total Abstinence Society has sixty-one women's temperance societies with 1,497 members, and seventy children's societies with 8,577 members. The women's temperance societies have, during this year, held 1,007 meetings, and the children's societies held 934 meetings. The society has had an increasing success during the year. There had been added ninety new societies with 4,525 members.

There are eleven total abstainers as members of the Norwegian Parliament. Ten of these have laid bills before the national legislature favoring that wine and beer should be included in the new brandy law, and that instruction in regard to the dangerous influence of intoxicating drinks should be compulsory in the public schools.

It was stated by the managers that the temperance cause had never been more successful and on a more solid foundation than at the present time. Public opinion is turning more and more in favor of the temperance movement. No other reform movement in Norway has been able to gather so many people from the different social strata as the temperance movement, and no other reform is looked upon with so great favor and so substantial sympathy in the national legislature as the temperance reform. This is indeed encouraging news from our temperance friends who dwell in the land of the Vikings.

DENMARK.

The fifteenth annual meeting of the Denmark Temperance Society was opened July 9th at Fredericia, Denmark, with public worship in the church. From the statement given to the annual meeting by the president, Hon. C. C. Johannsen, it appears that the Danish Temperance Society has at least a membership of 36,000 persons. The increase of members during the year was 4,000. There are thirty ministers and 309 school teachers enrolled as members of the society. This is very encouraging. An appropriation of 6,000 kroner had been received from the government to be used in the temperance agitation. The Denmark Temperance Society is now the largest society in the country. A powerful agitation is started in favor of local option in Denmark. It is very encouraging to notice that the Danish government has given the managers a favorable answer to their petition in regard to temperance instruction in the public schools. Instruction regarding the influence of alcohol is already introduced in the public schools at Copenhagen.

The Danish temperance movement, which is under very competent leadership, is gaining ground every year. The outlook is very bright. There is a light in the dark clouds. Victory will be ours. The saloon must go.

University Place, Neb. CARL F. ELTZHOLTZ.

DEAR CO-LABORERS:—I had a call to-day from the treasurer of a local union who, as the year is rounding up, carries the annual burden of unpaid dues and unfulfilled pledges. It is a too common outcry among treasurers: "If people only would pay their dues!" and indicates a slackness of thought or method that is much to be regretted, especially among women who in other lines are the embodiment of conscientious care.

It is an imposition on good nature and altogether unbusiness-like to expect the treasurer to remind us by written communications, personal visits or numerous verbal appeals of an obligation that we ought to carry the full weight of ourselves. To be sure, we are reminded when rent, water tax, gas bills, etc., are due, but we should not expect our supply of spiritual food or temperance teaching to be put upon this basis.

Did you ever make a "due calendar"? Take a common calendar having large figures, such as are issued by railroad companies. With a sharp, clear, black lead-pencil sit down some day when your mathematical conscience is most acute and mark it for the entire year. Thus: on January 1 there is fifty cents due for membership in the union. Mark an oblique line through the date / and write in the square inclosing the date "50c — W. C. T. U." When the debt is paid draw another oblique line \ across the first one and the cross × thus formed will mean a discharged obligation. Go through the calendar thus for the many little sums falling due at irregular intervals through the year, then hang this guide to memory in some place where it cannot escape daily sight, and conscientiously follow its silent admonition to pay that thou owest. "That is all very well," I hear some one say. "I could mark the calendar well enough, but that would not provide the cash!"

True enough. Yet other financial matters are met—shoes and gloves and handkerchiefs are bought, daily bread arranged for, coal "laid in," and in most families, a small sum is spent yearly in what might be called "extras," a lecture ticket to-day, a basket of fine fruit to-morrow, a "treat" for the little folks, a new plant, a book, a piece of music. These carry off unexpected nickels, dimes and quarters, but the dollar for the white ribbon work, the missionary society, or the reform league settles down so deeply in the pocketbook that it is a hard matter to bring it to the surface.

Mrs. Esther Tuttle Pritchard, our National superintendent of the department of systematic and proportionate giving, said in her annual report before the National Convention in Cleveland last year: "Nine-tenths of the wealth of the United States is said to be in the hands of professing Christians, and that ought to mean so much Christianized wealth, but it does not. If we could transiate the principles of Christian stewardship into the business enterprises and receipts of church members, it would not only secure an abundant treasury for every good cause, but would remove friction between capital and labor, and restore the standards of Christian equity to the commercial life of professors."

Indefiniteness of action is the deathblow to countless good intentions. "I believe in all churches," sounds well but never accomplishes as much as "I work in such a church." "Oh, yes, I indorse the work of the white-ribboners," is a good sentiment, but "I belong to this local union," is better practice. "All days are holy days," is true but the man who keeps Sunday holy is more sure to make the record of the other six clean. "Of course, all my money belongs to the Lord," is right, but a proportion of it definitely laid aside for definite parts of the work in His vineyard insures a stewardship that can be accounted for in a more satisfactory way to Him and to you.

Try it. Whenever a dollar or a dime comes into your hands, lay aside a dime or a penny of it to be used strictly "in His name." Put it in another purse. Make it a definite offering. If you have a regular salary you can easily estimate how much this will be in six months and then you can meet your regular "dues" in proportion and always have "a little something" left for the unexpected calls that come to one for help.

You may smile, but I must tell you a bit of personal experience. "Hard times" have more than once led me to the bottom of my pocketbook and when the Lord's purse —where I keep my tenths—has been empty I have said, "Lord, your treasury is empty, but if you will supply mine I will replenish yours," and I have always a sweet consciousness of a friendly compact between this Friend and myself whereby the Head of the firm takes care that financial disaster shall not overtake us if I do my part. And I can say to-day, after years of experience, that His promise to supply all my need—not my desire, mind you—has never failed, and His treasury is taken care of as He sees best.

May we not take to our hearts for the coming white-ribbon year this motto: "Owe no treasurer anything save to love her!"

Again I say unto you, That if two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven.—Matt. 18:19.

The Temple prayer band now numbers over seventy persons, that number having applied for admission. They are from almost every state in the Union. The necessary credentials for membership are unfaltering faith in God. So far all members are women except one. I am glad one brother applied. He and his good wife had received such wonderful answers to united prayer that they felt they must both belong. All members have received a personal letter from me, inclosing a list of names of persons to pray for whom I soon expect to call upon for money for the Temple. With unfaltering faith in God, and with the assured promise of our Saviour in the text above quoted we expect soon to see great things done in His name.

The three following names in the order given have filled the most wheels in three months, from May 23 to August 23: Mrs. F. J. Grim, Franklin Grove, Ill., Mrs. S. A. Stout, Jacksonville, Ill., Mrs. J. M. Graham, Newark, O.

BUT FOUR MONTHS LEFT IN WHICH TO SECURE THE THREE SPLENDID CASH PRIZES OF $100, $50 AND $25.

Many of the Temple Wheels returned bring with them sweet and pathetic stories of self-denial and loving devotion. After all, is that not what our Heavenly Father thinks more of than aught else? It is not so much the great things we accomplish, but the loving spirit of self-denial that we cultivate. The gold that so many work for so assiduously, is oft but a canker to the soul; but loving deeds, done for His cause and His little ones, are what He loves. These are the things that will count in "that day" when our gold will be but dross, and the honors of the world but an empty name.

A Wheel comes filled by Miss Nellie A. Adams, Wilmington, Vt. Besides being blind Miss Adams is an invalid and a great sufferer, confined to her bed without hope of recovery. Miss Ida Keen, Houghton, Mich., another blind girl, is filling four Wheels. Little eight-year old Anna Williams, Ashley, Pa., has been sick unto death with pneumonia. She writes that she is able to sit up in "a big chair now." She says: "I have filled my Wheel in bed. When friends came in to see me I would raise my pillow and show my Wheel, and they would put in a dime." An aged saint, Mrs. H. O. Howell, Champaign, Ill., who is seven years past her three score years and ten, is an invalid; she cannot use her feet, and her hands are almost as useless, but she is at work filling Wheels. Another dear old saint in her seventy-third year, Mrs. S. A. Stout, Jacksonville, Ill., writes: "I am resolved you shall not fail in paying for the Temple for the lack of what little I can do. I have worked for it ever since it was started, and I intend to do my level best until it is finished. I think I shall finish my twenty Wheels this week. Please send me five more." Another noble veteran, seventy-two years old, Mrs. Martha R. Gleason, Sioux Rapids, Iowa, keeps boarders and does her own work; yet she has found time to fill two Wheels, and is going to fill two more.

Oh, ye white-ribbon women who are at ease, who have never yet lifted your finger to aid in the great struggle going on before your eyes for the possession of the building that is to bring an income that will push to success the cause that is now languishing for want of money, how shamefaced you must feel when confronted with such testimony as the above! The filling of a Wheel in this case is the giving of "the cup of cold water." Will you do it?

***

Surely the knowledge of the Temple has gone forth into all the world. The contents of a mite-box has been forwarded to us by Miss A. L. Hutton, from a colored union in Nassau, N. P., Bahamas. Mrs. Caroline McDiarmid sends from McPhersons, British Columbia, the contents of her mite-box, $3.65. Miss Margaret Kennedy, away in the old city of Mexico, is filling Wheels for the Temple. She writes: "Though in far-off Mexico we are deeply interested in the Temple." Mrs. A. F. Judd sends a filled Wheel from Honolulu.

All orders for Temple Wheels, mite-boxes, and Baby Band lists, and everything pertaining to the Temple, should be addressed to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, The Temple, Chicago. Send two-cent stamp for either the Temple Wheel or mite-box. Money orders and checks should be made out in the name of Mr. G. B. Shaw, treasurer, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, Room 1111, The Temple, Chicago.

VESTAL FIRES.

BY L. EUGENIE ELDRIDGE.

In pagan ages far away,
When truth was wrapped in morning gray,
The vestal fires at altar shrine
Were fed perpetual; symbol, sign,
Of holiest art, of favoring god,
Of triumph where brave warriors trod.
This holy incense purely bright,
Was fanned by maidens clothed in white.

Within the sacred walls of home
We light the fires of ancient Rome;
Our vestal maidens, willing hands,
Our incense flame, sweet love's commands.
By night, by day, its brightening glow
Shall gleam afar and beauty show
To such as build no altar fires
Of sacrifice and glad desires.

When coming ages backward roll
The centuries' time-illumined scroll,
Ah, list! the melodies that rise
E'en to the over-arching skies.
Of days when home was dearly blest,
With choicest treasures, brightest, best,
Where hope and peace and warm desires,
With love, the torch, lit vestal fires.

AZALEA.

In Three Chapters.

BY FANNIE B. DAMON.

CHAPTER III.

"Well, Azalea Bree," she said, with scarcely a look at Miss Hepwie, "I'm glad you're alive. I more than expected you'd turn up in the river. You come in and give an account of yourself."

Miss Hepwie spoke up at this point and told the child's story for her briefly and sympathetically. Mrs. Bree pushed a chair toward her.

"I didn't think to ask you to seddown," she said. "I'm much obliged to you for bringing the young one home. I never knew her to cut up such a prank before. I don't mind her having her hair cut—I shouldn't care if all their hairs was cut—but Jack, he's possessed to have 'em look like frights. He didn't know she's gone t'll jest's he started for his work. He wan't in no condition t'know it last night."

Azalea looked very cheap and shamefaced.

"It's too bad," said Miss Hepwie, "and you have so many little ones to look after, too."

"Six of 'm—all girls but the baby," returned Mrs. Bree, wearily. "Have you any family yourself?"

"There's only my mother and I. I'm an old maid."

"Lucky for you, miss. They don't turn out as you think they're goin' to. My man was as smart and kind as any you ever see when I married 'im. We both worked in the mill and was goin' to get money enough to buy a little farm and be happy. But Lord save us! Here are the children, and one of 'm's lame 'n I haint had any health f'r years, 'n' Jack he got discouraged 'n' took to drink 'n' now spends half his nights 'n' all his Sundays down to Tucker's. Oh, no; we never sh'll get to the farm —only to the poor farm. We're goin' there jest about as fast as we c'n trot."

Mrs. Bree looked with haggard dark eyes over the white head of her baby.

"That's dreadful!" said Miss Hepwie with much feeling. "I'm ever so sorry for you. I'll tell you what I've had on my mind all the morning. I'll take this Azalea for my own—give her a good home and treat her just as I would if she were really mine. Only of course I should expect to call her Azalea Hepwie and have entire control of her."

Mrs. Bree smiled a spasmodical, one-sided smile.

"You'd have to get Jack's consent," she said, drawing Azalea to her side and smiling more oddly than ever.

"I should expect to have the transaction legal, of course," said Miss Hepwie. "Where is Mr. Bree?"

"He jobs in the mill yard."

"Could I find him?"

"Oh, yes, you can find him if you think it will pay you to bother," answered Mrs. Bree. "You go in at the small gate and call at the little office and ask the 'super' to let you speak to Jack Bree and he will show you where he is."

"Very good," said Miss Hepwie; "I'll go right over and speak with him. He'll be—sober, won't he, this morning?"

"Dear, yes! he's very sober this morning."

Miss Hepwie had no difficulty in finding Mr. Bree who, having a slack time in the yard, was sitting by himself on a wheelbarrow in the shade of the mill shed. He was a short man with light hair and whiskers and blue eyes. He took off his old straw hat and stood up when she addressed him as "Mr. Bree" and held out her hand to him. She introduced herself and rapidly related her acquaintance with Azalea and her intention of adopting her.

Mr. Bree had put up his pipe and now sat down again on the wheelbarrow.

"I dunno but you mean well enough—I s'pose you must mean well enough, but it starts my blood a good deal as if I'd be'n slapt in the face. I'm a poor enough kind of a man, I know, but I ain't a—a—Hottentot."

"It might be better for you if you were," said Miss Hepwie.

"Say, now, I ain't a-going to give away my children, and you may just as well understand that first as last," he answered doggedly.

"You ought to be glad and thankful to find anybody who'd take one," said Miss Hepwie.

"Yes, well! I ain't, all the same. I'd ought to be a good many things that I don't happen to be."

"True enough, Jack Bree. You'd ought to be downright ashamed of yourself to bring innocent little girls into this world—sweet, pretty-faced girls who ought to wear clean clothes and tidy shoes, and go to Sunday-school, and be nice in their manners and happy as the day is long, instead of pale and pinched and ragged and dirty and ill-behaved and ill-natured—doomed to grow into wretched young women, married to miserable men like yourself."

Jack Bree turned pale. He wasn't used to such talk. It stung him to the quick. His wife had long ago left off berating or entreating him. For years nobody had seemed to care whether he went to the devil or not.

"You don't look as if you need to be such a makeshift of a man. You look as if you might be kind and faithful and sensible. Your wife looks as if she might be gentle and even happy if she had half a chance in the world."

"I own it looks bad," he said, somewhat abashed, and brokenly. "It is bad—awful bad, and I dunno what the end'll be. I thought of it this mornin'—I was thinkin' of it jest before you come; how, if the little Azalea shouldn't be found—how I should think about the bare feet and the —the drams, miss."

"Then you can do better. You will do better," said Miss Hepwie.

He shook his head. "I'm afeard. A feller gits so down at times."

"Come, Jack Bree, what am I to understand? Do you think it possible for you to quit drinking, or are you so deep in the quicksands you can't get out—down to your armpits—soon to be in over the hairs of your head?"

"I hain't never owned up to myself that it's exactly impossible," he answered. "If I sh'd come to that p'int I'd hang myself b'fore night."

"Well, but aren't you getting to that 'p'int' as fast as water runs down hill?" He made no answer.

"You admit that you believe it's possible now for you to quit drinking. Do you believe it will be any easier for you to quit to-morrow—next week—next year? Oh, Jack Bree! if you can do better and do so ill, blood-guiltiness is on your soul for the misery and shame you have brought upon your poor wife and children, for the man that you are instead of the man God meant you to be, and still means you to be."

Jack wiped his face on his blue drilling sleeve.

"If a feller could believe God did really still mean anything good for him—or could give him a lift—or cared a whistle for him anyway—"

"There's only one way you can find out," said Miss Hepwie. "You can't simply take my word for it,—you, a man who can think for himself," she added, while Jack unconsciously held his head a little higher; "but you can try it for yourself, and see. I really advise you to try it, Mr. Bree. I think if you brace up and do your best, and look straight on to God, and ask Him to keep by you and make you strong and prosper you, I do honestly think He'll do it."

Mr. Bree smiled waveringly.

"Another thing, Mr. Bree, I respect you more—I believe in you a good deal more for not wanting to give Azalea away, but have you any objections to my taking her home with me for a week's visit?"

"Lord bless you, no. I'd take it very kind of you and so would my wife—if you can put up with the trouble of 'er."

"And another thing still. I wonder if I'm wrong in having some faith in you? My hired man leaves the middle of September. Do you suppose you could keep straight—perfectly straight and sober till that time? Do you suppose if I should conclude to buy on the Hooper place and fix up the Hooper cottage—do you suppose you and your wife would like to move up there, and have me hire you to work on my farm by the year? Do you think you could keep quit of drink and be honest and faithful, if I should do my best by you?—out on a good, broad clean farm—away from Tucker's—among sheep and cows —Jack Bree?"

Jack Bree stood up with his head bare.

"So help me God!" he said solemnly.

"Amen," said Miss Hepwie, extending her hand.

. . . . . .

I am sure you will be interested to know that Miss Hepwie took Azalea home with her; had the whole Bree family out to meeting in the little brown meeting-house the next Sunday but one; sent them down apples and berries every week, with now and then a "pat" of butter or a jug of new milk; encouraged Mrs. Bree to mend the children's clothes and helped her to make several new print dresses; and by the middle of September had them all settled in the Hooper cottage.

That was five years ago and there they live to this day, —Jack, steady and true, his wife younger of face and lighter of heart, and the children tidy and happy. One of them spends much of her time with Miss Hepwie and now and then they talk over that summer evening when Azalea rode out to the farm in the back of the old open carriage.

WOMEN AND THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

BY MRS. EMILY HUNTINGTON MILLER.

[Reported from an address delivered at Chautauqua, N. Y.]

During the formative period of a child's life most of his time is spent in two institutions, the home and the school. In each the power and influence of woman is recognized. The home and the school may antagonize each other or they may work in harmony. The home training is individual, it considers individual peculiarities and necessities, while school life develops qualities likely to be overlooked in the home, the subordinating one's choice to the necessities of others, promptness, exact method, clear expression.

But the teacher often works under difficulties because she frequently has to contend with an inadequate knowledge of the child and can obtain only superficial information. The mother, so courteous to the teacher, may be irritable and unreasonable with the child himself.

The school may suffer from the teacher's lack of insight into character, and earnestness of purpose and lack of tact, but the home suffers from the same lack in the mothers. The home has a work to do for the school, to look after it instead of leaving it to politicians and overburdened business men. It is largely due to the indifference of women that they are not a recognized and a controlling power in matters that vitally concern the education of the race. A great range of physical evils result from unsanitary construction of school buildings. Where do our children exercise? What water do these thirsty creatures drink? Are the cloak rooms where they can collect dangerous germs? What are the safeguards against moral danger? It is the business of the home to look into these matters. Appalling evils threaten public school children, and the one to go to is not the teacher but the school-board. Teachers are often held responsible where they are entirely powerless.

The home cannot do its part for the school unless there is mutual understanding between parents and teachers. The parent should understand the aim of the teacher; the home is responsible for sending the children to school in good condition for work. Until women take it in their hands to teach in some practical way the art of home making, and the public schools make prominent industrial training, nothing permanent will be accomplished to better the conditions that baffle social reformers. We must use our school buildings for evening schools, reading-rooms and lecture halls. The public school must follow the lead of the college settlement and university extension, making each school a center of cheer and social intercourse.

A proper understanding of the possibilities of public education would convince every woman that she has a sacred duty towards it. School buildings are public property, whose doors every citizen has a right to enter and whose arrangement is a matter of vital interest to every home. If you cannot gain a place on the school board bring your influence to so bear that the tide of public opinion shall carry you to your desired haven. Let us make use of the power undeniably within our reach, and by the wisdom and thoroughness of our administration in that which we have in hand demonstrate our ability to triumph in any sphere we may hereafter find for ourselves. Do not let us depreciate power already possessed as of small value, for no field outside of home offers such pressing and immediate demands upon women, or promises such results as our public schools.

A FUNNY SAD TALE.

BY MARY SPARKES WHEELER.

[Dedicated to Mrs. Mary F. Lovell, National superintendent of department of mercy.]

A bright little boy one day went out to swim,
Lack-a-day! Oh! oh! oh!
And a funny sad tale I will tell you of him,
Lack-a-day! Oh! oh! oh!
A habit he had I am loath now to name,
That of stoning the frogs in the pond when he came,
'Tis a secret I whisper with sorrow and shame.
Lack-a-day! Oh! oh! oh!

Two frogs with their books soon came hopping from school,
Lack-a-day! Oh! oh! oh!
And quickly they spied little Tom in the pool,
Lack-a-day! Oh! oh! oh!
They cried as they winked at him over the way—
"Hurrah for some fun! It is our turn to-day.
Let's pelt him with stones. In the pool he shall stay!"
Lack-a-day! Oh! oh! oh!

They threw a large stone which they found on the shore,
Lack-a-day! Oh! oh! oh!
And crushed Tommy's head till 'twas bleeding and sore.
Lack-a-day! Oh! oh! oh!
Then both of them laughed as poor Tommy they eyed,
So hard one had hiccoughs and pain in his side,
And while they were laughing the little boy cried:
"Lack-a-day! Oh! oh! oh!"

Then the mother came crying aloud in her woe:
"Lack-a-day! Oh! oh! oh!
I've lost little Tommy! Oh, where did he go?
Lack-a-day! Oh! oh! oh!"
"He is down in the pool with a pain in his head.
We stoned him for fun and perhaps he is dead.
'Tis a poor rule that will not work both ways," they said.
Lack-a-day! Oh! oh! oh!

But they were mistaken. Poor Tommy got out.
Lack-a-day! Oh! oh! oh!
And for some one to help him was looking about.
Lack-a-day! Oh! oh! oh!
He hid that the frogs might no longer annoy,
Then called to his mother. She heard him with joy,
And soon came to rescue her dear little boy.
Lack-a-day! Oh! oh! oh!

When Tommy got well he was wiser, they say,
Lack-a-day! Oh! oh! oh!
As he talked with his mother about that sad day.
Lack-a-day! Oh! oh! oh!
He said: "I was thoughtless and cruel before.
Now I know how it feels to be wounded and sore,
I surely will not stone the frogs any more."
Lack-a-day! Oh! oh! oh!

THE PARTY.

It was the very day of the party. It seemed to little Barbara that if another long day and black night had had to drag by she really couldn't have stood it. But it was two o'clock of the Saturday, and no words could describe her joy and excitement. Her Aunt Sally said she was "crazy as a loon."

"I don't know," said Aunt Sally, "what those Gibbses want to come here to Chadwick for and do things different from what we've been used to. Invitations sent out a week ahead, and the party from five to nine! Children of your age to be up and tearing round till nine o'clock! I don't know as I ought to let you go, and get broken of your rest so."

Barbara's heart gave a fearful leap. "You must go upstairs and have a good nap before you start, that's certain."

"They're going to have an elegant supper; Neely Gaines heard so," said Barbara, with a happy smile. "And there's going to be a man that's going to take rabbits out of the children's pockets—Chrissy Dawson heard so—"

"Oh, I suppose it will all be splendiferous!" said Aunt Sally. "Now, you come right upstairs this minute and have a nap—or you can't go a step."

Aunt Sally generally meant what she said. Not go a step to the party! Barbara hurried after her, and hopped into bed and shut her eyes.

"I'll bring my knitting and sit here by you," Aunt Sally said.

Never in all her little life had Barbara been so desperately determined to go to sleep, and never had she been so wide-awake. She kept her eyes shut tight, and her teeth too; but she wasn't sleepy. She couldn't forget the party a minute. Neely Gaines had heard a wild rumor that there was to be ice cream in the forms of flowers and chickens and things. How could a man take rabbits and ribbons out of the children's pockets when there weren't any there? Barbara gave a long, tremulous sigh of delight.

"Ain't you asleep yet?" said Aunt Sally. "Go right to sleep this minute! You know what I told you."

Barbara knew, and a dreadful fear seized upon her. She must go to sleep! But she heard a wagon rattle past, and Aunt Sally's knitting-needles and Mary down in the kitchen; she heard everything. She didn't know how long it had been since Aunt Sally had spoken; maybe it had been an hour.

And unless she went to sleep she couldn't go to the party. Then suddenly, with a throb of hope, she remembered what Mrs. Billings had told Aunt Sally about the ways she took to go to sleep when she was wakeful. Barbara tried them all. She imagined a drove of sheep jumping over some bars one by one; she thought of a flock of blackbirds circling round and round in the sky, and she counted a hundred, drawing long breaths between counts. When she got to seventy-five Mary came to the door to speak to Aunt Sally; and she heard Aunt Sally say, "Sh! Barbara's asleep."

Barbara lay perfectly still after that, and kept on breathing regularly. Aunt Sally's needles clicked a little longer, and then she put them down.

"Barbara!" she said. "Come, child. You've had a good nap, and it's time you got dressed; it's past four."

Barbara got up. She got up rather slowly, and she did not look directly at Aunt Sally. What made that queer little twinge somewhere within her? She knew. But there was her white dress, clean and stiff and beautiful, and her slippers with the ribbon bows, and the pink ribbon for the hair; and she was almost bursting with eagerness. It was only an hour till the party. And yet—and yet—she looked at her feet, at the window, anywhere but at Aunt Sally, because of that troubled feeling she had. Aunt Sally took the curl papers off her hair, and brushed it out into a bright cloud. Then the white dress went on. Barbara looked at herself in the glass, with admiration.

But a terrible struggle was going on for her heart was very tender. Aunt Sally tied her starchy sash. Oh, dear! oh, dear! What should she do? The ice cream and the man with the rabbits—oh, she couldn't!

But she did. She grasped Aunt Sally's skirt and burst into wild sobs.

"I can't go!" she gasped, chokingly. "O—Aunt Sally—I can't go."

"Barbara Sheldon, what in the name of sense ails you?" Aunt Sally demanded.

"I wasn't asleep," Barbara wailed. "I didn't go to sleep at all."

"You pretended to be asleep when you wasn't, Barbara Sheldon?" said Aunt Sally.

Then she thought for a few moments. "Well, if you don't deserve to stay at home," she said; and then she laughed. "Stop your crying. My goodness, you won't look fit to be seen! I don't know as I'd ought to have expected you to go to sleep that time of the day; I don't know as you ever did. Well, well! and I suppose you was so set and crazy about going to that party that you couldn't bear to tell me. Don't you ever do such a thing again!"

Then Aunt Sally laughed again. "Go right and wash your face," she said, "you've got your nose all red."

"Oh, Aunt Sally!" said little Barbara, joyfully.—Emma A. Opper, in Youth's Companion.

HOW HE BEGAN.

A man was sitting in a saloon with an old, battered hat on his head, a short black pipe in his mouth, a dirty shirt and ragged clothes, and down-trodden shoes on his feet. But he had not always been like that; he had seen better days once. As he looked out of the saloon door he saw two tidy, clean little children come for their father's beer. As soon as they were outside the door the little girl took a drink from the jug, while her little brother waited patiently for his turn. The poor drunkard looked at them very sadly, and then he said with a sigh, "Ah, that's how I began, and I cannot leave it off now."—The Irish World.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Home again! How are you all? I hope that you have spent many pleasant vacation days and a happy summer. That is what I have had and I would like to think that every member of our big circle in some way had found enjoyment during the summer.

When I said good-by to you and left "native land" to go across the great ocean to other lands, I didn't expect to stay away quite so long from our Cozy Corner. How the days have flown! It seems only a short time since the big steamship Berlin put out from New York harbor with its human freight of temperance workers and their friends.

At first they seemed to be all grown up people but I soon found two temperance girls and a boy. One of them, Helen M—, is a Cozy Cornerer from Vermont. The others were Esther R— of Maryland, and Martin P— of Indiana. Don't you think they ought to have been happy to have the privilege of such a trip? I met them often after we had landed and when we were traveling in Switzerland and France.

Martin and Esther returned on the same vessel as I, the steamship New York. In reply to my question as to what he had most enjoyed, Martin promptly answered, "Grindelwald." It would take a whole page for me to tell you about lovely Grindelwald and I was ready to agree with Martin. But I was more than ready to indorse Esther's response to the same question for she said, "Going home!"

I am glad to be back in Cozy Corner and meet you all again. Let us all join hands now and give three cheers for Cozy Corner! Your

ANXIOUS TO HELP THE CAUSE.

I am a girl thirteen years old. I would like to join the Cozy Corner very much indeed. I am a member of the Junior League and of the Methodist church. I have no brothers or sisters and I think temperance is a great thing. I am anxious to do all I can for temperance.

Papa is a Prohibitionist. Mamma is a member of the W. C. T. U. and takes THE UNION SIGNAL. I have two sisters younger than myself. We all want to grow up for temperance. Our town has no saloons. I love Aunt Jane and the Cozy Corner. May I be your niece, aunty?

Chatham, Ill. VIRGINIA NUNES.

A SUGGESTION FOR SOME ONE.

May I come into the "family circle" as one of the older nieces? I wanted to tell the Cozy Cornerers about a little flower mission my sister carries on. My sister teaches in the country and comes home every Friday evening. She leaves the train in a rather poor part of the city and here distributes to a crowd of children bouquets of wild flowers which her school children have prepared for the purpose. These little bits of the beauties of nature gladden the hearts of sometimes from fifty to seventy-five children. This much is accomplished by school children about fifteen miles from the city aided by their teacher. Is this a suggestion for some one else?

And the work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance forever.—Isa. 32:17.

A MORE EXCELLENT WAY.

Among all the varied movements which in these latter days are tending to the manifestation of the Christ spirit in the customs of society and in the laws of the land, none is gathering more strength or more expression than the principle of peace and international arbitration. And in view of the military training our boys are receiving, not only in schools and colleges, but in the house of God itself and from the teachers and preachers of gospel truth, no question demands to-day more thoughtful consideration at the hands of Christian men and women. Hence we take pleasure in devoting our contributed columns this week to a Peace Symposium, and ask that our readers aid in propagating the principles of peace by passing on this number of THE UNION SIGNAL to teachers in our secular schools, and especially to pastors and leaders in our Sunday-schools.

The relation of peace and arbitration to temperance reform is clear and well-defined. Aside from the fact that universal peace is necessarily coincident with the reign of Christ upon earth, and with the supremacy of the Golden Rule in custom and in law (to hasten which is the underlying purpose of all W. C. T. U. effort), peace is a promoter of temperance in its more specific sense. War is a prolific breeder of intemperance; drunkenness and licentiousness follow in its footsteps, and its degenerating effects are manifested even unto the third and fourth generation.

We hear a great deal in these days about epidemics of crime and "crankery" of the murderous type, and indeed the last decade furnishes a record of murders and other brutalities peculiarly atrocious and revolting. Who knows how much of this harvest of crime may not be the aftermath of our great fratricidal struggle of thirty years ago? It is a point worth the attention of the student of heredity and mental suggestion.

The argument that good often results from war, that the civilization, and even the Christianization, of nations has been largely brought about through force of arms, might, perhaps, in the early days of the evolution of the human race, have had some show of reason to commend it. But as time goes on and man climbs Godward, the higher or more human faculties hold sway; the lower and brutish become less prominent. Man's destiny is to "Move upward, working out the beast

And let the ape and tiger die."

To subdue the lower nature, to overcome the animal propensities, is in the line of true Christian evolution; it is to be co-workers with God in His plans and purposes for man. What shall we say, then, of those who cultivate the warlike spirit among our youth, thereby fostering the tigerish nature and retarding the growth of the human? Are they not clearly antagonizing gospel teachings, impeding the ascent of man, and hindering the advance of Christ's kingdom?

Without entering into the question as to whether war was ever "necessary" to progress, we maintain without fear of contradiction that we have reached a time when it is no longer the most effective method of establishing justice, of abolishing abuses or of settling disputes. The history of the past century demonstrates the fact that difficulties between nations and difficulties between classes may be satisfactorily adjusted by arbitration. If arbitration between nations has been successful in eighty important cases, it can be successful in eighty-one—in a hundred—in all cases.

While we deplore those features of boys' brigades which tend to militarism, we are not prepared to denounce these organizations in toto. Military drills as now conducted, emphasizing as they do the war spirit and enmity between man and man, are indeed the "devil's discipline," but we can conceive of boys' brigades being utilized for the cultivation of higher ideals. We can see how the teaching and training therein received might redound to the glory of God. Chief among the commendable features of a military training is the coöperative spirit it inculcates, and the helpfulness of this feature when directed into proper channels—channels which will suggest themselves to every reader of these lines—cannot be overestimated. The thrill of pride and admiration which is felt on witnessing the manœuvers of a well-drilled corps is not the result of a ferocious desire to kill somebody. Its source is in the higher nature, not in the lower. The oneness of movement, the unity of purpose, so suggestive of power—why cannot this be used in the making for peace and righteousness instead of in the promotion of the "devil's business"?

Let the boys wear uniforms if it helps to intensify this unity of action; let them be officered, equipped and drilled if need be, but let their weapons be, not those which symbolize the destruction of life, but those which symbolize the giving of life more abundantly. Teach them that the glories of war consist not in the shedding of blood, in the conquering of one's brother in physical combat, but in the victories of right over wrong, and that such victories can be more gloriously attained to-day without bloodshed. Teach them that with new occasions come new methods, that in the age of brawn physical modes of warfare naturally prevailed, but that in the age of brain this gives place to "a more excellent way." Teach them to hurrah lustily for the flag; but if you would inspire true respect for that flag in the minds of the youth of our land, see to it, oh, Christian voter, that the same emblem does not wave protectingly over the schoolhouse and over the saloon!

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF WOMANLY VIRTUE.

"Resolved, That we call public attention to the fact that the desire and purpose of women as a class to retain their personal independence and purity of life is evinced by the hardships under which they persevere in earning their bread honorably, when the temptation meets them at every turn to secure it without labor at the cost of personal purity, and this has been so always.

"Resolved, That we believe this instinct of a pure womanhood is a gift to the future mothers of the race without which the race could not survive, and that in the great battle of the world not enough emphasis has been put upon its sacred significance and its incalculable value in the development of mankind."

The above resolutions were presented at the late World's Convention of the W. C. T. U. by our own leader, Miss Willard. To one at all conversant with the facts which lie beneath this plain statement of a simple truth the words contain a world of pathos. They recall numberless cases of privation and suffering patiently endured rather than end them by sin, and they make the heart burn with indignation at memory of the false and malignant accusations beneath which the tempted and fallen ones have been weighted down to a hopeless doom. In the face of those facts we say deliberately that there is no class of people in the world who have been more cruelly wronged than women. When we consider the oppression which women endure even now in heathen lands, and that, as Dr. Kate Bushnell says, "the representative woman of to-day has no right even to keep the ten commandments without the consent of some male relative," and that in those lands such consent is often withheld, this statement is very mild. But it is not alone in heathen lands that the statement holds good.

In Christian lands, too, woman has been the victim of the most unjust laws and customs. We know that Christianity and the love which it engenders has modified her hard lot, that in multitudes of cases the individual man has protected the individual woman from the hardships to which law and custom exposed her, but this does not at all affect the fact of the treatment of women as a whole.

It is not our purpose here to verify our assertion by a rehearsal of the many unjust and iniquitous laws by which women have been, and to a great extent still are in this free republic, deprived of "liberty and the pursuit of happiness," robbed of their property, their children and their own persons. Happily there is little need to repeat the story to intelligent women. They have so generally come into a knowledge of the facts that they are ceasing to be facts. Nor is it to these things that we wish at present to refer. It is to a greater cruelty than all these combined—the cruelty with which, even in so-called Christian lands, women have been subjected in the most sacred relationship of life.

Some months ago the Woman's Journal published a description of the life of certain backwoodsmen in Australia. The striking feature of this description was the vivid picture of the comparative condition of the wife and the "mate" (mistress) in that society. According to this picture the wife was, as a rule, almost a beast of burden and a mere child-bearing animal whose burdens were well-nigh intolerable. The "mate," though an outcast from society, yet had from the material point of view the greatest advantage. Because she was free to go at her will when dissatisfied with her condition, she dictated her own terms, she bore no heavier burdens than she chose, she demanded and received a fair share of the common earnings.

It is a horrible truth that in Christian America the same state of things largely obtains to-day. A few years ago it obtained much more generally than at the present. In too many cases the faithful, honorable wife is the overburdened drudge. For her excessive toil as housekeeper, cook, laundress, seamstress, nurse, etc., she receives her "support." Every cent of money which she spends for herself is doled out to her grudgingly as if it were a gift instead of being her hard earned due. The "mistress," on the other hand lives in affluence, luxury and ease. Yet the number of women who would deliberately choose the life of vice and luxury in preference to that of honorable wifehood, whatever its burdens, is, and always has been infinitesimal. Money and ease are not, of course, in this, any more than in any other case, the only rewards of vice. The wages of sin is always ultimately death, but in this as in other forms of temptation, sin holds out its attractions and hides its fearful penalties, and if money and luxury weighed as heavily in the scales of women as they do in those of men, multitudes more women would have entered the paths of sin.

But the trial by fire has been for the women who were obliged to earn their own living, especially in what are considered the lower orders of employment. Such a one not only always has the opportunity to exchange her life of virtuous toil for one of sinful ease, but, in multitudes of cases she is constantly urged to do so. Often the alternative is forced upon her of entering the life of sin or losing her poor position and facing starvation and utter destitution, not for herself alone, but, what is far harder, for aged parents or helpless children. Those who know the facts wonder, not that so many women have fallen, but that so many have escaped the snares spread for them by fiends incarnate.

But the cruelest feature of the entire matter has been the doom which society has pronounced upon these sorely tempted ones who fell. Talmage has a terrible passage in one of his lectures in which he pictures society's treatment of one of these who attempts to regain her lost virtue. He represents her as struggling with the billows while men and women stand on the shore and stone her. If perchance she succeeds in reaching the rocks and clasps them in the effort to draw herself out, society lifts its iron heel and crushes her clinging fingers.

Fearful picture! Fearful, because truthful. In the past, good men and women have allowed the libertine to pronounce the verdict upon his far less guilty companion. Bad men who made these women what they were, and whose interest it was to keep them what they were, have loudly proclaimed that these unfortunates were hopelessly depraved and irreclaimable. With honeyed words they have persuaded virtuous women that the touch of these outcast sisters was utter pollution. And in nothing has the bondage of women more clearly manifested itself than in their slavish acceptance of this teaching. But when women began to awake to a sense of the wrongs of their sex, one of their first discoveries was that this class of women was more sinned against than sinning, and that the cause of these erring ones was in reality the cause of outraged womanhood. Never again will good women join in society's cruel verdict. Henceforth they echo the words of the pitying Christ, "Neither do we condemn thee." Henceforth they cast no stones but reach out the hand of sympathy and help.

When we remember that every "fallen woman" indicates ten "fallen men," and consider the comparative temptations which they have had to combat, the professed fears of some Christian men that, if allowed full liberty, women will lose the instinct of purity, the love of home and children, can excite only indignant scorn. Verily, until men as a class can make a better showing in morality, women as a class can well dispense with their guardianship. We may safely trust that the granting of the pitiful right to vote, to share in the councils of church and state will not be able to compass the ruin which oppressive toil, hunger, cold, and every form of privation have all but universally failed to accomplish. The "instinct of pure womanhood" has proved itself of too enduring stuff to be so easily destroyed. Those generous brothers who desire "to throw down the bars, level every barrier," and let women go wherever and do whatever their own womanly instincts shall judge wise, have all the facts and logic on their side.

A NEW MOVEMENT.

What appears to be the initial step of an organization which, "to avoid prejudice" has dropped the word "temperance" and styles itself the "National Health Association," is announced through the press as "a church for the poor." As we noticed last week, Willard Hall has been rented from the Central W. C. T. U., and is to be known on Sundays as the "Militant church," with Dr. John Rusk as its pastor, its services to be made attractive by high class music from orchestra and choir, while a constituency of philanthropic men and women are planning various kinds of good and practical work.

We welcome most heartily this new organization, for the W. C. T. U. looks upon any other kind of temperance union as but another brigade of the general army, belittling no work, whether of artillery or infantry, of sharpshooters or sappers and miners, by no means demanding the same methods, but rejoicing in the good work appropriate to the make-up and intention of each and every detatchment.

The field is the world, the enemy omnipresent and appalling in its power. Bring on your reinforcements, ye men and women of God! There is no danger of crowding or getting in the way of each other's maneuvers for many a long day. We know of nothing in temperance effort not contemplated in our plan of work and practiced to a greater or less extent by our membership. We want a great multitude more of people to do these things. We can see no reason why the work should not be done under our banner, but the main thing is that it should be done, and when we see individuals preferring to lead off for themselves we are glad to see the common idea carried out in any shape. We can understand independence, but not opposition. We do not expect to meet enmity in those who fight the common foe.

Why, therefore, should the new enterprise have been repeatedly heralded in the press as a movement, "organized in opposition to the W. C. T. U."? especially since its proposed methods, so far as we understand them, are in line with one or another of our own various departments, exactly the kind of thing done by our unions wherever the necessary money and backing can be secured.

Believing with Dr. N. S. Davis that alcohol itself is infinitely worse than any of its adulterations, we must consider the project of inducing saloon-keepers to deal "only in pure liquors" to be the figment of the reporter's brain. So long as we discover nothing we have not ourselves preached, promoted and practiced we certainly do not believe that the "National Health Association" will attempt to place so much as a straw in our way nor need it look for anything but coöperation from us.

It does not undertake all our work, nor does any one of our own guild do that. We recognize a diversity of gifts and are proud of the specialists to be found wherever our ribbon is worn. We would not merge everything in the effort to save the individual drunkard. We believe there is a ledger which shows what we are preventing by means of our labors with and for the children to be an even greater work; we do rescue work besides. Our campaign of education by means of our special literature is so fruitful an enterprise that we do not think we should drop the pen and stop our presses in order that all may engage in the revival meeting; we have other workers for that.

It sometimes occurs that one has been so absorbed in a special life-work as to be oblivious to what others have been doing. Something like this may explain the published interviews with leaders in the new association, from which one might suppose that we have no health department, no corps of physicians and nurses, no cooking-schools, no knowledge or use of healthful temperance drinks, no hospital or Bethesda mission or Anchorage, no coffee-houses, reading-rooms, libraries, no homes for friendless girls, no missionaries who have discovered that "it is best in practical work to get down among the people and talk with them instead of holding aloof and talking at them." The association which only plans a beginning is hardly in a position to criticise the missing of opportunities until it has something as good and beneficent to show. We would not lessen one iota its possible success. Let it transcend our own so far as the Lord will bless and further it. Not the worker, but the work, is the all-important thing. It is all one cause.

The greater part of W. C. T. U. work is done by littles, made up of bits of service rendered by busy women; no more to be reduced to statistical statement than is the upspringing from the winged, wind-borne seeds of the forest trees. Who shall say those women have missed their opportunities who have gone so far as time, strength and money would permit? Twenty years hence there will still be those who may stand and, in view of every good thing by whomsoever done, say scathingly, "You have missed great opportunities"; and all the reapers of every name may cry in unison, "Nay, not we, but they who refused to thrust in the sickle!"

The number of men who sign a pledge, or who set out to reform, is no gauge of the practical results of a revival effort. Only those count who stand. There is one thing which, sooner or later, the "gospel temperance" worker will discover—that the saloon makes a hundred drunkards while he is persuading one to abstain.

God does not perform by miracle that which He has made possible for us to do ourselves. He expects us to use common sense and human means wherever they will avail, and if the reformer is of sound intellect and honest purpose, he will presently enter politics with the demand embodied in the first constitution of our order more than twenty years ago for "the removal of the dramshop from our streets By Law!"

Canon Wilberforce, in an open letter to the London Times, gives utterance to his convictions on the position—or non-position—of the Established Church touching the recent Local Veto Bill struggle, which position has been defended by Mr. Pereira, "Vicar and Rural Dean of Croyden." It seems that Sir William Harcourt gave offense in the use of the word "alliance," as descriptive of the relations "between the church party and the drink party during the recent elections," eliciting a rebuke from Mr. Pereira. This rebuke has called forth stirring words from Canon Wilberforce that we on this side the water may well take home. After quoting Mr. Pereira's words that "it is a surprise to many to see the church putting forth her great influence on any political question," Canon Wilberforce says: "True, it is a surprise. For where has this 'great influence on political questions' been in the past? When has it made itself felt in the great movements prompted by suffering, inequality, hardship—in the long history of the slow evolution of the people's rights, their gradual emancipation from disabilities and tyrannies? Where was this 'great influence' of the National Church in the crusade against slavery, in the abolition of the corn laws, in the enfranchisement of the unrepresented?" In response to a Times editorial Canon Wilberforce outlines the pitiful—we had well-nigh said shameful—attitude of the church in these words: "The church habitually reposes under the shelter of the beatitude, 'Blessed are the meek,' in the storm of political agitation against popular sins, and poses as the 'Church militant' only when her position and emoluments are threatened." But the walls of conservatism are being battered and bombarded by protest, plea and prayer and prophecy sees them tremble. One day they will fall and the imprisoned hosts will come out. God grant it be in time to help in the battle, not simply to swell the chorus of the victor's song.

A practical move is on foot in England under the direct supervision of Lady Henry Somerset whereby an inebriate home is provided for women of the better class needing other than the help of their own resolutions to reform. The Duxhurst Home includes first what is called the Mansion. This building, which has been rented by the National B. W. T. A., will accommodate seven guests. Its entire conduct will be that of a home wherein comfort and refinement abound. Knowing full well the value of the exercise of a spirit of sympathy and helpfulness, during the summer months a holiday home for poor children from London will be established within walking distance of the Mansion, whose inmates will, with Lady Somerset, form a council for management, doing all they can to forward the happiness of the homeless little ones. The profits arising from the Mansion are to be expended in the support of a home farm for poorer women in the thrall of the drink habit, and besides these there will be a nursery cottage and an intermediate home for ladies' maids, wives of small shopkeepers, etc. Into this home patients will only be admitted upon a pledge to remain at the home under entire abstinence for twelve months at least. This home is now ready, and the others will soon be. The plan commends itself as thoroughly practical, and as one of Lady Somerset's boundless charities. We wish for it abiding success.

The Bible Institute Colportage Association is a new name that comes to claim attention amid the host of "associations" on every hand. But this late comer touches a chord of interest in that its mission is to the seven hundred and fifty thousand men and women in this country classed as "criminals." The Colportage Association, connected with the Bible Institute for Home and Foreign Missions, Chicago, has a "prison fund," to be used in distributing good books among prisoners. This association can sell, through its colporteurs, standard books at half or two-thirds the regular price. The books are selected with care, being free from denominational arguments and variously adapted to different classes of people. Contributions for this good work may be sent to Mr. D. L. Moody, East Northfield, Mass. For further information address The Bible Institute, 250 La Salle Ave., Chicago.

Home has been defined as "a world of strife shut out, a world of love shut in." What a black hand is that which steals the golden key and lets strife stalk over the sacred threshold to drive love out. Our human hands are weak to hold the home-key, but there is a One who can guard our holiest of holies against all intruders. The door to the home opens inward. Let Christ in; give Him the key, make Him warden over bolts and bars and strife's dark countenance shall never peer into the sunny courts of home.

It is said that sensitiveness means that self lies near the skin. The definition is a good one.

Only two copies of a certain edition of Poe's "Tamerlane" being in existence, one of them sold recently for $1,450. It is related that when the poems were first issued nobody would buy them. The printer, refusing to burden his shelves with stock for which there was no demand, probably sent every copy he had to the paper mill to be ground up and made over into something he could sell. A hand that pays out such sums for such fame is not prompted by a heart that holds real book friends dear, or by a soul that has desire for heavenly treasures.

"Herein is love—to strip the shoulders bare
If need be, that a frailer one may wear
A mantle to protect it from the storm;
To bear the frost-king's breath so one be warm;
To crush the tears it would be sweet to shed,
And smile so others may have joy instead."

One of the National superintendents who scarcely lets her left hand know what her right hand doeth, writes in a private letter of some blessed ministrations in almshouse work. "A sad case," she says, "had its ending this week, the victim of drink, a man of fifty-five, whose sister and daughters came to lay him tenderly away in a beautiful coffin amid the flowers. To-day I have mailed to them his Bible, photographs and things he treasured all through his stormy years." If only a cup of cold water given in His name be rewarded by the heavenly Father, how many stars will shine in the crowns of those who go about doing good continually.

Mrs. Richard, of Shanghai, who represented China at the World's W. C. T. U. Convention in London, made a strong point against "the filthy weed" in her reference to the missionary influence. "One of the peculiarities of the Buddhist religion," she said, "is that its followers never use tobacco. One of these men heard of Christianity and wanted to know about this higher religion that was being talked about. He came to the missionary's house to learn, and in the gate-house there were Christians sitting together and talking but they were smoking and spitting. He listened to them while they talked of the Christian doctrines, for they could talk, but he looked impatient and said, 'Whether your doctrine be better than ours or not, I know not, but this I know, that ours is a clean religion.'"

"At Baalbec, in a quarry, lies a magnificent column, the largest worked stone in the world, almost detached and ready for transportation. In the ruined Temple of the Sun near by is a niche still waiting for it after forgotten centuries. So large, so grand, yet a failure, because it never filled the place for which it was quarried and hewn." Thus I read in an exchange and my mind turned in thought to the waiting niches in this world—niches of usefulness, heroism, righteousness. The unused column may represent the possibilities in a human life; the empty niche, the opportunities. And I can think of no more potent blight arresting the hand of the Architect and Builder who would complete the column and set it, perfected in its own place, than the passion for strong drink. See the lives that never fulfilled the bright possibilities before them. How much worse is this human wreckage than the quiet waiting of the unfinished column in the quarry! That is waiting. It may yet subserve a noble purpose. These are wasted; they carry the blight and pass it on, for this is the wreckage of a pillar of life that should have taken its place in a divine temple.

On Duty.

OHIO.

"Behold, he that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep."

Our delegates to the great World's Convention are again safe at home, having suffered no harm from perils by sea, or perils by land. How truly in their case have the wonderful promises of the inspiring one hundred and twenty-first Psalm been verified. The Lord has preserved their going out and their coming in and all their ways have been ways of pleasantness. Our beloved Mother Stewart received an ovation from her friends across the sea that surely must add years to her life. For well deserved as every tribute was, such tokens of appreciation do not often gladden the hearts of self-sacrificing workers, and must be all the more inspiring for that reason.

Mother Stewart and her niece, Miss Campbell, have by their charming letters and vivid pen pictures shared with the state officers their pleasant experiences, and the places of interest in London and the delights of the trip to Grindelwald have been greatly enjoyed by us at home. A pleasant ride on the train with Mrs. Graham from Newark to Sandusky gave to us a most interesting account of the voyage, the convention, the reception at Reigate, and the many places of interest visited.

OUR PRESIDENT AT SARATOGA.

Because of her great sorrow at the loss of her gifted daughter, last winter, our state president, Mrs. Monroe, has suffered greatly for want of strength, and, in order to fully regain her health, she left home the first of August for Dr. Strong's Sanitarium, Saratoga Springs, New York, where she will remain through the first week in September. She hopes the rest will result in the complete restoration of her wonted strength. Although so prostrated, Mrs. Monroe has attended to every item of her large correspondence, so that the work has suffered no loss from her ill-health. When September comes with its cooler weather, and her period of rest and recuperation is ended, Ohio unions will warmly welcome home again their beloved president.

OHIO W. C. T. U. DAY AT LAKESIDE.

Lakeside, the delightful summer resort, assembly and camp-meeting ground of northern Ohio, never looked more beautiful nor inviting than this summer. Lake Erie seemed to send forth her refreshing breezes and charm by the beauty of her rippling surface or surging waves even more than usual.

The W. C. T. U. Home, over which Miss Goodwill, president of our board of trustees, presides with great acceptance and ministers unceasingly to the comfort of guests, was crowded to its fullest capacity. All found it a delightful place to be. A number of our notable workers, too large for us to mention names in this brief letter, were stopping at the Home and were on the platform on our day.

The 26th of July was the day set apart for our state W. C. T. U. on the Assembly program. Mrs. Clevenger, state corresponding secretary, presided and had charge of the meetings. The audience was unusually large and interested. The exercises opened at 10:30 o'clock with music by the Assembly orchestra and a beautiful solo from Mrs. Yesbrea, Assembly vocalist. Mrs. M. G. Townsend, of Holgate, one of the state vice-presidents, gave a very able Bible lesson on consecration. The address of the morning was given by Miss Susan B. Anthony, and was such as she alone can give, showing the development of the movement for larger liberties and enfranchisement for women almost from its beginning. The audience was dismissed by the benediction pronounced by Rev. Mary Murdock, of Cleveland. Just at this time Miss Anthony was overcome by weakness, the result, no doubt, of her arduous labors just ended in California, since which she had taken no rest. Prompt attention from a physician soon restored her. She declared her willingness to speak again that evening, but was restrained from doing so by friends. Telegrams poured into Lakeside that evening from nearly every large city in the nation, inquiring for Miss Anthony's condition, showing the deep interest the people of the United States feel in this heroic woman.

At two o'clock a children's meeting was held under the skillful direction of Mrs. H. B. Wisner, state superintendent of Loyal Temperance Legion work. The audience was large, the music fine, and the meeting opened with a concert exercise repeating the twenty-third psalm, led by Mrs. M. G. Townsend.

The Loyal Temperance Legion and a class of little kindergartners gave great pleasure to the audience by their interesting drills and pleasing recitations.

LAKESIDE SCHOOL OF METHODS.

An instructive school of methods, presided over by Mrs. H. B. Wisner, state superintendent of juvenile work, was conducted in the Home Chapel for two weeks, the audiences steadily increasing. At 8 o'clock a. m., the Loyal Temperance Legion had a meeting each day, and from 9 o'clock until ten some one of our state superintendents presented some department of our work. Mrs. Wisner, Miss Carrie Berry Phelps, superintendent of physical culture, Dr. Linkmyer, superintendent of health, Mrs. Southworth, superintendent of franchise, assisted by Revs. Mary Murdock and Florence Buck of Cleveland, Mrs. Hammond, editor of the Ohio Messenger, were the prominent workers when your corresponding secretary was there. The Loyal Temperance Legion began its meetings July 11 and was better attended than in any former year. The interest in it was very encouraging.

TEMPERANCE DAY AT LANCASTER ASSEMBLY.

Your reporter counted herself very happy in being present on reformers' day and temperance days at Lancaster assembly. In the afternoon of the former Rev. Josiah Strong gave one of his clear, instructive addresses on "The Signs of the Times," which surely must have given encouragement to every hearer who longs for the overthrow of the reign of rum. Then John G. Woolley, on the evening of that day, gave one of his masterly arraignments of the church for its position regarding the liquor traffic. The audiences were large and interested. These two speeches formed a fitting introduction to temperance day, which dawned with the next morning. The address was given by Mrs. Florence Richards, of Leipsic, the vice-worthy Good Templar of Ohio, and was an eloquent appeal for the suppression of the liquor traffic. Her audience was very enthusiastic in expressions of appreciation.

EIGHTEENTH DISTRICT CONVENTION.

The annual meeting of the eighteenth district union was held in the beautiful town of West Mansfield. The local union had spared no pains in making preparations for the convention. The M. E. church, in which it was held, was tastefully decorated. The delegations from different parts of the district were not as large as had been hoped for, but all felt that it had been good to be there. Reports of superintendents showed some advance in department work, especially in those of fairs, scientific temperance instruction, and purity.

County presidents' reports showed the need of some one to visit and encourage weak unions and organize new ones. The departments of mothers' meetings and parlor meetings were adopted. Mrs. Amanda A. Strong was reelected president of the district.

THIRTEENTH DISTRICT.

The seventh annual convention of the thirteenth district was held at Pataskala. Mrs. R. J. Trego, president, understands how to conduct a convention admirably from "start to finish," and yet the business of the morning pressed upon that of the afternoon, so much claimed attention.

The work in the district shows gains, chiefly in the smaller towns, where women work shoulder to shoulder, and do not esteem social life above purity and temperance. In the larger towns there has been cordial coöperation with the Anti-Saloon League, indifference has grown somewhat fervid and opposition takes a darker hue; proof that the work is alive. Franchise work has received much attention, and should more, as this is a test year as regards woman's ballot. Department work was, perhaps, less fully reported than usual, as nearly all the superintendents are women upon whom many responsibilities rest heavily.

MORROW COUNTY.

Morrow county is doing aggressive work at the county seat, Mount Gilead. The W. C. T. U. sustains a reading-room which is kept open every evening and part of the time in the afternoons. Two members of the Mount Gilead union were elected to the school board, as were also two from the union at Sparta. Mount Gilead has had Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson for two lectures. Francis E. Murphy also held a series of meetings under their auspices, at which a large number of persons signed the pledge. Morrow county convention had the cheering presence of Mrs. R. J. Trego, who gave her lecture on "Hard Times" to a crowded house.

The union of Williamsport gave a very successful gold medal contest recently, clearing sixty-one dollars. Six young ladies and one gentleman formed the class. Miss Birdie Knowles, of Kinderhook, won the medal. Williamsport has the banner Loyal Temperance Legion of the state. Eighty children are enrolled in its two divisions. The Legion furnished the music for the contest and received one-third of the proceeds for their work.

Two new unions and one Loyal Temperance Legion have been organized in Pickaway county this year—a union at Five Points, by the county president, Miss Hewitt, and one at Derby. A Loyal Temperance Legion at Pherson, by the superintendents of the Williamsport Legion.

LOCAL ITEMS.

A colored union has been organized at Milan and another is reported at Doyle Station, organized by Mrs. Meriwether under the auspices of the McMinnville union, with seventeen members, eight regular and nine honorary. The president is Miss Minnie Moyers, corresponding secretary, Miss Jennie Austin. McMinnville union meets regularly and has done some work in the purity department, holding mothers' meetings, also in the department of temperance literature.

Knoxville is reported by Mrs. Fitzgerald, and as usual is found in the ranks of the faithful. This union organized a new union at Concord of eighteen members, and a Loyal Temperance Legion at the same place. Mrs. Ada Lee, of Friendsville, assisted in this good work. The free kindergarten has been very successful indeed, closing in June with an enrollment of fifty-six pupils, but it will be continued in the fall. Their mothers' meetings are very interesting, many women claiming more benefit from them than from anything else they ever attended. They are filling a number of Temple Wheels and will soon hold their district convention.

Dayton, as reported by Mrs. Susan Johnson, is doing good work. They have recently organized an L. T. L. which is meeting expectations. They have Bible readings in connection with their regular meetings.

Maryville, as reported by Mrs. Stanley, meets regularly every two weeks. Their chief work is for equal suffrage, every third meeting being devoted to this topic. The annual meeting was well attended, and very interesting. About a year and a half ago, in connection with some who are not members, this union started an industrial home for destitute and orphan children. They have cared for twenty different children, are at present out of debt and in good shape. Between seven hundred and eight hundred dollars was spent in this work the past year. They are hoping the county will buy buildings for their use soon, and so save them their rents. Mrs. Meriwether's visit to the union is reported as helpful. Fourteen copies of The Union Signal are taken. Our scientific temperance instruction bill received much help from these active workers.

Athens, through Mrs. Gibson, reports work in the following departments: Purity; legislative work, juvenile,—a good colored L. T. L., temperance lessons taught; evangelistic,—fourteen women pledged to read and pray daily; unfermented wine,—all churches but one use it; prison work,—jail visited every week and services held, prisoners kept supplied with Bibles, four or five conversions reported; railroad work,—literature kept at depot; Sabbath observance,—sermons on the subject, and week of prayer observed by the women; flower mission,—individual work; legislation and petition,—circulated Polyglot and social purity petitions, and also petition for scientific temperance instruction law.

Jonesboro sends word by Mrs. Mary H. Epps, of a union of six consecrated women who meet weekly. They have taken up the evangelistic and petition work. Mrs. Meriwether recently visited the union.

Morristown, through Mrs. M. A. Hodges, reports some work for our attempted purity legislation. They are keeping up their organization, but send no special report.

Deer Lodge, through Mrs. Nellie Norton, reports between twenty and thirty members after a five years' existence. They are doing work in most of the departments, have observed all the W. C. T. U. days, held gospel temperance meetings in the church once a month for two or three years, and have a flourishing L. T. L.

Harriman, through its ever faithful and efficient secretary, Mrs. Dimond, reports so regularly that there would seem but little to mention from time to time. Yet there is always something being done by that faithful body of women. They recently passed a resolution condemning the opening of meatmarkets and grocery stores on Sunday, and calling the attention of the city authorities to the fact. They had an experience social, in which each member pledged themselves to raise by their own labor, twenty-five cents, or more, for the benefit of their temple. In this way they raised ten dollars. They have recently diminished the principal of this debt by $225.50. This debt has been a heavy burden to them, and we all hope it will soon be lifted.

Our state convention will meet at Winchester, September 18, 19 and 20 and it is earnestly hoped a good number will be present.

COUNTY CONVENTIONS.

Nearly all of our counties have held their annual conventions, and what more fitting time than spring and the early summer for these gatherings?

BENNINGTON COUNTY

held its tenth annual meeting at Manchester Center in May. Mrs. Wm. Smith, of Manchester, led the devotional meeting. The county president, Mrs. A. F. Smith, was in the chair. Her message was an able presentation of the work in the county and state. Three new unions have been organized by Dr. Minnie Leavitt. The pastors' hour was full and many earnest words were spoken for the encouragement of the union and for the honor of the cause.

Memorial hour was touchingly pathetic. Tender and appreciative words were spoken of Mrs. Woodbridge, Mrs. Lathrap and others. The Manchester union may feel encouraged by this meeting. It was well attended and a good interest was manifested throughout.

CALEDONIA COUNTY.

Barnet union is the oldest in the county and here was held the annual convention, May 28 and 29. Mrs. Helen G. Rice, of Boston, National superintendent of L. T. L. work was present and gave the young people three addresses which were full of excellent thoughts told in a most convincing manner. Mrs. Read, state president, was with the convention one day and helped by her cheering words. The unions in this county are in a prosperous condition and have for their president Miss Laura Moore, one of the pioneers of union work in Vermont.

WASHINGTON COUNTY.

The fourteenth annual convention of this county was held at Waterbury Centre, June 4 and 5. The address of the president, Miss Bertha Chamberlin, was in her usual pointed and compact style, giving a resumé of the year's work, and suggesting many wise and helpful plans. Miss Flora Guernsey read a paper on "Our Social Relations," urging the necessity of united and persistent effort in interesting the indifferent on temperance subjects. Mrs. Emma Nichols, of Barre, read an earnest paper on the responsibility of parents and the sacredness of the home. Miss Irene Hubbard also furnished a paper, "Our Honoraries," full of good suggestions. All felt a desire to follow Mrs. Althea Richmond, as she presented her plans for "securing homes for homeless children." Miss Nettie Chase, of Waterbury Centre, gave a spirited address on the "mother element" in government, which was heartily received. A discussion, "Is legislation more powerful than public opinion in promoting temperance reform?" was opened by Miss Alice Richardson. Prevailing sentiment seemed to be that one was the complement of the other.

Four members of this county have passed to life eternal. Touching tributes were paid to each. The last evening Mrs. Revel presented her subject, "Watchman, what of the night?" She forcefully brought forward the need of continued effort and alertness in striving to put down the drink curse, whose destructive work is seen on every hand.

Thus closed a successful convention.

WINDHAM COUNTY

held their annual gathering at Newfane, June 6 and 7. The report of press work was particularly encouraging, showing that all the county papers are willing to publish temperance items. Mrs. A. A. C. Ware, of Brattleboro, read a fine paper on "Temperance in the home." She especially emphasized the need of having temperance newspapers in the home, supplemented by early temperance training, and called attention to the fact that few homes are supplied with them. The Jamaica union furnished four papers on "Alcohol in Society." They all contained startling truths, and brought forth the question, "Why are these queries set aside with a sneer?" Mrs. Fessenden, president of Massachusetts W. C. T. U., held the close attention of the large audience as she skillfully portrayed the undermining influence of the liquor traffic, and gave warning that threatens us as a nation because of it. The parting words of the convention were spoken by Mrs. E. A. Kenyon.

WINDSOR COUNTY.

The tenth annual convention was held at Weston, June 26 and 27. During the meeting interesting papers were read on narcotics, alcohol in the home, systematic giving and the Temple.

The children's hour was a pleasant time for all. It was conducted by Dr. Minnie Leavitt. Delegates from the Rochester L. T. L. helped with songs and recitations. Taken as a whole it was a very helpful meeting.

NOTES.

Middlebury union is doing good work with the L. T. L's, having sent over five dollars to the Temperance Hospital in Chicago.

There will be no midsummer meeting at Spring Grove this year.

Our state convention will be held in Rutland, September 24, 25 and 26.

Our delegates to the World's Convention are expected to be present at our state meeting and give reports. Miss Frances Townsley is also expected to be with us.

Orleans county held its convention at Derby Line, May 28.

Rutland county held its annual meeting June 26 and 27.

Mrs. Read, Mrs. Kenyon and Mrs. Dyer, Miss Hitchcock and Dr. Leavitt have been at work in our Vermont field for new members and a good increase is the result of their labors.

West Burke sends a gratifying report of work in that place. Only two years since their union was organized and they have twenty-five members and eleven honoraries. They have an L. T. L. of thirty members and the children are very much interested. Six wall pockets in public places are regularly supplied with religious and temperance literature.

FLORIDA.

BREEZY NEWS.

Opening my small bundle of news from Florida fields this warm August morning—the heat so intense it almost seems that heart and mind must fail—I find first, this cheery, breezy message from fair

DAYTONA.

"Our union is doing well in sustaining the regular meetings throughout the summer. Twelve present at last meeting, two new members." Then the writer generously attributes some measure of success to the inspiring presence of the grand old ocean, whose delightful breezes temper the heat of summer days. The flowing wells, of which there are a large number, look so cool and inviting, seeming to say,

"Preach water, water pure and clear,
From it sweet comfort springs,
A drink to cleanse and cheer,
It never bites or stings."

Thus dear, bountiful nature lends help and inspiration to earth's weary workers.

Another bright letter comes from the secretary of one of our newest unions, at where a large and enthusiastic Demorest medal contest has been held, attended by large numbers from their own and the neighboring towns of Zellwood and Victoria. There were seven contestants; the medal was awarded to Miss Ruby Pike, of Victoria.

The society considers that such enthusiasm manifested in the midst of summer heat augurs well for the future of the good work in Tangerine. Our Quaker sister, Lucy A. Marot, whose gentle presence is always a benediction, is president of this new and promising union. Here is a word from the dear sister at where our last state convention was so loyally entertained. "Our union is doing well, attendance good at monthly meetings. A Senior and a Junior L. T. L. hold weekly meetings and present interesting programs. The Seniors gave a silver medal contest of recent date which was well attended. The church was beautifully decorated with flowers and tastefully draped in memory of the honored friend of temperance, W. Jennings Demorest." An arch over the altar bore his name in flowers and evergreen and each contestant wore a bow of black ribbon in memoriam. These meetings, it is hoped, will bear fruit for the Master.

"W. C. T. U. matters are looking up in DE LAND," so writes Mrs. Webb, state president. I cannot but agree that the assertion is true when I read "a Y has been organized with a large number of young men as honoraries. The L. T. L. is doing good work preparing for medal contest."

Ah! here is a letter which makes a sad contrast to the cheery ones just reviewed: "Our once prosperous union is dead, past resurrection, I fear. We older ones have been compelled to give up the warfare—the younger women do not care to take it up." Oh, ye younger women! sisters, and future mothers of our land, why will ye not put upon you the mantles which have fallen from the weary shoulders of those who have so long battled for the right? Are there not yet great wrongs to be righted, and must not woman's hand be stretched forth for the deliverance of those in bondage to sin?

A secretary from another union writes of the addition of two and the probable coming in of one other young woman to their union which, she says, encourages the older members greatly, knowing that the fresh zeal and vigor of these younger ones will inspire and influence others to "lend a hand." How much do we, who look toward the sunset hours, need the young. This union has held some profitable public meetings—their subject, tobacco, its effects upon the human system, giving the testimony of eminent physicians. A pastor who attended was delighted with the manner in which the meeting was conducted, said every word was true and no one could be offended.

In addition to having the cigarette law printed in their town papers some time ago, this union had printed single copies to present to dealers, giving them to understand that the law, if violated, would surely bring down the penalty upon the offender.

Three copies of "Mothers' Friend" are taken, read by the members and then handed to young mothers for perusal.

During the month of September your reporter hopes to visit her childhood home at Hillsboro, Ohio, looking forward with delightful anticipation to the meeting with good Mother Thompson, and seeing the site where stood for so long the Crusade church of loving memory to white-ribboners and of added personal memory to the writer who as a child went there to Sunday-school. For my next letter I hope many interesting reports will be sent me and I may be given the glad news of a general waking up all along the line.

NEW YORK STATE NEWS.

New York state is looking forward to a grand gathering in September, when our state convention will meet in the "Flower City," Rochester. I shall not say much about it in this letter, as my next will probably contain a report of that meeting, but we are all anticipating "good times."

Many counties will hold their annual meetings early in September and many have already held them. Reports have come to me not only of annual, but semi-annual and quarterly meetings, and the general outlook is most encouraging.

Delaware and Clinton counties met some time ago and should have been reported earlier but for the fact that so much of my time is spent "on the road" this year. Both had excellent programs well carried out. Rev. George R. Bristor gave the address in Delaware county and Mrs. Ella A. Boole, our first vice-president, in Clinton county.

In every locality our women are very much aroused on the question of the scientific temperance law, and these counties are no exception. "Our friends, the Enemy," are using every effort to undo the work of our legislature, and we need to be watchful. The superintendent of public instruction, Charles H. Skinner, is using his influence on the wrong side, and inducing many of the teachers of the state to sign a protest against the law as it now exists, hoping for a repeal next winter. It is generally believed that the liquor men have a "pull" of some kind on Mr. Skinner, but "if God be for us who can be against us"?

Loyal Temperance Legion work is very much alive, and the state convention soon to be held at Havana will no doubt give added impetus to the work. Clinton county has an excellent L. T. L., which held a public meeting a few days after the convention, at which time forty-one prizes were given to those who had attended every meeting of the Legion.

This county voted to send Mrs. Frances D. Hall, the county president, to London for the World's meeting, but Mrs. Hall could not go. She appreciated the kindness, however. Our delegates are nearly all returned, and our beloved president is now on her way. Surely God has been good to us in that all are returned in safety.

We shall have some new faces in our executive committee this year, as for various reasons several of the county presidents have felt obliged to give up serving, making it necessary for others to take their places. Mrs. M. B. O'Donnell, of Lewis county, who has served for years, will be missed by us, but we have a warm welcome for the successor, Mrs. Mary L. Johnston, of Port Leyden, and for Mrs. Pettingill, of King's county, who succeeds Mrs. Louise Vanderhoef, one of our women whom we could always depend upon. Mrs. Martha S. Mead, of Chautauqua county, is taking a much needed rest in California, and Mrs. Ursula Babcock has been elected county president. Mrs. Wilcox, of Schoharie county, after ten years' service, is succeeded by Mrs. Ella Hartwell, but the work does not lose any of these workers. The state and counties still claim them, while they welcome the newcomers.

The women of Delaware county have issued a little blank with the following heading which is designed to draw in the women who cannot be members of a local union:

Mrs. Helen M. Barker, our National treasurer, was a welcome guest at the Allegany county convention, giving a delightful address in the evening, which inspired all her hearers. It was my good fortune to meet a large number of the white-ribboners of this county at Cuba Camp on W. C. T. U. day. Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt, our first round-the-world missionary, made the afternoon address, and it gave me great pleasure to hear her, and also to sing, "Bands of Ribbon White Around the World." I had sung this song many times, but never on so appropriate an occasion as this. The Silver Lake Quartette and Prof. A. A. Hopkins were also present, and added greatly to the enjoyment of all. A prize speaking contest was held in the morning, and altogether we put in a full day. Mrs. Mary V. Willard, county president, had charge of the day.

The summer camps have been largely attended this year, and the programs unusually attractive. In addition to Cuba Camp I visited Silver Lake, Clarendon Camp and Dempster Grove. The latter is a Methodist camp, but one day is given to the W. C. T. U., and everything conspired to make it one of the best days of the season. In the morning a temperance address was given by Rev. Geo. Shepherd, of Oswego, and in the afternoon a temperance song service by the state corresponding secretary, interspersed with short addresses by Mrs. G. M. Gardenier, state recording secretary, and Miss Vinnie Davis, state superintendent of the franchise department, Mrs. S. M. Barker, county president, presiding.

A day is given to the W. C. T. U. at almost every summer camp now and the managers find it advantageous in every way.

Albany county, with Mrs. C. J. A. Jump as president, has held its annual convention, and one of the successful features was a Demorest contest. This work is still going on, and we trust may continue to go on, until the day shall dawn which shall see the flag of prohibition floating over "this land of the free and home of the brave."

Schenectady believes in rallying the children, and has held a mass-meeting with over one thousand children present. This was followed in July by a similar meeting at which Mrs. Blair, chalk-talker, was present.

My work during the past four weeks in addition to visiting summer camps has brought me in contact with a number of local unions in Fulton, Oswego and Saratoga counties. I never visit a union without being made stronger by the personal touch. I thank God daily for giving me the privilege of meeting and helping these loyal workers. I believe that this year which is just closing will be a year of grand results. Everywhere I find activity and enthusiasm. And now with a few notes by the way I'll close this letter, as I must keep within the space allowed.

West Kendall union has recently taken up a work for young men. At a parlor meeting held at the home of the president one hundred and seventy-five were present. After music, recitations and refreshments the pledge was presented and thirty honorary members were gained. This union holds a parlor meeting every four weeks with encouraging results.

The W. C. T. U. of Maspeth has raised the money for the erection of a fountain in that place, where man and beast may freely quench their thirst. At the dedication services addresses were given by Mrs. Harris, the county president, several ministers and others. This is the first fountain erected by the W. C. T. U. in Queens county, and the ladies are to be congratulated on the good work they have done.

Mrs. E. F. Pettengill, president of Kings county W. C. T. U., has recently been appointed by Mayor Schieren, of Brooklyn, as a member of the board of education of that city. Four other ladies were also appointed.

Our treasurer is enjoying the pleasure of a trip abroad. While regretting that the way did not open for her to go in time for the World's Convention, Mrs. Tenney is anticipating much pleasure in sightseeing and gaining renewed strength. She expects to return September 4.

I regret that the length of my last letter made it necessary for the editor to cut it down, but if those who reported to me for that letter will keep watch of the Nutshell Column they will find the notes there.

FRANCES W. GRAHAM,

News in a Nutshell.

FERNANDO, CAL., union has commenced the study of civics as recommended by the county convention.

THE Y which was recently formed at Redlands, Cal., has taken an active interest in the work of the W's, helping in the flower mission and Ransom Home departments.

THE Havana, Ill., Chautauqua, one of the youngest of the great Chautauqua family, was a great success this year. Mrs. Leavitt and Mrs. Grout were the leading white-ribboners present.

THE annual convention of the third district W. C. T. U. of Chicago, Mrs. H. L. Clark, president, meets in Campbell Park church, Chicago, on September 10. A gold medal contest will be the feature of the evening session.

MRS. MARION H. BAXTER expects to spend a month, from September 15 to October 15, in Oregon with the unions there. She would be glad to make engagements going and returning on the line of the Northern Pacific railroad.

MRS. GEORGE H. HAZZARD, superintendent of county and state fair work for Minnesota, has arranged for a reception room in the main building of the state fair where all white ribbon women and their friends will be welcomed September 9–14. The Hamlin union, whose home is near the state fair ground, have arranged for a lunch room where light lunches will be served, the profit going into the treasury of the union.

"A CHURCH, Home, Kindergarten and School for Little Children" is the somewhat unusual title upon an attractive pamphlet that has reached this office. The title is descriptive of St. Gabriel's School, Chicago, an institution where little children deprived of parental care may receive "mothering" with true Christian love and culture. The little family is limited to ten, boys and girls being admitted, that the natural atmosphere of the home may be maintained. Miss Kate S. Bishop, 1304 W. Adams St., Chicago, is the presiding genius of this home school.

THE pamphlet containing the minutes of the World's W. C. T. U. Convention, the President's address, corresponding secretary's and treasurer's reports, reports of superintendents of departments, resolutions and letters of greeting, is now ready and it is hoped that a large number of orders will be received. As the book contains some three hundred pages a charge of twenty-five cents must be made, or thirty cents including postage. Please send all orders to Miss Agnes Slack, secretary World's W. C. T. U., Ripley, Derbyshire, England.

THE Y of Little Rock, Ark., entered a few months ago upon a new departure by appointing a general secretary who should have charge of its work in the same way that the secretary of the Y. M. C. A. has of that organization. Miss Mary Campbell Smith, of Paris, Ill., accepted this position, and the success already attending it is such as should inspire all other Y's to a like effort. Since April 1, the membership has increased from eighty-five to one hundred and sixty, and Miss Smith says of them: "I feel that they are not Y's in name only; they are wide-awake Christians."

WINFIELD Chautauqua Assembly was crowned with marked success this year. Ex-Senator Bryan, on "Bi-metallism"; Dr. F. A. Gunsaulus, on "Savonarola" and "A Chapter in American Liberty"; Hon. Jerry Simpson, on "Single Tax and the Farmer," and Rev. W. H. Willett's lectures on the Old and New Testaments, were bright features of the program. The W. C. T. U. school of methods was in charge of Mrs. L. B. Smith, state president, and medal contest work conducted by Mrs. M. E. Cone. The gold medal was won by Mr. Harts, of Sunny Dale, Kan., a young college student.

FLOWER mission day was observed by the W. C. T. U., assisted by the L. T. L. of Sioux Falls, S. Dak., at the state prison. Mrs. M. E. Sheldon, state superintendent of this department, led in the exercises which consisted of a very interesting program. It was affectingly sad to see how eagerly the prisoners awaited their turn. Many with eyes filled with tears read the passage of Scripture, then carefully folded and placed it in an inside pocket and shyly fastened the bouquet to their coat lapel. The officials of the prison gave the ladies cordial welcome and coöperated in every way to make the event impressive.

A CONFERENCE of Christian workers was held in Adrian, Mo., under the direction of the W. C. T. U., August 30 and 31. Sunday-schools, kindergartens, scientific temperance instruction, L. T. L., duties of citizens, mothers and teachers, and temperance mass-meetings were discussed. The valuable list of topics may be secured by addressing Mrs. Adella Scott, Adrian, Mo.

FROM Miss Kate Lunden, the indefatigable superintendent of the work among Scandinavians, we have received this excellent resolution, passed by the Scandinavian union of Brooklyn, New York:

We, Scandinavian Christian women, knowing that our homes, as well as ten thousands of other homes, not only in this land, but the whole world over, are threatened by a mighty unscrupulous and unrelenting enemy, namely, the liquor traffic, protected by the laws of the different countries, have, therefore,

Resolved, That, out of love for these homes and those near and dear to us, of love for our fellow-beings who are suffering from the effects of this traffic, of solicitude for the future of our children and the weal of the nations, we unite in warfare against this enemy, supported by our brethren of a like precious faith, who from the same motives, enter our ranks.

On the strength of this resolve we protest now by this resolution and for all future time by our endeavors, not only against the liquor traffic in itself, but against the toleration and legalization of the same by the laws of the United States and other civilized countries.

We do not declare this war in our own strength. We trust in the Lord of Sabaoth, who is the protector of the widow and the fatherless. He, the Strong One, shall further our righteous cause and with Him, though few in number, we are in the majority.

The work this devoted woman is doing among her own people is almost beyond belief. We hope she will attend the Baltimore convention and that plans will be devised for furthering her efforts.

Official Communications

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP.

After communicating with the World's and National President, Miss Willard, regarding the aims and objects of the new Department of Christian Citizenship established at the recent meeting of the World's W. C. T. U., a basis of work has been formulated. Miss Willard requests that an appeal be made to state presidents and other leaders that in their annual addresses this fall they call attention to this new department of work and ask the women of the local unions for definite work on these lines. This appeal is hopefully made because we know that no women in the world are so patriotic nor so cognizant of the crying need of a thoroughly consecrated Christian citizenship, as they who have had it burned into their souls by the disappointments and heart-breaks resulting from the sacrifice of their cause at the ballot box, in the crucial hours when they had prayed and hoped for deliverance. The aims of this department shall be the promotion of CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP.

A citizenship which shall be one of brains and intellect and unselfish devotion to principle, having no sex distinction—where woman shall be as fully recognized and as effective as her brother, and where the Golden Rule shall be the basis of action—where loyalty to religion, not of creed or formalism, but "pure and undefiled before God and the Father"—a religion of helpfulness and personal consecration shall be the standard. A citizenship whose aim shall be the extermination of the liquor traffic and the opium trade, and every form of vice which debaucheth the citizen or worketh any ill to its neighbor. One which stands for the preservation of the Christian Sabbath and all institutions for the betterment of humanity, for public and private virtue, for the sanctity of marriage and the protection of the homes of the people. A citizenship which stands uncompromisingly and always—at the ballot box and elsewhere—for the overthrow of every institution or trade or business which robs womanhood and childhood of the sacred right to make the very best of the life given of God for His glory and for the purest human happiness. This department will coöperate with the oppressed and the downtrodden of every land in securing and enforcing just and righteous laws, and may God grant His blessing evermore upon the work and the workers.

There is now an opportunity for our women to secure the services of the National organizer as she makes her journey to and from the next

Treasurer's Corner.

The time for squaring up all the year's accounts draweth nigh. Thus far Arizona and Oregon are ahead in dues of last year, the latter nearly four hundred members. We trust every state will show a gain before the closing of the books. This will not be the case unless great diligence is exercised in looking after all the odds and ends of dues. The state treasurers are most of them wide awade to the needs of the situation, and are sending out earnest appeals to their county and local treasurers. Dues have been received from Minnesota, Texas, Wisconsin, South Carolina, Arizona, Oregon, West Washington and Kentucky; membership fee from Mrs. East, of Illinois, while Texas treasurer sends a donation of $2.13, and also $36.94 for Temple.

Let me repeat what I have said many times, do not send me subscriptions to THE UNION SIGNAL. I have nothing to do with that business. It is just as easy to make out your check to W. T. P. A. as to me, and should be so done. When one is sending me National funds, and it will save them time and trouble to include subscription money, I am more than willing to transfer it to W. T. P. A., but when subscribers are sending for THE UNION SIGNAL alone they should always send to W. T. P. A., Temple, Chicago, and not to National treasurer.

DELPHINA E. ELLIS, an invalid for twenty years and a member of the W. C. T. U., of Newberg, Ore., has gone to her heavenly reward. Her memory will long live in the minds and hearts of many to whom her uncomplaining endurance of suffering has proven a blessing.

MRS. SARAH J. OWENS, secretary of the W. C. T. U., of Cameron, N. Y., died June 16, aged forty-eight years. The white-ribboners held appropriate services over the remains and as a token of love covered her casket with flowers.

MRS. ANNA L. MORSE, of Farmer's Creek, Mich., passed to the eternal realms of peace August 10. She has been an earnest worker in the white ribbon ranks of the seventh district and has written many able articles for county and district conventions. Her loss will be deeply felt.

MRS. L. M. KIMBALL, president of the seventh district, Wisconsin, died suddenly at her home in Black River Falls, August 22, of heart failure. Mrs. Kimball was a most earnest and intelligent worker in the W. C. T. U. since its organization, and district president for the past six years.

The devoted mother of Mrs. Clara Drake White, of Volga, Ia., passed away several months ago, aged eighty-eight. She was a staunch white-ribboner and the last book she read except her Bible was "A Great Mother."

MRS. O. P. LIGHT, who was treasurer of Oklahoma W. C. T. U., until obliged by failing health to resign, died at the residence of her daughter in Wymere, Nebraska, August 4. Although very feeble she organized a union in Wymere, was elected its president and remained in office until called away.

MISS CARTER'S REPORT.

Since my last report, April 11, my time has been employed in my own state, where I have spent few idle days. After my return from Texas and a brief rest at home, I began work in Missouri, March 15, visiting the fifth, fourth and seventh districts. Then attended our state executive meeting at Louisiana, April 30 and May 1, and from there went to St. Louis for the Mississippi Valley Congress of Women, where I spoke several times, attended the state Equal Suffrage convention and also spoke at the banquet given in honor of Susan B. Anthony. The week following I lectured in three of the city churches, then went home for a brief rest. My next journey was into the twenty-sixth district, where I spent two weeks and attended the district convention. Home again for a little while, but July 1, I started for North Missouri, and for six weeks was engaged in the eighth, fourth, tenth and fourteenth districts, holding meetings two and three times each day.

The summary of my work in Missouri since March 15 is as follows: Lectures, 81; day meetings, 43; unions organized, 11; Y's, 3; members gained, 322; honoraries, 117; pledge-signers, 118. Besides addresses at state executive, two Sabbath-schools, teachers' institute, prayer-meeting, convention, Woman's Congress, two Normal schools, college, Presbytery, banquet, Endeavor, social, Fourth of July celebration and penitentiary. Am busy now with state and National reports: will attend thirtieth district convention August 30, and early in September start to Virginia for a month's work.

MR. GOTHAM—No, I never have a particle of fear on the ocean. Don't you know, sir, that one is safer on a transatlantic flyer than on a city street?

MR. LAKESIDE (of Chicago)—Humph! Well, to tell the truth, I believe if I had to choose between an ocean steamer and a New York street car, I'd do as you do—take the steamer.

MISTAKEN ANYHOW.—"Will you pass me the butter, please?" asked a seedy looking stranger of a snob, at a restaurant table. "That's the waiter over there, sir," was the supercilious reply. "I beg your pardon," returned the stranger, "I did make a mistake." "You're only adding insult, sir," broke in the snob; "nothing could induce me to believe that you mistook me for a waiter." "Certainly not," returned the stranger, "I mistook you for a gentleman!"

CLERK—Are you going to discharge me then?

DRUGGIST—Yes, I think we can dispense without you.

"ALL our neighborhood has been stirred up lately," said the old subscriber. The editor of the Bugle grabbed his pencil excitedly. "Tell us all about it," said he. "What we want is the news. What stirred it up?" "Plowin'."

A GENTLEMAN, accompanied by a lady wearing a handsome dress and bonnet, came out of the Albert Hall one night to find it raining, while they were without umbrella or waterproof clothing. "Why, Charles!" the lady cried, "it's raining." "So I see," said Charles calmly. "Well, what shall we do?" "I rather think we shall have to let it rain," replied the matter-of-fact husband. Excited by the disaster awaiting her garments, the lady amused the bystanders greatly by saying: "Why, Charles, how can we, when I have on this light dress and bonnet?"

A SMALL boy of four summers was riding on a hobby-horse, with a companion. He was seated rather uncomfortably on the horse's neck. After a reflective pause, he said, "I think if one of us gets off I could ride better."

"THE Methodists," says a droll Englishman, "they picks them out of the gutter, and the Baptists, they washes them; and the Congregationalists, they starches them."

A PHYSICIAN was walking along a road in the country one day. An old man met him who had a bottle of whisky sticking out of his pocket.

"Is this the way to the poor-house, sir?" asked the old man, pointing in the direction in which he was walking.

"No, sir," said the physician, "but this is,"—laying his hand on the bottle of whisky.

Send your name and address on postal card, and they will send you a trial case by mail free.

CHARLES DICKENS once received an invitation to a "Walter Scott" party, each guest being expected to appear in the character of one or the other of Scott's heroes. On the eventful night, however, Dickens appeared in simple evening dress, among a host of "Rob Roys" and "Ivanhoes." The host asked him which of Scott's characters he represented. "Why, sir," said Dickens, "I am a character you will find in every one of Scott's novels. I am the 'gentle reader.'"

IN a recent examination some boys were asked to define certain words and to give a sentence illustrating the meaning. Here are a few: Frantic means wild. I picked some frantic flowers. Athletic, strong; the vinegar was too athletic to use. Tandem, one behind another; the boys sit tandem at school. And then some single words were funnily explained: Dust is mud with the wet squeezed out; fins are fishes' wings; stars are the moon's eggs; circumference is distance around the middle of the outside.

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address,

Home Hints.

Jellied chicken.—Line a pint bowl with slices of hard-boiled eggs, fill with chopped chicken that has been seasoned with salt, white pepper, celery salt and melted butter. Pour over one coffee cup of water in which one tablespoonful of gelatine has been dissolved. Set on ice.

A subscriber who has been pleased with the recipes we have given for temperance drinks, recommends the following simple and easily prepared drink. She says, "one drink nearly always avails to quench thirst, when no amount of clear water will suffice." Put one large teaspoonful each of white sugar and good vinegar to two-thirds of a glass of cold water, not iced. Stir briskly and drink immediately. Where fresh fruit is abundant this would hardly be a substitute for fruit juice, but in less fortunate localities it may be a welcome suggestion.

Fruit cake, which is generally made to keep for some length of time, should be iced only as it is needed. Icing when old turns yellow, and has a musty taste when the cake otherwise is in perfect condition.

Dr. O. B. Bird, of Elm, N. J., sends the following solution to a recent query in this column: For Buffalo moths, dissolve ten grains of corrosive sublimate (bichloride of mercury) in one pint of water, and apply with feather to joints of furniture, cracks, around edges of carpet and in all hiding places. Do not apply to clothing. Mark the bottle poison in large letters; red or other bright colored ink will be an additional safeguard. Antidote, two raw eggs, or glass of milk, then warm water to produce copious vomiting; then egg or milk to be retained.

New bread or biscuits should be perfectly cold before being put away in the closely covered bread box. The box should be scalded and dried in the sun every few days to keep it from getting musty.

When you enclose postage stamps in a letter, how do you secure them? They should not be put in loose, for they may be missing when the letter is opened. They should not be stuck on, for it is difficult to remove them. Cut with a sharp penknife two parallel slits at the top of your letter, and slip in your stamps. Not long ago we received a silver quarter enclosed in a letter. The sender had taken a piece of cardboard, cut in it a circular hole the size of the quarter, which was placed therein, and bits of paper were mucilaged over it on each side.

The Golden Rule gives a recipe for "prize endeavor sponge cake," and it is safe to accept almost anything from that source. Use five eggs, one-half pound of pulverized sugar, one quarter pound of flour and the juice and yellow rind of one lemon. Separate the whites and yolks of the eggs, beat them very light; to the beaten whites add the sugar which has been sifted several times, and beat again. To the beaten yolks add the juice and grated rind of the lemon and the flour, then beat the mixtures well together. Bake about forty-five minutes. For the icing beat the white of one egg very light, add enough sugar to make very stiff; thin with about one tablespoonful of milk. If this makes it too thin add more sugar and flavor to taste. The icing should be very stiff.

Many people dislike eating green corn from the cob, and it certainly is not a very graceful performance, but if the cook will prepare the corn as here directed, much of the discomfort at the table will be done away with. After the corn is cooked cut down the ear through the middle of each row of kernels with a sharp knife, beginning at the small end of the cob. When eaten the nutritious pulp will pop into your mouth and the tough, indigestible hull will be left on the cob. "Don't cut too deep and don't bite too hard," says our authority.

An exchange says that in the absence of a refrigerator, a watermelon can be kept cold by wrapping in a large wet towel and placing it in the sun. The process of evaporation cools the melon.

A preparation of one part sulphuric acid and fifty parts alcohol is the best for cleaning nickel or nickel plated articles. Let the pieces lie in this bath for a few seconds, then wash with water, rinse with alcohol and rub dry with a linen cloth. Five seconds is usually sufficient time for them to lie in the acid solution, but the yellowest article will be restored to brightness if soaked for fifteen seconds.

The Washing of the Feet

gets to be a weighty matter, in these days when colored stockings will shed their colors. Pearline does this work beautifully.

It's not only thoroughly effective, but it's healthy. Doctors recommend Pearline as a soak for rheumatism.

Try it in the bath. It will give you a new idea of cleanliness. Bathing with Pearline is a perfect luxury.

Beware Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you, "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, if your grocer sends you an imitation, be honest—send it back. 432 JAMES PYLE, New York.

Publisher's Notes

Mrs. Barney's Bible Readings are so well known, and Mrs. Barney herself is so well loved of white-ribboners, that in announcing a Reading from her pen we feel sure of giving pleasure. As World's superintendent of penal, charitable and reformatory work and National evangelist, Mrs. Barney is, as may be imagined, one of the busiest of busy W. C. T. U. women; nevertheless she consented (at the urgent request of the editor) to prepare upon short notice the Reading for September. Her subject is "Heart Enlargement," and her words breathe that consecrated, uplifting spirit, that closeness to the divine and to the human, which is possible only to the soul whose life is "hid with Christ in God." The Reading is one which cannot fail to reach the heart and quicken the spiritual life of every reader.

IN TIME OF NEED.

"Have you a copy of the Birthday Book?" "Have you an extra silver pin?" were two questions asked us frequently on the outward-bound steamer, and it occurred to us that no white-ribboner should start from home without these essentials. Fountain pens were pressed into service constantly, and the possessor of a Birthday Book had an air of conscious superiority as she saw her neighbor asking for autographs on an ordinary pad of paper. Just what you need at state, county and National conventions is the White Ribbon Birthday Book.

A prominent literary woman who has read Miss Willard's experience in riding a bicycle, and who is indulging in the fascinating exercise, expresses the opinion that every mother should place in the hands of the son or daughter who owns a bicycle this most delightful book—not so much for the mastery of the art as the mastery of one's self.

Price 50 cents.

"DO EVERYTHING"

has been brought out by our beloved Chieftain at her own expense, and is placed upon the American market by the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association that it may aid white-ribboners in the "all-round movement" it advocates.

"Everything is not in the temperance reform, but the temperance reform should be in everything."

"'Organized mother love' is the best definition of the white-ribbon movement, and it can have no better motto than, 'Make a chain, for the land is full of bloody crimes and the city of violence.'"

"If we can remember this simple rule, it will do much to unravel the mystery of the much controverted 'do everything policy,' viz.: That every question of practical philanthropy or reform has its temperance aspect, and with that we are to deal."

These extracts from the preface will suggest the helpfulness of the new manual. It should be purchased by unions in quantities at the nominal price of 25c.

A NEW LEAFLET

By Rev. Frances Townsley,

for use in evangelistic work, has just been issued. It is entitled and is written in affectionate memory "of one who could." It tells of a sick-bed from which radiated such an atmosphere of sunshine and genuine Christian joy as to both rebuke and inspire all who came within its influence. The story is sent forth, says the author, "with the prayer that other hearts may see the possibility of their own peace and gladness and patience in the Lord."

"CANST THOU SING IN THE STORM?"

THE ASCENT OF LIFE. By Stinson Jarvis, contains a series of chapters on "the psychic laws and forces in nature," the theme being the hypnotic influences or mesmerism. The work first appeared as a series of papers in the Arena.

This volume is written for the help of workers in Sunday-schools and is filled with practical suggestions that have come from experience. HOW MARCUS WHITMAN SAVED OREGON. By Oliver W. Nixon, M. D. This is a heartfelt tribute to the memory of a man whose heroic achievements and tragic death are, after more than fifty years, finding a place in the thoughts of his countrymen. His name should be placed among the leaders of those who have died a martyr's death for Christian patriotism. The pathetic appeal of four Flathead Indians who visited St. Louis in 1832, coming from Oregon in search of teachers and the "White man's Book of Life," shows that even in the first third of this century the natives of the far west had received from some source a glimpse of "that light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world" and their cry was for more light; no one was then ready to answer the call.

Their appeal, did, however, two years later reach the heart of two Christian bodies. In 1834 Jason Lee, of the Methodist Episcopal church, with a small party went out, and in 1835 Dr. Marcus Whitman and the Rev. Samuel Parker were sent by the American Board to make a report of the real conditions, present and prospective, of Oregon, now the beautiful and productive states of Oregon, Washington and Idaho. The account of Dr. Whitman's return to New York the following year, accompanied by two Indian boys, whom he placed in school for the winter, his marriage to a woman of fine family, who was as deeply interested in the Indian mission work as himself, their westward trip in company with Rev. and Mrs. Spaulding, H. H. Gray, two teamsters and the Indian boys, is full of appeal to the reader's sympathetic and at times almost breathless interest. Their cheerful courage and brave endurance under the most trying conditions in crossing the plains and journeying over the mighty ranges of mountains is only found in those actuated by a high and holy purpose. One of the members of the American Fur Company which they overtook on the plains, seeing the earnest bravery of the little missionary band, said: "There is something that the Honorable Hudson Bay Company cannot drive out of Oregon." The climax of the record is reached in "Whitman's Ride," and its results. Many perilous rides are recorded in history and song, but none equals or even approaches in heroism and long-enduring self-sacrifice this trip of Marcus Whitman, on horseback in winter, from the Pacific to the Atlantic ocean, to save that now wealthy portion of our country from the British who were counting on the lethargy of our government to give them full and easy possession of the territory of which they appreciated the value. Congress was slow to believe his report, but that it was finally acted on and Oregon saved to be represented in these later days by three stars in our beautiful flag should alone be enough to give Mr. Whitman a first place on the roll of our nation's brave men. That he returned to his chosen field only to be murdered together with his wife and their devoted band of helpers, by those whom they had worked so patiently and lovingly to benefit, gives them a place among the noble company of martyrs who have died for conscience' sake.

Signal Notes.

THE Salvation Army of Boston are giving mothers and children a steamboat outing of several hours each on the bay, furnishing refreshments also. Three thousand persons have already received the benefits of this kindly plan.

REV. C. F. GATES, of Chicago, has been elected president of Euphrates college, at Harpoot, Turkey. He has served for fifteen years as a missionary in Mardin, Mesopotamia. This is the only college in Armenia and is under American control.

THE Maharajah of Baroda, India, has issued a mandate to the effect that no new saloons shall be opened without the sanction of the presiding official. Further, if five-sixths of the home owners and residents present a plea that all the liquor shops be closed, it shall be granted, the same official giving the order.

BEFORE the enforcement of the excise law in New York, Sunday was always a busy day in the emergency wards of the hospitals. The most of the cases brought in were men injured in fights in saloons, or by accidents, because being under the influence of liquor they were unable to take care of themselves. Sunday is now the quietest day of the week.

DR. CARLOS MARTYN, of Chicago, who is giving such practical instruction from the platform in good citizenship is in constant demand. He has been visiting various Chautauquas this summer and is now ready to make engagements for lectures during the coming season. He is especially willing to respond to calls from Christian Endeavor unions and Epworth leagues.

A NATIONAL temperance congress will be held at Chester, England, September 30 and October 1, 2, 3, 4, Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson, president. One day will be devoted to each of the following topics: educational and moral aspects of temperance, scientific teachings concerning alcohol, industrial, commercial and statistical aspects of temperance, legislative remedies for temperance.

MR. CRITTENTON, the founder of the Florence Crittenton rescue homes, is about to make a missionary tour of the United States in the interest of these homes. He and his party will travel in his private car, "Good News." He will stop at the large cities from three to ten days where evangelistic services will be held and missions and homes established. Nineteen missions devoted exclusively to the saving of fallen women have been opened through his efforts.

THE president of the Cambridge, Mass., Grocery Association says that since that city has had no-license, for every dollar of bad debts he now has, he formerly had $10. "There is not a copper of money in the liquor traffic for any city in the world." The savings banks show the improved condition of the people. The last year under saloons there were $140,000 of new deposits. The first year under prohibition $586,000. The increase in valuation of taxable property gave an income of $30,000 in excess of the former income from saloon licenses, of $1,000 each.

Two new government measures in Canada, one amending the factory act, so as to secure a woman inspector, and the other amending the mercantile act, were introduced this summer into the House of Parliament of the Dominion of Canada and carried. This is the result of two years' patient waiting and energetic work on the part of the W. C. T. U. of the Province of Ontario, brought to a focus this spring by an interview between the sub-executive, headed by the Ontario president, Mrs. May R. Thornley, and Sir Oliver Mowatt and cabinet. The woman factory inspector, a Toronto lady, has already been appointed.

THE Massachusetts Prohibition state committee has chosen September 9 and 10 for holding caucuses to choose delegates to their state convention. Under the election act of 1895 they are exempt from nomination papers for candidates on the state ticket, and will hold caucuses in all towns and cities of the state. On September 23 and 24 they will hold caucuses to choose delegates to their representative and senatorial conventions, in such districts as are eligible under election act of 1895. Their state convention is to be held at Y. M. C. A. hall, Boston, on September 18. This date will also be observed as the twenty-fifth annual convention since the party was organized, and great effort will be put forth to make it one of the most interesting in the history of the party. In the evening a grand ratification meeting and jubilee will be held at Music Hall, with Hon. Neal Dow and Hon. John G. Woolley as the speakers of the evening.

Of the Yellowstone is 1,200 feet deep. It has been excavated out of hard volcanic rock. You can imagine how many million years it has taken to do this. It is a wonderful combination in form and color. You ought to see it. Probably you intend to some time. Better go this year. Rates are low. Send six cents to Chas. S. ## SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

The Medico-legal Congress convened at New York last week.

The British Parliament has been prorogued until November 18.

The national encampment of the G. A. R., and its great auxiliary, the Woman's Relief Corps, met at Louisville, Ky., Monday.

An additional amount of fifty million francs is to be asked of the French Chambers on account of the Madagascar campaign.

Democrats in Nebraska declared against free silver; the same party in Utah, on the same day, asked for its free and unlimited coinage.

The Trades Union Congress at Cardiff was addressed September 5 by Samuel Gompers and P. J. Maguire, representatives from labor circles of America.

In consequence of the activity of anarchists it has been found necessary to guard the person of the young Czar of Russia as carefully as was that of the late autocrat, his father.

It is announced that the intrepid suffrage leader, Susan B. Anthony, is to retire from the platform for the purpose of writing the account of her forty years' labors in the cause of woman's enfranchisement.

The comptroller of the Treasury has decided that the act of the last Congress authorizing the appropriation of five million dollars for the payment of the sugar bounty to southern planters is unconstitutional.

The United States state department has ordered an independent investigation of the Chengtu anti-missionary riots in China, which occurred in June, some weeks before the Kuching attacks which a British American commission is now investigating.

MRS. CARSE has returned from her brief vacation and in less than a week secured twenty-five hundred dollars for the Temple. Particulars will be found in her column, which is on page 13 this week. This dauntless woman has now entered upon her second hundred thousand of the three hundred thousand dollars which she is to raise by January, 1896, and starts East in a few days to increase the sum before the National Convention. If you cannot help her pray do not hinder by lack of faith, either expressed or unexpressed.

UNDER the new constitution of Kentucky, women are entitled to vote for members of educational boards. A dispatch announces naively that they must be registered the same as male voters, and vote in the same manner, but as the boards are strictly non-partisan, women will not be recognized as belonging to any political party! A progressive Lexington county judge declares his intention to go a step farther and appoint women officers of election and registration to conduct the women's department of the voting. Thus works the entering wedge.

MRS. MARGARET A. LAKE, corresponding secretary of Maryland, writes that at a meeting of the executive committee of the Baltimore city union, held September 2, there was a large and enthusiastic attendance, and the arrangements for the National W. C. T. U. Convention were renewed with spirit. The next issue of THE UNION SIGNAL will contain a full list of hotels (of which the Albion, kept by a lady, will probably be headquarters), also the names of committees and general items of interest. For a description of the convention hall see page 13.

FOR an energetic summer campaign, New Jersey white-ribboners, led by Mrs. Emma Bourne, are to be highly commended. Read this brief résumé of their work as a state union for two months as outlined by the president in a private letter: "Our state has its school of methods in July always. This was largely attended by our members and the arranged program was carried out with but one exception. Dr. Stokes made his greeting stronger than ever before, and said each year it should be proportionately stronger as he could increase his vocabulary and intensity. This Ocean Grove meeting begins a series of summer meetings at Seven Camp-meeting Associations; to the W. C. T. U. is given a day and evening at each. Ocean City, two days, and Island Heights, one day; these are both seashore resorts. Mt. Tabor is a mountain resort. Pittman, Seaville and Malaga are grove meetings. All give us large audiences and open the way for new organizations. They help us to represent our work before strangers. At Mt. Tabor, August 14, fifteen preachers took part in the discussions opened by the W. C. T. U. Our next large gathering was September 2, 3, 4 and 5 at the state fair at Waverly, where the state owns a building which cost two thousand three hundred and fifty dollars. We hold a gospel temperance meeting there every day. Mr. Wilbur, of Vineland, the Prohibition candidate for governor, was one of the speakers. We also publish and distribute each day (of that week) five thousand copies of The State Fair Daily, gotten up expressly for the fair,—an eight page paper, three hundred copies UNION SIGNAL fair number and three hundred copies state minutes besides leaflets. At the interstate fair in Trenton we distribute literature, also at Cumberland and Cape May county fairs following on. The Newark union has also purchased a large wooden building for restaurant purposes at Waverly. This week Mrs. Blair, Mrs. Boole and Mrs. Bailey will be speaking, and next week following the Beveridges will have meetings every night in Summit." The culmination of this excellent series of meetings will be reached in the state convention at Paterson, October 8 to 11, at which the principal speakers will be Mrs. Rounds, Miss Parrish, Mrs. Rice and Mr. Woolley.

A POPULIST Prohibitionist thinks we are making a great mistake in advocating such doctrine as is contained in the editorial of August 22, entitled, "Our View of the Money Question." "You say," he says, "the reasons are obvious why you should have no declared policy on the money question. If this idea is to govern the Prohibition party the reason is obvious why it will always be a party of minor importance." Now we thought we had made it perfectly clear that "our view" was that of a representative of the white-ribbon organization, not the view of any party—not even of the one to which we lend our influence. "This idea" (of having no declared policy) clearly does not govern the Prohibition party. Inasmuch as there is no radical difference between the platform utterance of that party on this question and the declared policy of the two parties which, numerically at least, are of major importance, we do not think our correspondent's point is well taken. He concludes by saying: "Let Prohibitionists help make laws that will keep Americans from starving to death for the benefit of the vultures of this country and the Jews of Europe, and with returning prosperity the liquor question will soon thereafter be solved." Fully realizing as we do the grave importance of the financial problems, we still say, let everybody help make laws that will cleanse the hands of this nation and give it a conscience void of offense toward God and man, and the money question will soon be satisfactorily solved.

IN our last issue we called attention to the new "reform" movement inaugurated by the Illinois Woman's Alliance for the licensing of houses of ill-fame, with medical examination for the women, and state adoption of the illegitimate children. Such a plan might well cause a shudder of horror to go through the womanhood of the entire nation, since no more successful blow could be aimed against the purity and sanctity of the home. It therefore gives us great pleasure to announce that the plan did not originate with the Alliance as a whole but was submitted to it by the police committee, and, when put to the final vote, was rejected by an overwhelming majority—all but the three members of the committee voting against it. The Alliance also placed itself upon record through a strong resolution as being unalterably opposed to the licensing of the social evil in any manner whatever. That the victory was so complete is, in a large measure, due to the vigilance of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. At the meeting held in the Sherman House, Chicago, September 6, to which all interested in the movement were invited, there were present, in addition to the members of the Alliance, Mrs. Barker, Mrs. Rounds, Mrs. Lake and Mrs. Clarke, representing the National, state, district and Chicago Central and West Side unions. Each made a stirring address and Mrs. Barker announced with the weight of deep conviction which always accompanies her words, that if such a bill were to be introduced into the Illinois legislature, or the legislature of any other state in the Union, the women of the W. C. T. U. would fight it with their every power. It is but due to Dr. Underhill, the woman who proposed the measure, to state that she has done most heroic work in striving to save the poor girls in houses of ill-fame from the infamous blackmail levied upon them by the police, and she is most honest in her convictions that such a law would be in the interests of that oppressed and downtrodden class, as well as in the interests of the children born into such cruel conditions. She has only failed to see—and alas! how much is compressed into that "only"—that the recognizing of sin as a "necessary evil" and the provisions to lessen its consequences, are of all things most opposed to the righteousness of God. It must forever be the crowning glory of God's justice, that "whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap,"—and forever also must it be true that "They oppress their children's children,

Who make compromise with sin."

A WHITE LIFE FOR TWO.

BY LLEWELLYN A. MORRISON.

"There must be but one standard of purity for men and women, and that the highest."—Frances E. Willard at World's W. C. T. U. Convention, London, England, June, 1895.

Do ye hear the clarion message from the battlements of Truth,
Ringing outwards, O, my brothers, unto you?
Can ye understand the import of this challenge, which, forsooth,
Claims that each in heart and practice must be true?
The strong, distinctive thesis of the Christian church to-day—
Born of consecrated service by the Word—
Is the sanctified accretion of her gleanings by the way:
Holy being, holy doing, for the Lord.

Every era hath its "credo" as the world swings nearer God;
Old time standards with their mundane measures fail;
Clearer still from Wisdom's watch-towers ring her tocsin-calls abroad,
While her yeomen fostered heresies assail.
It might suit medieval rulers (who can doubt 'twas so of yore?)
To condone their sordid, mercenary kin
And to visit on the sin'd-against, whose frailties they deplore,
All the judgments due their own unchastened sin,

But the world, with conscience quickened by the vibrant life of truth,
And expanded by the harmonies of Right,
Slow returning by the "spirit's law" to lost immortal youth,
Sees the dual creeds absolving in the light.
Every heart must needs be holy. Every call hath "Thee" and "Thou."
Challenge errors armor'd "Anaks" on the plain!
Breeze your banners! Ring the watchwords: "God" and "Life" and "Duty," now!
Christ, the Holy One, who judgeth, comes to reign.

. . . . . .

Do you hear the Father calling, oh, my sisters, do ye hear?
Like a mother's winsome, waking call at morn,
The promised day of freedom and of justice draweth near,
Hope's apocalyptic jubilee is born.
Did ye lead the race to evil? 'Twas in reaching after God;
Though ye lost Him ye returned Him unto men.
Ye have borne for Him the burden, scourge and scorn and lictor's rod;
Ye shall wear the crowns of honor in His reign.

Let your sanctified allegiance to the oracles of God
And your potent advocation of His Word
Help the breaking-dawn light brighten, of the day the saints shall laud,
When the ransomed nations all shall serve the Lord.
Come with all your gifts and graces, holy hearts and helpful hands!
Come, demanding of all others what ye give,
And as virtue's reign of purity and righteousness expands,
All the world shall learn the royal way to live.

REAPING THE WHIRLWIND.

A Tale of the Social Inquisition.

In Two Chapters.

BY FRANCES RHODES SAUNDERS.

CHAPTER I.

Courageous indeed is the woman that takes for the heroine of her story a girl who falls below the measure of a perfect woman nobly planned, and were I now creating the character whose o'er true tale I propose to tell, I could, not but make her stronger of will, surer in self-control and more steadfast in her abhorrence to the principle of self-preservation, to say nothing of the standard of purity in thought and word and action with which every honest girl starts out in life.

But little Constance is no creation of a fanciful brain, and I give her story as she lived and suffered it, and I, looking on beheld and could not change it.

On the first day of my school at Hazel Hill in Lincoln township, among all the bright faces that met me with a smile of welcome none was so sweet and fair as that of a young girl sitting well up in front, where my eyes rested often upon her. She gave her name as Constance Leon, and her age fifteen. I found her to be the lightest hearted creature I ever knew. Her soft, full lips were always smiling, and laughing eyes of the sky looked out of a sunny pink and white face, bordered with soft rings of yellow hair that, forestalling the fashion of bangs which had not yet come in, stole over the fair, smooth brow in the prettiest wayward curls and crinkles.

Sometimes when she came near me I could not refrain from stroking the fair young head, and then she would catch my hand and press it in a little ecstasy of gratitude or kiss it softly. Her gentle heart seemed brimming over with love, and a tender word or a caress would fill the blue eyes with a shining light.

Many other girls outstripped her in their classes, but she was always gentle and obedient, with no show of temper or wilfulness. Every one called her a good girl. I sometimes felt that perhaps she was too good, and almost wished that she might have a dash of temper and self-will, since she was so pretty and affectionate.

There seemed to be no parental restraint in the matter of her receiving attentions from the boys of her acquaintance. In fact, it was quite the custom for young men and girls of this age to go out in pairs to the many parties, spelling schools and other evening entertainments that enlivened the rural districts. It would have been a useless sacrifice of friendship to suggest to Connie's mother the unwisdom of allowing the child such utter freedom from the restraining safeguards wise parents throw about their daughters. In the eyes of her mother such a suggestion would have implied an intimation of Connie's untrustworthiness, and would have been resented accordingly. For Connie was not one of the bold, forward sort of girls. She was modest and quiet in her fun, though, of course, she enjoyed the society of young men, among whom her pretty face and sunny temper made her a favorite.

I was gone from Hazel Hill the next three years, and upon my return people were talking of Connie Leon's disgrace. It was the old story of a girl's misplaced confidence, always misplaced when she trusts her honor in another's keeping, and many tongues were rolling the story over and over in its various phases and with manifold versions.

Connie said nothing. She seemed frightened and dazed. Her blue eyes lost their shine, and the pink cheeks grew whiter than the fair brow under the yellow locks. What had at first been but an uncertain surmise and a vague rumor, awakened chiefly by the sudden disappearance of Harry Deane, Connie's lover, became a horribly apparent fact.

Connie went nowhere, but curious neighbors sought every opportunity of observing her and reporting the result of their observations to their circle, all good, virtuous women, like Cæsar's wife, above suspicion, with daughters above reproach, if not indeed above temptation.

Connie's mother grew pale and thin, and her father looked old and haggard. The observers reported with evident relish that Gordon Leon was likely to lose his mind over his daughter's shame, and everybody felt more and more outraged with "the brazen creature" who had brought all this disgrace upon her family. One of the questions frequently discussed was whether Connie's younger sister and her brother, who had been regarded as quite an eligible catch, ought now to be received in the society of respectable families. Younger members of the order of observers held modest little conclaves in which they utterly condemned their old companion and mildly pitied her poor brother and sister, who, of course, could never hold up their heads with other folks again.

And what of Connie? Poor Connie, eating her heart out with remorse and misery, now feeling herself the chief of sinners and praying for death to claim her before she brought another being under the curse of her sin, now rankling bitterly under the injustice and cruelty of her position, and always keenly aware of the shame and misery she had brought upon all who truly loved her! Her poor little crushed and bleeding heart never forgot for a moment that these innocent ones were borne down with her under her avalanche of woe. In the horror of it all she forgot the love that had been the whole of life to her. The past was a dream, the present a nightmare and the future—ah! she dared not look at the future! If only God would be merciful and let her die she would ask nothing more.

The whole horrible situation had seemed so unreal at first that she could not believe it true. It could not be that Harry had gone and left her to bear this awful thing alone after all his professed love for her. She could not comprehend it. But there was his letter in which he had said: "God knows I love you, darling, but what can I do? We cannot marry now. I have no place to take you—nothing to give you. We are most unfortunate and we must bear the penalty of our fault. I am going away, but I shall never forget you, Connie." And he was gone!

No outcry was made nor any effort to bring him back. Gordon Leon said to his wife that they could not wish the fellow to do their child a further wrong by marrying her unwillingly. Harry's people mourned for him and blamed the doll-faced creature who had driven their boy into exile.

Connie Leon's boy was two years old and a handsome little fellow. When his shrinking young mother led him into church the observers found much relish in noting how he was "the very image of Harry Deane." Some who would have found excuse in their bodily infirmities for absenting themselves from the house of the Lord, suddenly became very punctual in their attendance when Connie began to come with her baby; and now for two years they had zealously attended the morning service where a large part of their devotions consisted in watching the child's growing likeness to his father and speculating upon whether the mother felt as humble as she ought, coming as she did to communion with honest people.

For Connie had gone before the church meeting and with burning cheeks and aching heart confessed her sin and asked to be forgiven, after which, of course, she could not be dropped. So her name remained on the church book and she came regularly to the service, though expecting no friendly recognition and receiving none, except from a few ancient dames, whose years and moral standing were sufficient proof against the contamination of such as she. From all her former associates the girl was as effectually separated as if the grave had closed over her susceptible little heart.

Her brother and sister went out among the young people again, but never by any chance was Connie's name mentioned in their presence. To speak that sullied name in the company of these young members of her family would have been considered a most indelicate violation of good manners.

She was now twenty, though she looked much older, in her sober gown and bonnet, with the sunny, rebellious hair caught back in the plainest fashion possible. A widow may wear the habiliments of woe over her bereaved heart, but for hearts crushed and broken, there is no garb of mourning prescribed, unless it be that the fallen woman—there are no fallen men—if she wishes to be regarded with a fragment of confidence, must not adorn herself with any semblance of the little arts and furbishings of other girls.

So on this Sunday morning Constance—people had left off using the old pet name in speaking of her—wore the dress of a middle-aged woman and looked a part of it. By no chance did she allow her eyes to wander as she passed with her father and mother up the aisle. She could not school her heart to indifference, nor keep down the hot mantle of shame that had burned her face at the averted eyes she saw when she had looked at her old friends. Now she had learned to control her glance, and so did not see the tall young man who regarded her and the child so closely throughout the service.

MISS WILLARD'S NEW BOOK.

A Review.

BY LADY HENRY SOMERSET.

Every profession has its text-books. The big brown tomes stand as monuments of legal study and research; the shelves of the medical man are filled with folios; the student of literature has his library; but philanthropy alone has hitherto been thought outside the world of study. Good-doing has been haphazard, and only lately do we realize that we must work after a plan, as carefully studied, as deeply thought out as that of any of the recognized professions.

Miss Willard, in her little book, "Do Everything," strikes the key-note when she says in her admirable chapter on organization:

"Alone we can do little. Separated we are units of weakness; but aggregated we become batteries of power. Agitate, educate, organize; these are the deathless watchwords of success. The fingers of the hands can do little alone, but correlated into a fist they become formidable. The plank borne here and there by the sport of wave is an image of imbecility, but frame a thousand planks of heart of oak into a hulk, put in your engine with its heart of fire, fit out your ship and it shall cross at a right angle those same waves, to the port it has purposed to attain. We want all those like-minded with us, who would put down the dramshop, exalt the home, redeem manhood and uplift womanhood, to join hands with us for organized work according to a plan. It took the allied armies to win at Waterloo, and the alcohol Napoleon will capitulate to a no less mighty army."

This manual will be invaluable in all kinds of reform work; but especially to the thousands the world over who are banded together against all poisons that steal away the brain, and to every individual who wishes to understand the underlying principles that govern the greatest organized force of women in our day.

After relating the early history of the Crusade movement in America and its organized outcome, and detailing the growth of the society, Miss Willard describes how the concept of the world's work came to her. Chinatown in San Francisco had given her an object lesson in the result of occidental avarice and oriental degradation.

"There was borne in upon my spirit," she says, "a distinct illumination resulting in this solemn purpose. But for the intrusion of the sea, the shores of China and the far East would be part and parcel of our own. We are one world of tempted humanity; the mission of the white-ribbon women is to organize the motherhood of the world for the peace and purity, the protection and exaltation of its homes. We must send forth a clear call to our sisters yonder, and our brothers, too. We must be no longer hedged about by the artificial boundaries of states and nations; we must utter as women what good and great men long ago declared as their watchword, 'The whole world is my parish and to do good my religion.'"

She goes on to relate the development of the scheme; the wonderful work accomplished by the round-the-world missionaries—Mrs. Leavitt, Miss Ackermann, Dr. Kate Bushnell, Mrs. Elizabeth Andrew, Miss Alice Palmer and Mary Allen West (who, after a few weeks of heroic exertion, passed away, leaving a memory that is hallowed by all good people in the beautiful empire of Japan). She describes the labor connected with canvassing names for the great Polyglot Petition, a document which is unrivaled in the number of its signatures and the variety of languages in which it is indorsed.

The work of the white-ribbon women has sometimes been called visionary and unpractical. The refutation of any such statement is to be found in the account given of a young minister's diagnosis of the movement:

"In our town," he said, in an address of welcome to the W. C. T. U., "it is quite likely that many do not so much as know that there is such a society. But what does that signify? What matter if the organist is invisible so that the music floods the air and stirs the heart? The W. C. T. U. is the skilled musician playing upon the keys of public sentiment. Our town knows that somehow there is a waking-up to the merits of total abstinence and prohibition; the dry bones are being shaken; the atmosphere has more elasticity and ozone in it; social drinking is at a discount, and license-voting not a thing to be proud of. Let us go into the organ loft and see what stops and keys are moving. Ah! there is the stop of Prevention turned on and Education also, and Evangelism, Social Work, Legal Work, all dominated by the tuneful vox humana of woman's gentle sympathy. . . .

"For instance, here's my church—a rich-toned orchestra of good people but not attuned to the modern temperance movement. Tap, tap, tap comes a hand firm but delicate upon my study door. In walks the superintendent of evangelistic work and invites me to speak at the next gospel meeting down in the waiting room of the railway station. Beside her is the superintendent of temperance literature, who puts a fresh copy of that racy paper, THE UNION SIGNAL, upon the study table and says, 'Please accept this with the compliments of our society; we have subscribed for every minister in town.' She then suggestively adds, 'And may I leave this bulletin of our white ribbon publishing house, one hundred twenty-five employés and nearly all women?' These ladies are introduced by the W. C. T. U. vice-president for my own church who asks me to become an honorary member, hands me a leaflet on 'Unfermented Wine at the Communion Table,' decorously remarking that 'she wants my opinion of it,' and the bright, kindly trio retire not having consumed more than three minutes of my time and not having wounded my ecclesiastical dignity."

In like manner the pastor goes on to tell of the work of the superintendent of Sunday-schools; of her efforts to get temperance teaching introduced there; of the press superintendent and her interviews with the editor of local papers; of the young women's work; and at the close of his speech Miss Willard says:

"One of our modest, self-distrustful women whispered, 'Whoever knew that we had done so much? Why, I feel like a ray of light seen through a prism!"

The duties and qualifications of officers are admirably set forth and an invaluable experience can be gained as to the stamp of women needed for active and aggressive work in local societies.

The chapter that deals on departments of work is one that should be carefully studied. On the principles that it embodies hangs the success of the movement among women. It is the education that teaches the proportion and adjustment of one aspect of philanthropy to another which alone can give just and accurate views as to the importance of remedial or reform measures. "The White Ribbon Question Box" chapter is full of bright, crisp information, on all aspects of the woman's movement, invaluable to workers; and the chapters that follow deal with every aspect of the practical work in a most helpful manner.

"The summing up of the whole matter," as Miss Willard calls her final chapter, contains the basic principles upon which all organized work must be founded, and well would it be if those who lead the associated efforts of women were versed in the precepts there laid down.

Of the success of the society there can be now little doubt. The force of the organization is shown in Australia, Africa, Canada and America, and its methods have quickened the life of our English society and doubled its membership. The reason is not far to seek; it lies in the spirit which throbs through the whole being of the World's Union, and Miss Willard has incarnated this idea in words that should be read, pondered and prayed over by women everywhere.

THE SALOON AND THE SABBATH.

BY MRS. F. E. BRITTEN.

I.

The Wine and Spirit Gazette in a recent issue, speaking of the Polyglot Petition with which we are so familiar, says: "The Polyglot temperance petition, said to be thirty miles long, from which so much is hoped by Miss Frances E. Willard and Lady Henry Somerset, has dragged its weary length to Washington under the auspices of the Adams Express Company. Why was it not borne in a gilded chariot heralded by the pomp of ecclesiasical surroundings?" And after a brief statement of its contents adds, "If brevity is the soul of wit what judgment must be passed on a thirty-mile document but that it is arrant idiocy? The Petition reminds us of the mediæval story of the devil who vainly endeavored on a parchment to take down the conversation of two women. In attempting to stretch the parchment with his teeth he severely banged his head against the church porch, when he sagely remarked he must, indeed, be a fool,

"'To think a parchment or even a skin,
Could hold two women's talk when they begin.'

"It wastes thirty miles of good material to hold this female talk about universal temperance." This female talk about universal temperance wastes good material—does it? Something seems to have disturbed their peace of mind!

Emerson in his essay on politics says: "No forms can have any dangerous importance while we are befriended by the laws of things. It makes no difference how many tons weight of atmosphere presses on our heads so long as the same pressure resists it within the lungs. We need not be alarmed by the pressure of false ideas of political economy if we have resistant truth. It is the business of reformers by agitation to keep the lungs of society full of the truth." Perhaps this "female talk" has helped to accomplish this. There is an educative power in reform movements, which is too often overlooked. I would be a Prohibitionist if I knew that party would never elect an officer. We have resistant truth. I have been told by friends that I could not succeed if I espoused the prohibition cause; that it would kill any one in the lecture field to make this issue theirs. If this is true to-day as I know it has been in the past, then I am only the more firmly determined to "live or die, sink or swim, survive or perish" for prohibition. The principle is more important than the worker. If the principle is in imminent danger it is the more obligatory upon us "to keep the lungs full."

The Emperor Nicholas ordered his engineers to lay a road from St. Petersburg to Moscow. Soon they laid before him a card on which was the proposed road represented by a line that curved in and out. "What is that?" the Emperor asked. "Why, that is the best road." "Why do you make it so crooked?" "Oh, it turns to the left for a large city, to the right for a center of trade, and over there for that mass of people." Nicholas taking the card and turning it over placed a dot near the top and another near the bottom. Then with a ruler he drew a straight line connecting the dots. "Build me that road." "But what will become of that city, and these people?" was asked by the amazed men. The Emperor replied, "I don't know, let them look out for themselves."

Too long the reform elements have been zigzagging around between the home and the saloon. The Prohibitionist asks, "Why this crooked road?" "Oh, this turn is for the local option bill, that for uniform license, and then this way for the excise reformers. Then, of course, we must make this turn in the interests of silver, that for the Populist vote." The Prohibitionist turns the card over and makes one dot for the home and another for the saloon, then connects them with a straight line. "Move against the saloon on this line," he exclaims. "But what will become of the old parties?" "We don't know, let them look out for themselves." And in the spirit of Wendell Phillips concerning slavery, "Prohibition says of the home and of the saloon, this is justice and that iniquity! The track of God's thunderbolt is a straight line from one to the other, and the political parties or churches that cannot stand it must go out of the way." In this time of general lawlessness it is our business to keep the lungs full.

There is a prevailing disrespect for law. Officers sworn to enforce the law prove faithless. For an example, Rev. C. S. Starkweather, pastor of the Episcopal Church of the Redeemer, of Superior, Wisconsin, was recently elected mayor of that city. In an interview, as reported in the Minneapolis Times, he outlined his "policy," and said: "We are not going to have any Sunday-school government. I do not think that we can expect that just now in our municipal affairs. I have never been fanatical on matters religious, and I do not intend to be so with regard to matters political, either. I have got no hobby whatever. Prohibition I have little belief in because I do not think it prohibits. The saloons I must consider, to a certain extent, the poor man's clubs. Are the rich men's clubs shut on Sunday? Why, then, must the poor men's be shut on that day? The Sabbath is not a fast day, but a feast day. But I do not say that the saloon shall be open during all hours of that day. Laws about closing? Well, there are laws that only an ignoramus would try to carry out to the letter. I shall merely try to run the city affairs in a common sense, business way." Common sense, business way! What has an officer to do with law, anyhow? Does he take an oath of office that he may select law and enforce it according to his own judgment? The laws of that city declare against the open saloon on the Sabbath, which was practically admitted by the mayor. Then as an officer of the law it was his business to enforce law and prosecute the saloon. Mayor Starkweather, however, used the law, not in the interests of good government, but to extort money from the saloonkeepers. To the honor of the citizens of Superior, be it said, he was impeached and removed from office.

The open saloon on Sunday is a constant reminder to us all over our land of this prevailing disrespect for law. Therefore it is high time we considered these things in all their aspects.

In this discussion of the relation of the saloon to the Sabbath I shall not defend the first day of the week as a day of rest, nor shall I defend the Sabbath on the ground of divine law, or enter into the merits of the question as between the first day and the seventh day; but I shall take the fact of the Sabbath for granted. The discussion is rather in regard to the nominally legalized American Sabbath in its relation to the legalized saloon.

I. THE CIVIL SABBATH OR DAY OF REST.

In a country where church and state are separate, law cannot establish a religious Sabbath. It can only establish the Sabbath as a civil institution, and for reasons that are not necessarily religious. Law is not reformatory. It can only protect and restrict. It cannot produce righteousness. Thus law can only protect the Sabbath as a civil institution, prohibiting labor and traffic, or anything else which deprives any of their rest day.

(1) The nation has a right to make such a law on the ground of economics alone. Habitual work for the seven days is economically unprofitable. In railways and factories it has been proved beyond a doubt that machinery which rests one day in seven will last longer and render better service. But how slow we are to realize that this is true, not only of machinery, but also far more true of the workingman. His mental faculties and bodily strength will render better service when rested one day in seven. A few years ago four hundred and fifty railway locomotive engineers petitioned Mr. W. H. Vanderbilt for a cessation of Sunday labor. They gave as their first reason for this request that the never ending labor ruined their health and made them unable to perform their duties as well, because they worked to excess, and because they believed the best interests of their company, as well as their own, would be promoted by rest one day in seven. These men spoke after twenty years' experience.

(2) There is further reason for the civil Sabbath in the foundation of our government itself. In a republican form of government safe popular freedom must depend, in large measure, upon the conscientiousness of the people. Blackstone says: "A corruption of morals usually follows a profanation of the Sabbath." Therefore, the civil Sabbath is right on the ground of national self-preservation.

The government is not open to the charge of sectism on account of Sabbath laws. The supreme court, in sustaining one of its laws, says: "The act complained of here compels no religious observance, and offenses against it are punishable, not as sins against God, but as injurious to and having a malignant influence on society. It rests on the same foundation as a multitude of other laws upon our statute books, such as those against gambling, lotteries, keeping disorderly houses, polygamy, horse-racing."

Notice, though, that while all but four states—California, Montana, Nevada and Texas—have Sabbath laws, the national government has none. In California and Texas there are ordinances on Sabbath observance. Surely, the fact that the nation has no legal Sabbath is worthy our notice. The nation can and does defy the state laws by keeping open postoffice, selling material and sending mail the same as on any other day. Law ought to lead and not to follow the people. The general government ought to lead and not to follow the states. Coleridge said that God gives civilization in its Sundays fifty-two springs a year. Truly, we have a duty to perform, and that is to keep the public lungs full in regard to our need of a national Sabbath.

(3) The government has a right to make a legalized or national Sabbath accord with divine law. A large number of people observe one day for Sabbath. The government, in deference to the convenience of the many, has a right to make this same day the civil Sabbath.

(4) The government has a right to enforce the Sabbath law. Since a country that depends upon the moral worth of her citizens has a right to make laws in the interests of self-preservation, it is an axiomatic truth that she not only has a right to enforce them but is morally bound to insist upon obedience. Dr. Parkhurst, of New York, says: "Now a law that is set up to be played with is nothing more or less than a conscience pulverizer." It is our business to keep the lungs full until we shall not only have state Sabbath laws but national Sabbath laws, and also have those laws enforced fifty-two days out of each year.

(5) The government has a right to annihilate any evil institution that endangers the law. If evil institutions can treat Sabbath laws as dead letters, why shall they not likewise treat other laws? Where, then, shall there be safety for any law, for any person? Where, then, shall be the end of lawlessness? A drunken people can never be the safe basis of a free government. No person, no institution has a right to violate the law of the land. The inherent right of the government to enforce law carries with it the right to exterminate an organized disobedience, even to the extent of annihilation.

WILLARD HALL NOONTIDE LINKS.

The rain came down in a steady pour, it washed the smoke and dust from building to pavement and ran in rivulets through the streets.

As if by appointment the four winds of heaven met at every corner. They were loud mouthed and garrulous, now and then dropping to hysterical moan, as if in penance for a city's sin.

. . . . . .

Inside the Temple door, prone upon the marble, too weak and hungry to move, lay the wreck of a once magnificent Newfoundland dog, driven in by the storm.

Outside stood a little maid with yellow head brave lifted to the threatening sky, while rain crystals, splashing into Willard fountain, touched her outstretched hand in their upward bound.

Within the quiet of Willard Hall sat more than one hundred people, and over all was the peace of God.

. . . . . .

On the platform stood a little woman, sweet voiced and gentle, telling the story of Daniel in the lion's den; and truly she, too, has the Daniel heart and courage. Many a time have I met her, with her hands full of flowers, going on a mission of love to the lost girls of palace and den. She has wrought more for humanity than I shall ever compass. Let me name her now, Mrs. M. H. Lake, state superintendent of social purity work for the W. C. T. U.—a mother, sister, friend of girls.

. . . . . .

Then arose a man bearing on his face and form the marks of sin.

"Four years ago I was an awful drunkard but Mrs. Carse persuaded me to sign the pledge, and for eight months I kept it, but at last fell out by the way, going down, down; but two years ago I gave myself wholly to Jesus, and I would like Mrs. Carse to read this paper, that she may know I am doing my best."

There was a shine in the eyes of Mrs. Carse, and something very like a tear on each cheek.

. . . . . .

At this point arose the old black man, who in rain or shine is always there.

Promptly at noon he walks in. If he has a good coat I never saw it, and I know of no one who ever thinks of either his coat or the color of his skin. His speech is a marvel of eloquence, and every word shows how he has walked and talked and studied with God.

. . . . . .

Down the aisle came another man, whose head was white with the snows of seventy winters.

His step lacked much of its former activity, and his left hand served for an ear trumpet. He said, "I declare, I feel as if I ought to help the women pay for this building, and I am going to do it. Why, this hall will be here for the salvation of souls when I am dead and gone."

A little later on the old man was upstairs signing a check for hundreds of dollars, and two people were proportionately happy.

GEORGIA'S ANTI-BARROOM BILL.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—As one who voted for and urged the indorsement of the Anti-Barroom bill at the state W. C. T. U. convention, and who declared then that there was nothing of the nature of a compromise in it, I desire to say a few words concerning the bill. In your editorial note August 22, you say "it is apparently far in advance of any plan yet presented short of total prohibition," and also that it "tends to prohibition rather than to regulation." I do not know just what you may mean by "total prohibition," but for my part I am perfectly satisfied with a law which totally prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, and that is precisely what the anti-barroom bill does. Personally I do not believe in alcohol as a medicine and no physician can prescribe it in my family, but I do not insist upon every one's accepting my views in this regard, and therefore I find no fault with a law which allows its sale for medicinal purposes or for chemical.

The bill is too long for publication but its main features can be briefly stated. They are as follows: In the first place the bill does not affect at all the eighty-seven counties of the state in which we already have prohibition by local option unless at some succeeding election these counties should go "wet," in which case they will immediately come under the provisions of the act. Second, no person can sell liquors except upon the petition of the majority of freeholders in the county to the grand jury. Such a dealer must be a person of good moral character and shall be ineligible to hold any office for which an election may be held during his tenure of appointment and for one year thereafter. He is forbidden to sell to minors or to any persons whom he has reason to suppose will use the liquor or sell it for beverage purposes. Of course liquor cannot be drank on the premises. The price of the liquor is to be such as to simply cover the expenses of the vender. For the enforcement of these provisions the vender is obliged to keep a record of his sales and to whom sold. These books and records are to be examined every three months by the ordinary or county commissioners and also by the grand jury at each term of the superior court. The vender gives bonds to the amount of five thousand dollars for his faithful compliance with the law. The place in which the business is conducted is to have but one entrance and exit, from the front, is to have no screens, no games in connection with it, can be open only from sunrise to sunset, and not at all on Sunday, Christmas or election day. It is to have a sign, "Public Liquor Store," and underneath the words, "No Liquors Sold for Beverage Purposes." The manufacture of liquors is restrained by similar provisions. Severe penalties are fixed to the violation of the law.

Now can THE UNION SIGNAL discover any feature of compromise in the above bill? The liquor dealers of Atlanta have failed to discover anything of the kind and are fighting it desperately. It was they who tried to frighten temperance people by calling it a "dispensary bill," and they have sent out circular letters to "the trade" throughout the nation saying that the temperance people of Georgia were never so united as now, and that unless help is sent, an anti-barroom bill will become a law, in which case their business will be destroyed.

There may be more or less difficulty in enforcing the bill. I have never heard of a prohibitory law yet that enforced itself, but the difficulty will be in electing men who are in sympathy with the law, and not sworn allies of the liquor traffic. If we women could vote we would settle that part of it, but we cannot, so, without doubt, in many places the liquor men will put in their own men and the law will be a dead letter. But even in that case it will be possible for temperance people to make it very uncomfortable for the violater of the law.

It is not strange that women who, as a class, have so little experience of law, should hesitate to endorse any bill presented to them, and at the W. C. T. U. state convention one good sister thought that the grand jury was a cunning device of the liquor men. She assured us that she knew all about grand juries and none of them were to be trusted. But somebody must be entrusted with the enforcement of the law, and grand juries, ordinaries, county commissioners, etc., are all within the control of temperance people as much as are the laws. If temperance people stand idly by and allow the liquor men to elect all the officers upon whom rests the enforcement of these laws, of course they will soon be dead letters, but if the temperance men of Georgia will, as they may, elect these officers themselves, then the Anti-Barroom bill will, if enacted, give us practical prohibition in Georgia.

"OUR VIEW OF THE MONEY QUESTION."

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—I have been much interested in your article under the above caption. Your advice to your readers to "do their own thinking" on this subject is very timely. It is one of the most important we have before us at the present time, particularly from a moral point of view.

There is a great deal of discussion as to the kind or money we should have. This, in my opinion, is not where our trouble lies. It is in the thing itself. Money I consider an evil per se. Of all the inventions of man which have been productive of both good and evil, none, I think, has been more far-reaching in its evil results than the use of money. It is the instrument by which all the inequalities of wealth have been brought about—the drag-net that men have used to draw to themselves the labors of others, often without their knowledge or consent.

Owing to its susceptibility to manipulation, it has caused financial panics that have brought untold miseries upon the human race. It is the open gateway to all man's desires, thus creating a mad ambition for its possession which does not attach to any other kind of property, if it can be called property at all, as it has very little, if any, of the attributes of property. Whether it takes the form of gold, silver or paper, it is only an evidence of debt, and is worthless unless it is redeemed in labor, or labor's products. The government is trying to keep its issues on a parity by redeeming them all in gold. It has undertaken a task that with all its power it cannot fulfill for the simple reason there is not gold enough in the country, or perhaps the world, to accomplish the object. It has succeeded in doing so for a year only by placing the people under a tax of one hundred and fifty millions of dollars, but I do not imagine they will consent to this process indefinitely.

Specie payments are a sham and a fraud. I have lived to be near three score and ten—the allotted life of man—have passed through innumerable financial panics, and have never seen the time when the test was made that the government, the banks or individuals could meet their obligation in specie; that is, when called upon to do it all at once. In the nature of things it is impossible; they have not the material to do it with.

If we must have money, the simple greenback without any promise to pay, but merely used as a medium of exchange between the people and the government, would answer every purpose as it has for the last thirty years. This would be honest money, because it would be that which it was represented to be; any other kind is dishonest money.

The greed for, and the power of money are causing all our financial troubles, and unless checked, will, in the opinion of all thoughtful men, end in the destruction of our government. This, in the opinion of many, is what the privileged classes are working for. They prefer the rights of property to the rights of man, and wish a strong military government to uphold them in their present position. The apostle Paul has said, "The love of money is the root of all evil." Let us then do away with it as we would with alcohol. When this is done there will be very few distilleries, breweries or saloons, for these liquor-sellers are not in the business for the love of it; on the contrary I believe the majority of them detest it.

AN EXPLANATION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Upon my return from New York I picked up THE UNION SIGNAL of August 15, and read on the first page an editorial evidently based on a garbled account of the proceedings of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America convention held in New York, August 7–10, one which I am sure no one would more gladly correct than the editor when she knows the facts.

The resolution referred to concerning the beer brewed by the Benedictine monks at Latrobe, Pa., and which was presented by the Pittsburg union, was so indefinite that from the reading of it one would infer that all religious orders and clergymen were engaged in the brewing business. No just or sensible person could allow it to pass in that form. The convention asked those who presented the resolution to specify the particular religious order or clergymen so engaged. This they refused to do, as formal petition for its settlement had already been presented to the Most Rev. Monsignor Satolli. Therefore, it being in his hands, the convention decided not to anticipate his action in the matter. I beg leave to assure THE UNION SIGNAL that there was no question of church domination, as the Roman Catholic church through the diocese of the third plenary council of Baltimore gave to the C. T. A. U. of A. the keynote of condemnation for all engaged in the liquor traffic.

THE HIGHWAYMEN OF THE RAILWAY, AND A FEW RELATED REMARKS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—

There seems to be a peculiar aptness in the intimation of W. A. Pinkerton, of the noted detective agency, as quoted in the Ledger from the Pittsburg Chronicle, that the progressive holder-up of trains, being on the advance eastwardly from the Rocky Mountain region and the plains, may soon be aggressively seen in the neighborhood of New York city. It is also stated as being the opinion of this forecaster that "the inadequacy of the laws punishing train robbery was responsible for the large increase in this sort of crime." Nevertheless, in his contribution to the North American Review some eighteen months ago, entitled "Highwaymen of the Railway," the same witness gave his opinion that "the recent epidemic of train robberies is largely due, in my opinion, to the reading of yellow-covered novels."

Well, it was a booklet of this vividly realistic and uncanny educational class, "The Belfry Murders," that was found on the person of the colored lad Robinson, whose crime of burglary and murderous assault startled the Philadelphia community early in the present week. Very much in evidence was the like vice-breeding pabulum, the "penny dreadfuls" of our British cousins, when the personal effects of the boys who murdered their mother, a half month ago, over in England, came to be looked into.

By far the larger part of this dangerously-spiced reading matter for the young of America is manufactured in New York, and thence broadcasted over the whole country. If, therefore, some of those "knights of the rail" should make a successful demonstration of their enterprise and effrontery by holding up a suburban New York train, relieving its contingent of merchants, mill owners, bankers, brokers and multi-millionaires of their well-filled wallets and valuable timepieces, dropping, by way of grim exchange, into their laps the latest dime novel imprint of the heroic exploits of the James Boys or the Dalton gang, hot from a Gotham press, it might operate as a pointed, though, withal, rude reminder of the truth that, for the sowing of the wind there had come the reaping of the whirlwind. The agitation for and the accomplishment of better-based civic governments should enlarge the definition of hero and patriot. The devotee of the dime novel gets a reversed image of such characters from the reading matter that infatuates him.

The foregoing was communicated by the writer of this to the Public Ledger of Philadelphia. A day or two after its appearance in print, a cablegram in our daily papers from London informed the public that the two juvenile matricides alluded to in the above had been found guilty of murder by a coroner's jury, who likewise appended to their finding the sensible recommendation "that the sale of shocking and inflammatory literature be stopped, on the ground that it is answerable for many crimes."

The president of the National W. C. T. U. has, I notice, been arraigned for not sufficiently condemning (as alleged) the lynching enormities of the South. Her condemnation of the overt acts, I infer, is not circumscribed by the accident of locality. She is more earnestly apprehensive, it may be, concerning the causes which lead up to the crimes. Every year, and many times a year, has she spoken against impurity, against corrupting literature, debasing pictures and dramatic exhibitions, not forgetting also to point the accusative finger at those sensuous styles of fashionable dressing which have operated to lead so many astray.

Now it is in the northern cities, notably in New York, as stated in the article contributed to the Ledger, that the supplies of printed poison for the whole country are manufactured. Some people may contend that those vicious sheets ought not to be charged with any appreciable agency in the terrible crimes, the reports of which have of late years so often come to us from remote localities in the South. But listen to this testimony of a colporteur of the American Tract Society, which I happened to note only this morning. Writing of work among the colored people in lower tide water Virginia, he says: "Though money is so scarce among the poor that it is difficult to sell a good book, the young people along the railroad lines succeed in getting cheap, sensational literature. They do much dime-novel reading and are fond of detective stories. I have talked with many of them who have been reading this sort of matter so long that they seem to have no desire for other."

Many times have I read just such reports as that, which indeed might be truthfully extended to cover all the country where railway lines and mail wagons penetrate. From Florida we have had not a few cases of felonious assaults, with lynchings following. Yet from that land of "the fountain of youth," I remember to have had a letter two winters ago, in which the writer expressed his surprise and dismay at seeing so much sensational, crime-inciting reading-matter at the small towns and villages of the interior. The great crime of our fratricidal war grew out of a social institution in the support of which many northern shippers, manufacturers and traffickers were something more than "silent partners." When the story of the lynchings comes to be written in full, and inquiry be made into the genesis of the continued epidemics of vile assaults (whether South or North) the guilty hand of the unscrupulous publisher and purveyor of printed poison in New York, Chicago, etc., may be in a measure apparent.

IMPRESSIONS OF THE SOCIAL ECONOMICS SCHOOL.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Profoundly impressive were the closing hours of the school of social economics lately held at the Chicago Commons Settlement. Such thinkers as Dr. Josiah Strong, Prof. Geo. D. Herron, Prof. Graham Taylor, Mr. R. A. Woods, Jane Addams, Helen Campbell, Mrs. Stetson and many others of likemindedness, made a company that faced the facts of the present social and religious outlook with grave and brave thought and earnest prayer.

The closing devotional hour cannot but be remembered ever by those present. The thought presented by the reading of the Christ's baptism by John into all the good, past and present, so that not one quaking reed should be broken—nor any smoking flax of goodness be destroyed—but that "to watch," "to hear," "to see" always the good—was the loving linking process that bound all together into one spiritual whole, a building of God not made by hands.

This great comforting thought sent all away into lonely separate paths of work with a feeling of eternal companionship with one another in Christ. Surely it was with "one accord" the full attendance met, coming into this "people's place" where the odors and noises of "the masses" were close upon us.

It surely means something when great men and women really love and know, and put into practice the "new obeisance in spirit," and "that stoop of the soul which in bending, upraises it too." It means something when such as these live and thrive on what Miss Addams would call the "romance of ethics."

After ten days' attendance upon burning words that revealed hard facts concerning the real problems of "applied Christianity," self-denial seemed a privilege, for there is the whole world to be in outside of self.

"Abraham's Offering of Isaac" was the opening lecture August 22, by Professor Herron. The thought was that the great father of our faith must needs be brought into unity with the great purpose of God. The truly sacrificial love must be made flesh, redemptive of flesh. Other pagan sacrifice had meant propitiation; buying up the favors of the gods. This experience was meant to reveal the power of sacrifice in a totally new aspect. The losing of His son was really to find Him. To lose one's life is to find it. In sacrifice lies the power so to love that one can lay his love down, and thereby take it up again. It is the redemptive energy in the world so to love that one can lay love low. Illustrated by a weak parent, who loved so little she could not endure to hurt her child's rheumatic joints by bending them each day according to the physician's prescription, but allowed them to stiffen. So society stiffens, and character hardens, for lack of redemptive, sacrificial love, which will pluck out the eye that offends and lay the knife at the roots of things in order to cut away all that binds.

If Abraham so loved his son that he could lay down his life, he then so loved him that he could afford to leave him, and be trusted with the fatherhood of the great covenant with God which Isaac himself represented.

It all means if we love anything well enough to give it up we find it only is, then, that we are great enough to have it and are greater than our love for it. To be like God we must be great enough to exist whole in ourselves in order to be the begetter, the genesis, the father of and the progenitor of that which we desire. Each individual is a social creative function. Abraham had to realize his son belonged to a social scheme. All his own human affections were just so much social energy. We cannot live unto ourselves or our children or our property; each is a part of a marvelous whole.

Dr. Strong (ever as strong as his name indicates) occupied the hour each day from 11 to 12, as did Professor Herron, the hour from 10 to 11. Lunch was served in the homelike dining-room of the spacious "Commons" for twenty-five cents, thus affording a delightful social time, as one could wander also from room to room and broad piazza and find friends and books and periodicals plentiful in parlor, library rooms and in girls' club room.

The hour from 2 to 3 was usually given to the "Quiz." Mr. Howard, the labor union man, was the target for questions for two days. Miss Addams, Professor Herron, Mr. Odell, secretary of the Industrial Christian Union, a scheme for product-sharing villages, bravely held the fort other days.

These were earnest and even serious hours, as some of the most appalling needs and proposed remedies were rapidly kaleidoscoped before our eyes. The saloon ever figured as the main form of the beast in the pictures.

The hour from 3 to 4 was filled in either by Miss Addams' marvelous words of sacrificial philosophy or by Mr Woods, of Boston, whose essays were always elegant and suggestive. I heard only one of these, "Culture and Social Democracy," which was well worth a journey. Perhaps one or two sentences from notebook will give an idea of its scope:

"Culture is not a thing of luxury but a broad unfoldment of all the members of a community.

"Industrial aristocracy is bad enough. Culture aristocracy is not only bad but absurd and suicidal; it cuts off its life when it 'shuts itself up and is exclusive.'

"A systematic scheme for adult education is a new type and permanent," which latter thought was often brought out during the school. Many times it was said, "What better scheme for the saving of society can we form than that which deals with the present generation?" Each generation foolishly expects the next one to carry out its schemes twenty years hence. Children alone are not the material to work upon; the mothers and fathers must be what they desire their children to be.

Dr. Strong's last lecture upon the converging lines of Christian civilization towards the great "Central Head, Christ Jesus," was perhaps the crowning lecture of the convention.

Professor Herron led in the closing devotional hour of the "school," to which Prof. Graham Taylor gave constant and able attention throughout. Through him it was all accomplished.

Chicago, Ill. MARY H. HULL, Armour Institute.

DEAR FRIENDS:—A "Special Difficulty" has been sent to this column which has so recalled certain experiences of my own and others that I think it may be helpful just at this time if I make the question a text for a talk. My correspondent says: "When an officer of a local W. C. T. U. has in charge the printing of the state minutes, and is also editor of the state paper, is she privileged to count the entire number of pages printed in each and report them as literature distributed by the local superintendent of literature? My view is that only the copies of the minutes and state paper taken by the union could be so counted."

---

I was "once on a time" a literature superintendent myself, and being placed so that I could obtain an almost endless amount of good printed matter, plunged into the work with much zeal. At the end of the first month I was called on for a report before the union. It had not occurred to me to keep a record of any kind, but I seized the privilege of five minutes on the floor—ours was a large and busy union—to deliver a "preachment" on the work I saw the union might do in this department, which for some time had been lagging.

I was talking later with a member of the union regarding the work and my lack of report, when some one said, "You have so much literature it will keep you busy counting the number of pages you distribute."

"Counting the pages!" I echoed. "Much or little literature I shall not count pages. I will rather descant on the kind of literature, where it goes, how it goes and what it may or does accomplish."

---

Since then I have heard many reports at many gatherings—not all W. C. T. U. by any means, and I have in common with other workers cried out again and again, "If people only would make helpful reports!" Figures have their place but it never did me individually much good to know that another union had sent out one, two, six, ten thousand pages of literature. Of course I was glad that so much good seed had been sown, but being a far from perfect gardener myself I wanted to know how the sower worked.

---

Our various conferences and conventions are magnificent opportunities for exchange of plans and presentation of perplexities, and if when we sit down to narrate a month's or a year's endeavor, we could tell what needs had been revealed, what helps to the good work had grown out of certain efforts, what conditions had most hindered progress, in what way questions of doubt as to how to proceed had been answered, those listening would have something more usable—if not so condensed and awe-inspiring—than numerical facts.

---

At least, this has proved true in my own case, if you will again pardon personality. At the monthly meetings, my "report" was a statement of possibilities, an outline of plans to fit needs. I saved figures—for I used them sometimes—for an item of rejoicing or an instrument of awakening to better work. Thus: "Last month I wrote to each member of the union a special offer. There are fifty of you. I have had three answers." Statistics told that time, for the letters poured in later. Or, "If we will each do thus and so (and I am sure we can) we can reach seven hundred and fifty people outside of the union in one month. Last month, by our own acknowledging, we only reached in this way about one hundred."

---

I heard the chairman of a department of work in a young people's church society make an annual report thus: Calls made, two hundred; baskets of food distributed, so many, garments, such a number, so many loads of wood and coal furnished free. Those who had done better did some work in comparative thought and those who had done less were properly discouraged. So far so good. But we all wanted more. Why were the calls made? What was the cause of the hunger? Will the same ones go hungry next winter? If not, why not? How was the department helping to better conditions? What had it learned of the moral and social needs during the work?

---

Do not misunderstand me. Statistics tell a tale no other medium of expression can. But let them be but the bone about which gathers a "square meal" for thought. If we have written a thousand letters in a year, what was the need, what the outcome? Must the same letters be written over again next year, or has the work climbed a notch higher?

---

But our sister's question is unanswered. I think the number of copies taken by the union should be recorded and in such a way that next year the number will be doubled or quadrupled!

Yours for the best, even in "dry" reports!

A CHILD'S MISTAKE.

Said a dear little girl, and I heard her myself,
As she reached for a book on the very top shelf,
"How I wish I might live like the birds and the flowers
With nothing to do through the beautiful hours;
Or else like the sun, that has only to shine,
Or dance with the shadows that hide in the vine!
But, no! I must study from morning till night;
Long sums I must add; there are copies to write;
To school I must go, and for, oh, such a time!
It's just like a terrible mountain to climb!
Dear! Dear!" and the child, with a pitiful frown
And a heart-piercing cry, to her grammar sat down.
Then flashed a fair sunbeam full into her face,
As if challenging frowns in so lovely a place.
"Why, darling," it laughed, all a-quiver with glee,
"If you want to see work, you must travel with me;
I never am idle the swift rolling day,
But I go to my tasks in the spirit of play;
And wherever I'm ordered there straightway I fly.
Cheer up, little maid!" said the voice from the sky.
There was heard a quick flurry of wings overhead
From an army of birds; and, as southward they sped,
Came clear as a bugle, the leader-bird's song:
"You are wrong, little lady! I'm sorry you're wrong!
And I can't stop to tell you!" he sang as he flew,
"But no one is happy with nothing to do!"
And the flowers! A rose peeping in at the pane,
Breathed gently this message: "In sunlight and rain,
We children of earth, dear to all who behold,
Wear meekly our splendors of crimson or gold.
And, born in the purple, we royally spend
Our fragrance in blessing, until our lives end.
We seem to be idle, I grant, but you know
There's never a flower that has not to grow;
And growing, dear child, means aspiring, see,
As I, when I whisper so softly to thee."
She picked up the book; it had dropped from her hand;
"At least," said our pet, "I can this understand
God gives all His creatures some duty each day,
And mine is, perhaps, just to trust and obey.
I'll not think of the mountain before me to climb,
But cheerfully mount it, one step at a time."

HER BROTHER'S KEEPER.

BY MRS. MATTIE MITCHELL.

Eva and Mabel Lawrence were paying Uncle Ben and Aunt Margaret a first visit.

The two sisters were city bred, and found a whole succession of novelties in the little town of Millersville, with its fine scenery, pleasant drives and boating on the lake. These, with the companionship of their two cousins of the same age, Lottie and May Saunders, promised a most enjoyable outing.

"Uncle Ben," asked Eva, the older sister, as they were taking their first drive, "what are those queer looking vines in the fields?"

"Hops, my dear. The finest hop yards in the state."

"What lots of bread they will make," said little Mabel.

"I am afraid it will be beer instead of bread, girlie."

"Are they really made into beer?"

"Oh, yes, almost entirely. The United States would be obliged to import hops if it were not for the hop yards in and about this county. There are very few localities where they can be successfully grown."

"Are they profitable?"

"Yes, very. A man who raises a few acres of hops has as good an income as the farmer who cultivates a hundred acres of grain."

"Does his outlay equal the farmer's?"

"Oh, no. To be sure, hop lands are high priced, and there is the hop house to build and keep in repair, but a few hundred dollars will buy land sufficient to yield a comfortable income, while the same amount invested in average farm land would buy more acres, but not acres enough to begin to yield the same returns. Then, too, one man can care for the hopyard alone till they are ready to tie in the spring, and through the summer afterwards till picking comes on, when a few weeks' help finishes the whole work for the season. Many farmers employ one or more men the greater part of the year, and the expense of keeping up a large farm in all its details is very great. If I had my life to live over again," said Uncle Ben, touching the horse lightly with the whip as he spoke, "I would put my money into hops, every cent of it."

"When will the hops be ready for harvest?"

"The early kind are nearly ripe. Oh, in a week or so hop picking will be here. Everyone in Millersville goes hop picking, our girls with the rest. A fine chance to earn pin money."

"Then we can go if Lottie and May do? How much could we earn?"

"The usual price is fifty cents a box where board is not furnished."

"How large is a box?"

"Seven bushels."

"Oh," said earnest Mabel, who had been a listener to the conversation, "it would take me a week to pick one box."

"They are so light that they fill up rapidly. Why, little girl, you could easily pick two boxes a day, and Eva would fill three. Lottie and May averaged three all last season, and I have picked four and five."

"Girls," said Eva to her cousins that night as they settled down for a little chat, "isn't it splendid to live in a hop country? Uncle Ben has told us all about it—the picking. Now I can earn the money for my drawing lessons. You know mamma has been sick and there have been so many expenses that papa thought he could not afford lessons just now. How surprised he will be—and to think of earning it myself! What will you do with your money, Mabel? Uncle Ben thinks you can earn at least ten dollars."

"How lovely to use it for Christmas!" said Mabel, with glowing eyes.

"You see Mabel is the charitable genius of the family; she would never dream of spending it for herself," said Eva, laughing with pleasure.

The next morning Mabel suddenly called Lottie to the window by exclaiming, "Do look at those rough men; who are they?"

Lottie laughed. "Hop picking tramps trying to find work."

"Tramps!" with an intonation of mingled surprise and disgust. "Would we have to work with them?" asked Mabel; "I'm afraid of tramps."

"No, child, we will all be together with the village people in some of the small fields near by. Only the owners of large hop yards ever employ such men. They are obliged to take what they can get and send to the cities for help. Some of them are not very nice—the girls who come from the cities."

"The boys, too," broke in Uncle Ben, just entering the room. "Many of them will leave every dollar they earn at the saloon down street. They are a bad lot."

Mabel looked very serious. She was beginning to think hops were not so desirable after all.

That evening the family were shocked to hear that a man had been killed at their own station.

"A 'city tough' picking for the Browns; you know they have early hops," said neighbor Dean, who had called to report the news. "He came down to the hotel this afternoon and got so drunk he could hardly walk, tried to steal a ride on a passing freight train, slipped, fell, and the wheels severed his head from his body."

"How dreadful!"

"Terrible!"

"Poor boy; had he any relatives?"

"One brother, a nice young man, they say, and he takes his death very hard."

The neighbor went out, and presently conversation was resumed and the unfortunate affair seemed to be forgotten. By and by it was noticed that Mabel was unusually quiet, saying hardly a word. May asked if she were homesick. Eva thought she must be tired and had better go to her room. The young girl said good-night and went upstairs—not to sleep, however, but to think this hop question all out.

"If it had been my brother Harry," she whispered, "oh, it might have been he, for he drinks," and she sobbed as if her heart would break.

The knowledge of her brother's drinking had come quite by accident. Her parents were unconscious of his danger. Eva did not dream of it, and he had made Mabel promise not to reveal the fact, pleading his mother's sickness and pledging better things for the future. It was a heavy burden for such a childish heart to bear.

"If it is wrong to sell liquor," she began, "it is wrong to make it. Uncle said hops would be made into beer, so I believe it must be wrong to raise hops. They couldn't make hops into beer if they were not picked, no matter how many were raised. "Yes"—after a pause—"it is wrong to pick hops, just as wrong as if I hired myself to the man in the saloon, either way would be helping get people drunk. So if I help hops I hinder Harry."

It was all clear now. She knelt by the bedside and whispered, "Dear God, help a weak girl to keep her brother from sin." An hour later Eva found her in peaceful, happy slumber.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Last Tuesday morning about one hundred and seventy-five thousand scholars were given seats in Chicago schools in buildings over which floated the stars and stripes. That meant that the children were under the protection of their country's flag, and that they in their turn were to learn how best to serve that country and sustain its flag among civilized nations. How, do you think? By becoming good, educated citizens, you say, devoted to things of truth and right. These were only a small portion of the thousands of children who entered the school-rooms of our nation this fall but they do not everywhere float our American flag above the buildings, do they? How is it with yours?

In Switzerland this summer, way up in the beautiful Grindelwald valley, I saw a school-house, such a nice one. It stood right next a church. The school had some lettering in German, Shall I tell you what it was translated?

"School-house and church together stand;
They are two fingers on God's great hand
With which He upward lifts the earth
Turning mankind to holier worth."

Isn't that a helpful thought for the little Swiss boys and girls to read every day as they go in the door of their school? I wish our Illinois schools and every other had some such suggestion. For in addition to learning how to serve one's country and one's self, every earnest scholar is also learning to serve God. All true education is part of His preparation for us.

I think our Cozy Cornerers have been very modest about writing what they have done for temperance this summer. I know that many more than have responded to my request for letters, have done something worth telling. I have greatly enjoyed reading the accounts that have come and thank the little writers (and the one big one!) very much. Jennie Louisa Bull, of Ocala, Fla., eleven years old, has earned the game, and I am sure that you will think her a worthy Cozy Cornerer as you read her letter below.

Affectionately,

Aunt Jane

NEPHEWS AND NIECES.

WHAT I HAVE DONE FOR TEMPERANCE THIS SUMMER.

One day I saw that Aunt Jane wanted us to write an account of what we have done for temperance this summer, so I thought I would write. Last spring I was elected president of the Junior L. T. L. We meet every Monday afternoon, and all through the long, hot summer the treasurer (whose mother is state superintendent of L. T. L. work) and myself have never missed a meeting, and the leader said that if it had not been for our faithful attendance the Legion would have gone down. I have gotten five new members, and I have recited temperance recitations twice for the Senior Legion. Once I was dressed in rags as a drunkard's child, as that was the name of my piece. And I helped collect flowers for Flower Mission Day. And I have also filled a Wheel for the Temple. I am eleven years old, and I always expect to do all I can for temperance.

VOYAGING.

BY HANNA A. FOSTER.

An outbound bark is on the sea,
Swift speeding day by day;
And wheresoe'er the harbor be
It is not far away.

Oh, Master, hold her to her course!
The deep is wild and wide,
Thy bark must brave the tempest's force,
The maddened waves outride.

For know, she bears most precious store,
Beyond all count of cost,
The soul's belongings evermore!
Beware, lest aught be lost.

Steer straight, O Soul! be true and strong,
The port is safe and fair,
The upper lights to thee belong—
Faith's fixèd star is there.

It waits thee somewhere, out of sight,
That isle of sweet surprise,
Upon whose coastline of delight
No chilling shadow lies.

Sail on and on; though clouds to-day
Its sunny heights obscure,
Yet shalt thou make the quiet bay
Where anchorage is sure.

Thy day shall have a golden west,
Thy toil a glad surcease;
God's blessed years are full of rest,
The "Land ahead" is peace.

IF YOU CANNOT HAVE---GIVE.

BY SUSIE FAIRFIELD LAIRD.

"Mother, we cannot afford to take a vacation, but what do you think of our affording to give a vacation?" Sweet faced Mrs. Irwin looked up into her mother's face and said, as they sat in their cozy sitting room one afternoon early in June.

"Why, dear, what do you mean?"

"I mean, mother, that Fred's business will not warrant our usual summer outing. And now that I have gotten over the disappointment of it, my brain has been very busy with some other thoughts that seem to be creeping in to take the place of the disappointed ones. I feel there may be some worthy young woman, or even two young women, who would be delighted to come to our home for a few days or a week."

Mr. and Mrs. Irwin had a pleasant home twelve miles out from Chicago. Mrs. Irwin was one of the busy women of this suburb, active in church and society work. For the past year she had done her own housework, as the financial depression had sadly affected Mr. Irwin's income, and she felt more than ever the need of the summer rest.

But when her husband told her that they would have to forego that pleasure her active mind was not long depressed.

"I think," she said to her mother, "I will go and see Mr. Pratt; he may know of some one, or be able to tell me to whom I shall go to find just the young women to whom I may give this pleasure."

Mr. Pratt was the rector of the little vine-clad church to which most of the worthy residents of this little suburb wended their way every Sabbath morning, and devoutly turning their faces to the east fervently said, "Incline our hearts to keep this land."

Mrs. Irwin's call upon Mr. Pratt resulted in her learning that the last consultation he had with the Bishop was upon this very subject—the crying need of refined homes being opened to the poor working girls of the city, where they might go as guests and be allowed to come in touch with the peace, quiet and healthfulness of country life, and save the weekly pittance that was so necessary to their needs.

Mrs. Irwin's heart was light and consequently her feet also, as she went home with a promise from Mr. Pratt that he would see she had the desired guests the second week in July.

. . . . . .

Through the zeal of Mr. Pratt the Bishop and another rector, Mrs. Irwin's guests had been secured,—two west side factory girls. She had sent them a polite little note, their response had come, and she had called at the factory to see them after the manner of the true woman meeting sister souls. No royal guests could have greater preparations made for their arrival.

To-day is a busy day, for to-morrow they come, and Mrs. Irwin is busy with light bread, sweet rolls and some dainty sponge cakes, for these are truly guests and not pensioners upon her bounty at arm's length, and she is using a little forethought and management.

The day has arrived; the spare chamber has been thrown open, that the glorious sunlight and air may fill it full. There are jars of flowers on dresser and table from the woods near by. The hammocks are hung in the shadiest place, the table is spread in the daintiest way.

The guests are come, they feel the large heart, the warm hospitality, and their timidity and embarrassment are flown, taken on the wings of this country air.

Mrs. Irwin reads to them the "Princess" as they swing lazily in their hammocks, and that they may the more appreciate the worth of true men, she reads to them "Adam Bede." She does not know what freshness of thought and newness of life she brings into the hearts of these two girls, who are pent up in meager homes, whose lives are a round of toil.

After five days of this grand hospitality, they return to their homes and work, better and happier that one woman has given them of herself, her home and her heart, and Mrs. Irwin says to her friends, "It's the happiest vacation I ever spent."

THE TRAINING SCHOOL IDEA AND OUR TEMPERANCE LEADERS.

BY LUCY RIDER MEYER.

"Bible and Missionary Training School? Well, now, I'll just give you the reasons why such an institution would never succeed." And the speaker waxed confidential. "In the first place there are not enough women in the whole United States who would want to study the things you propose to teach to make a respectable school. And even if there were they don't need any special training. Our girls are all well educated in the Bible. They have all been in the Sunday-school." And then as a clincher: "Haven't your missionary girls succeeded? What need is there of the special training you talk about?"

"But the young men who are sent to any missionary field, or for that matter, those who enter religious work at home, are given special training. I admit that the work of men in the missionary field is different from that of women—mind, that doesn't imply that it is inferior—but how is it that you gentlemen are such sticklers that they should have special preparation, while you think it is superfluous for their sisters? You are willing to send a woman out with a seminary education and a letter of recommendation from her pastor; but a young man must have a full college education and three or four years at the theological seminary besides: Your opinion of woman's natural abilities must be very high!"

"Well, but they certainly have succeeded wonderfully."

"Yes, they have. But if they have done so well without special training, what will they do with it?"

The above is a fair sample of conversations many that took place during the long summer of 1885, ten years ago. It was just before the opening of the Chicago Training school for City, Home and Foreign Missions. It used to be somewhat difficult those days for those defending the idea. They had to deal largely in theory and prophecy. It is much easier now to point to history as the vindication of the plan.

"Women won't come?" During these ten years there has been an average attendance of sixty-seven at the Chicago Training School. Out of its halls have gone more than four hundred women to home and foreign mission fields, W. C. T. U. and rescue work; while hundreds more have left us to resume their places in private homes, better workers in their own home churches, better Sunday-school teachers, better daughters and wives and mothers, because of their year or two of special Bible study. Broader women, too, they have all become, because of the wide outlook over the great field of the world's needs they gained while in a center of Christian activity in this next greatest city in the land.

But more than this, the school has already wrought a revolution concerning the need of special training for religious workers; and it is slowly bringing about a greater appreciation of the value of the Bible and related studies, as to their "finishing" value in a Christian woman's education. Better a thousand times than a year at Madame's superficial boarding school, with its smattering of French and its dabbling in art, is a year of earnest Bible study with the glimpses of life "all around," that one gains in a place like this.

As an indication of the changed state of public opinion on the subject, the question that comes to us now is not, What is the need of the school? but, What do you do at the school? Let me try in fewest possible words to answer the question.

First of all, we study the Bible. We have the best teachers of the Bible in the country to lead in this study; we give it the best time in the day, and it is the very center and pith of our course. It does not take our whole time, however, the rest being given, electively, to sacred history, elementary medicine, methods of religious work among all classes, and especially practical methods of city mission work. In this latter department we take up kindergartening and kitchen gardening (in which we can do a great deal by the dozens of classes we have all over the city), normal cooking, Sunday-school teachers' meetings, etc., etc. We give elocution and physical culture, but only as a means to an end—the better preparation for religious work. We give strong course in music, including voice culture, sight reading and instrumental lessons. We believe there are great undeveloped possibilities of woman's usefulness in music for religious work. And last of all there is a good strong course in temperance methods conducted by the ladies from the National headquarters.

With this course in theory goes right along, a course in practical application. The students go out two or three times a week into the mission fields offered in such sad abundance in any great city, and actually do mission work. They visit from house to house, they teach kitchen garden classes, etc., they lead gospel meetings, as well as all being busy in the mission Sunday-schools.

We make this course widely available by putting the expenses down to the lowest possible minimum. We own our buildings—do not have rent to pay—and the whole teaching force, without exception, is absolutely without charge, so there is no tuition for the student to pay. She does pay one hundred dollars for board, if she lives in the building, and with the exceedingly careful management of a deaconess matron and the help of a little of the time of each student at the housework, the amount nearly covers the expenditure. Moreover, there are a few scholarships. No endowments yet, though that good thing must be coming soon, but a few interested friends and societies are paying a hundred dollars year by year, so it is hoped no really worthy girl, especially those who are planning to devote their lives to any form of missionary work, but that may find the way open to get here the training she needs.

Are W. C. T. U. folks interested in this movement? They well may be. What better could there be for training their workers? What more fertile spot in which to teach temperance methods?

Miss Willard and Lady Henry Somerset have sent from Eastnor Castle a contribution to the large new building just going up for the school—in which one hundred and eighty students can be cared for, by the way—with the kindest expressions of their deep interest. We are going to show our appreciation of this gift by making it the nucleus of a fund for the furnishing of two large sunshiny rooms. One room, if God add His blessing and His children their contributions, shall bear the inscription, "Willard Room," and the other "Somerset Room." And then, when they are furnished, as we know the W. C. T. U. of the land will furnish them—it will cost only one hundred dollars each—we will ask our two queens of the cause in America and England to send us their pictures to hang on the walls year after year and add their silent testimony as to the power of lives wholly given up to God.

Chicago, Ill.

REV. JOHN WESLEY gave this burning testimony against the crime of liquor selling:

"Those who sell this poison murder men by wholesale. Neither does their eye pity nor spare. They drive them to hell like sheep. And what is their gain? Is it not the blood of these men? Who, then, would envy their large estates and sumptuous palaces? A curse is in the midst of them; the curse of God cleaves to the stones, the timber, the furniture of them! The curse of God is in their gardens, their walls, their groves; a fire that burns to the nethermost hell! Blood, blood is there; the foundation, the floor, the walls, the roof are stained with blood. And canst thou hope, O thou man of blood, though thou art 'clothed in scarlet and fine linen, and farest sumptuously every day'—canst thou hope to deliver down thy fields of blood to the third generation? Not so; for there is a God in heaven; therefore, thy name shall soon be rooted out. Like as those whom thou hast destroyed, body and soul, thy 'memorial shall perish with thee.'"

Does any one suppose Mr. Wesley could have been induced to vote for political parties which stood for making the crime of liquor selling lawful?—Selected.

THERE is evil enough in man, God knows! But it is not the mission of every young man and woman to detail and report it all. Keep the atmosphere as pure as possible and fragrant with gentleness and charity.—Dr. John Hall.

THE BUSINESS OUTLOOK.

How soon can we positively announce rates to the Baltimore Convention? is the thought uppermost in our mind this week as we write "The Business Outlook." Delegates are eager to know, plans must mature, and every move from now on must be in the interests of the National Convention to be held in Baltimore from October 18–23.

The committee on transportation had hoped, yea, had dared to believe, that this year they might secure the much to be desired concession of one fare for the round trip, not upon the ground of numbers, but of the increasing importance and influence of these yearly conventions. Correspondence, personal interviews have availed naught; the maximum of attendance is the only point of consideration; the fiat of the secretary of the Trunk Line Association, in whose jurisdiction the Convention is to be held, has gone forth, and the lowest possible rate is one and one-third fare upon the certificate plan.

What is the certificate plan? Plainly this: Full first-class fare going to Baltimore, one-third first-class limited fare returning, provided, certificates have been obtained from ticket agent from whom the ticket to Baltimore was purchased, and said certificate duly stamped and signed by him, and indorsed at the meeting in Baltimore by Caroline F. Grow, and viséed by special agent of the Railway Association at that point.

* * *

Dates upon which available? Owing to the meeting of the National Purity Association to be held the same week in Baltimore, the tickets will cover the dates from October 14–23, and may be purchased THREE DAYS (Sunday excepted) prior to October 14. Certificates will not be honored unless presented within THREE DAYS (Sunday excepted) after the adjournment of the meeting.

* * *

Certificates are not kept at all stations. In such a case the ticket agent can inform a delegate of the nearest important station where they can be obtained, a local ticket should be purchased to such station, and through ticket and certificate there obtained.

Certificates are not transferable, and return tickets secured upon certificates are not transferable.

Tickets are available for continuous fare only, and no refund of fare will be made on account of any person failing to obtain a certificate.

It would be well for delegates to give ticket agents such timely notice of their intentions that through tickets and certificates may be ready when required.

Those wishing to avail themselves of the concessions should be present at the offices for certificates and tickets at least thirty minutes before the departure of train. As members arrive their certificates should be deposited with me, so as to be ready for special agent upon his arrival.

The Trunk Line Association and Central Traffic Association have announced the above concessions and limitation. Other railroad associations have the matter under advisement.

A WORD TO LOCAL TREASURERS.

This is the time when the call of the annual Convention is heard in the land and it is safe to say that no white-ribboner is more sensibly aware of the fact than the W. C. T. U. treasurer, from the National down. The collection and forwarding of dues is just now a matter of first importance. The National treasurer is sending out reminders to state unions and state unions to locals, urging the necessity of prompt remittance.

We wish the local treasurer could realize more than she usually does how much depends upon her sagacity and faithfulness. The status of the local treasurer indicates with a considerable degree of accuracy the measure of its vitality, and as the local union is the unit or standard of value of the National, it follows that in promoting the prosperity and even in perpetuating the existence of our great organization the local treasurer performs no insignificant part. For it falls to her lot not only to receive the dues of members and to forward the required quota to the state treasurer, but often to personally collect the same and to devise ways and means to do that collecting without losing the good will of any delinquent or apathetic member.

If any white-ribboner allowed herself a year ago to be elected treasurer because the position involved "very little work or responsibility," she will by this time—if she is a faithful officer—have discovered her mistake and will be putting forth every effort to coöperate with the state treasurer in gathering in a grand total of dues which shall represent the entire enrolled membership of the state.

The W. C. T. U. is "doing good according to a plan," and in order to carry out this plan money is needed. Every dollar, every dime, represents just so much power added to the machinery of our departments through the medium of which the cause of Christian temperance and home protection is being carried forward so surely and so rapidly.

Of course in the "model union" the treasurer's work is much simplified. All members pay their dues promptly, and the enthusiasm always being at high water-mark new names are constantly added to the roll of membership. But in the ordinary, everyday union the tide ebbs and flows, and dues remain unpaid — sometimes through thoughtlessness, sometimes through sheer inability to spare even this small sum from a mother's meager purse. If everybody would adopt some plan of systematic giving, how much easier it would be to give to the Lord's work, and therefore to give cheerfully!

In most unions the collection of the annual dues presents no small problem, and the fact that there has been no serious "falling off" during the "hard times" proves the deep-seated vitality of our organization. The wise, local treasurer, of course, will not leave this matter until the last few days before state convention. She will plan, perhaps, for a revival of W. C. T. U. interest about this time by public meetings or otherwise, which will not only put fresh life into old members and bring in new ones, but will stir up husbands and sons and have a good effect upon the "pocket-book nerve" generally.

But it is to those who have not been "forehanded" in this matter that we have a special message just now. Very little time remains before the books of the state treasurers must be closed and their reports sent to the National. In view of this fact we cannot emphasize too strongly the advisability of personal work by the local treasurer. Perhaps in a large city union it is not always possible for her to see personally every delinquent member, but whenever this can be done it will be found much more effective than the postal card or the more public appeal. A little friendly, face to face conversation is often potent for good, not only in collecting money but in reviving or intensifying a member's flagging interest. If many members are on the debtor list it is sometimes a good plan for all who belong to the local society to set about earning a dollar in some unique way for this special purpose. This method of replenishing the treasury has become quite popular of late with church and other societies, reports of the "wage earners" often furnishing an interesting evening's entertainment, at which more money is taken in. If the officers and active members only get their heads together some plan is sure to be evolved which will result in the immediate and cheerful payment of dues. We say to every treasurer whose union is "behind"—act promptly and tactfully.

And while speaking of W. C. T. U. revival work, we would call attention to our two approaching red-letter days, World's day, September 22, the birthday of our first round-the-world missionary, Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt, and Membership Crusade Day and Children's Harvest Home, September 28, the birthday of our World's and National president, Frances E. Willard. Let these two days, with the intervening ones, be made the occasion for special effort in bringing our work before the public. For this never fails—especially when children are pressed into service—to secure an accession of good-will and consequent moral and financial support for the cause.

"THE SISTERHOOD OF WOMEN."

If there were in our mind any smouldering suspicion of the mental inferiority of our sex or of its deficiency in the more sterling qualities of character, such an article as the one in the Saturday Review on "The Sisterhood of Woman," by "a woman of the day," would fan it to a flame. The chief characteristics of the article in question are illogical unfairness, injustice and utter obliviousness to facts. In these respects it fully equals anything we have ever read from the pen of the most extreme masculine woman despiser.

The "Sisterhood of Woman" is simply and easily disposed of by the statement that there is no such thing; a statement which the writer proceeds to prove by numerous unproved assertions and a happy method of disposing of disagreeable facts by theories evolved from her own inner consciousness. Instead of the fellowship which so generally obtains among men, says this "woman of the day," there is among women a "fundamental antagonism," "severing every living woman from the rest of her sex." She attributes this to "woman's incapacity for impersonal feeling or abstract emotion" and says that but for this antagonism woman's emancipation would have come long ago. Further, "this is why trades-unionism among women is still almost a farce," "why associations formed by women for their betterment and governed by them are so apt to become disabled through internal strife."

This careful and profound student of her sex also informs us that friendships between women "never become stable or sacred," that "even at fever heat, a woman never gives as much to another as she gives her lightest lover, and at any moment she is ready to sacrifice her friend at the behest of any man in whom she is momentarily interested. Women make and discard friends with equal facility. If they are seldom true to men, their fidelity to their own sex is far rarer."

Truly this "woman of the day" has sure need to shut herself up with her geometry, like Abraham Lincoln, until, like him, she "knows what a demonstration is." She would better, before she ever again attempt an expression upon any subject, put herself under the training of some careful scientist and learn what it is to be sure of her facts and what a dangerous thing it is to say "never" and "always" carelessly. Friendships between women "never stable or sacred"! We can give her, on application, hundreds of cases of lasting and self-sacrificing friendships between women. It is only the trifling school-girl who sacrifices her equally trifling friend (?) at the behest of the temporary masculine attraction. "If they are seldom true to men" as though it were a recognized fact! When all history is full of instances of the "beauty and strength of woman's devotion"; when the faithfulness of women to their degraded, criminal husbands is an established fact. Keepers of penitentiaries have more than once testified that while the occasional woman who enters those institutions is almost universally forsaken by her husband, very rarely is the husband who enters forsaken by his wife.

It may be, indeed, that a new Solomon has come to the judgment, that the general view of woman's faithfulness is all wrong; but in the face of the generally received belief to the contrary, one who attempts to controvert it should be much more lavish with her carefully established facts than with her unproved assertions.

Any reasonable person would naturally suppose that the lack of union among women in the past might very probably be accounted for by the fact that women, of necessity, because of their environment, have lived isolated and secluded lives. As society has been constructed, woman's sphere has been exclusively the home. Marriage was her ultimatum, the one goal of her existence. There was nothing that called for or, indeed, made possible, any general association of women. On the contrary, the association of women was too often that of mere rivalry, and inevitably, as Dickens puts it, "young women jostled one another in their race to the matrimonial altar." On the supposition that this state of affairs explained the lack of union among women, we should expect that with the broadening of woman's sphere there would be a greater tendency to union and a recognition of common interests joining women in a sisterhood precisely as was the case with the nobles when the crusades began to break up the feudal system. If this tendency failed to appear, then, but not till then, would the careful investigator of facts seek some other cause for the disunion among women, then it would be time to suppose an "essential disunion" a "lack of cohesive power" among women.

In fact, this tendency to union, to make common cause, does appear and in very marked degree. Great successful women's organizations are the features of the day, and the internal strife, which the writer assumes to be so great, is so notoriously less than in men's organizations that it is not strange she did not care to sign her name to such a statement. She is forced to admit that there are some signs of union, but with the unfairness which is the chief characteristic of the article, denies that it indicates any fellowship among women. Even the movement which, of all others, gives strongest proof of the love of women for their sisters, and which has reached such important proportions—the movement to reach down to and save the outcasts of their sex—she disposes of in this fashion: "To my mind it has no such significance (the inauguration of an era of feminine fellowship) but is simply a form of hysteria based upon a morbid appetite for coquetting with sin, so characteristic of the modern woman." Evidently "to her mind" nothing could possibly have any significance contradictory of her theory. It is easy enough to prove any hypothesis when one is at liberty to go to her imagination for her facts, ignore even those which he who runs must see, and explain others according to any sort of unproved hypothesis she pleases to assume. It is pitiful in the extreme that any woman would for any consideration whatever utter such false and libelous slanders against her sex. While she has done nothing to prove her accusations against her sisters, she has established beyond a peradventure her own "fundamental antagonism" to all other women.

OUR NATIONAL CONVENTION.

Official Call.

In deference to a time-honored custom, the General Officers of the National W. C. T. U. herewith announce the fact already so well known, that the twenty-second annual Convention of the organization will be held in Music Hall, Baltimore, Md., October 18-23, 1895, and issue their call to the clans already gathering to come up in force to this Mecca of a year's hopes and Harvest Home of a year's toil.

The laws governing the personelle of a National Convention are known to the vast majority of our constituency. Nevertheless, for those outside, or but newly gathered into our ranks, we would say that the General Officers, Board of National Superintendents, National Organizers and Evangelists, W. T. P. A. Editors and Publisher, Presidents of the Board of Temperance Hospital and Temple Trustees, President's Private Secretary, Chairmen of Standing Committees and the four General Officers of each state and Territorial Union, are ex officio members of the National Convention. In addition, there may be one delegate-at-large elected from each State and Territorial Union, and one additional delegate for each five hundred members whose dues have been paid into State and National Treasuries. These delegates are elected at the County, District or State Conventions preceding the National, and must receive credentials from State Officers before being admitted to the floor of the Convention. Thus, each Convention is a more or less accurate register not only of the enthusiasm and esprit de corps, but of the actual working force of the organization which alone makes the Convention possible. That this register made this year may be as accurate as possible, we especially urge upon Local and State Treasurers great promptness in the remittance of dues. Our official year is but eleven months, therefore, especially as organization has been our watchword during the year, it is of the utmost importance that we should know our actual membership in order that we may rightly estimate our gains.

Last year at Cleveland, we celebrated our coming-of-age Convention, and the mere thought that we had attained our majority was enough of itself to inspire the pen of her who wrote the call. This year brings no such incentive to eloquence, and yet the rounding up of our majority year ought to be an event of greater moment than was its beginning. Then, all was prophecy; today it is fulfillment. Our hopes and plans have been actualized into successes or failures. From the harvest-field we look back to the seed-sowing, and thank God for sheaves garnered, even while we regret that their numbers are not increased an hundredfold.

The year just closed has not been without its sorrows. We have entered the dark valley of death with many who have long been identified with our cause, and have seen Heaven grow richer as Earth has grown poorer, by their passing beyond. It has also been a year of deep gladness, for we have stood upon more than one illuminated mountain peak and watched growing brighter and brighter the prophetic gleam which heralds the coming dawn. The Polyglot meetings in Washington, and the Great Convention in the heart of the World's life but just closed, have marked epochs in our history, from which we can but go forward in confidence to greater things beyond.

The Baltimore meeting will be in many respects not unlike its predecessors. There will be on the first evening addresses of welcome from representatives of Maryland's best life and responses from those who stand closely allied to our great work all over the United States. Y evening will come with its usual interest, and for the rest there are plans of more than usual importance yet to be worked out. The days will bring their reports of work already accomplished, and plans for further enlargement. There will be the hush of the prayer hour, the blessed communion of heart with heart, the touch of soul to soul. Names honored the world over will be upon our program, and no effort will be spared to make this summing up of our majority year worthy its inception. The fact that the Convention will this year be the guest of the State Union and not of Baltimore alone, is in itself significant as marking the warmth of our welcome.

Let us come up in prayer, in faith, in the strength which belongs to those whose dwelling-place is in the secret presence of the Infinite. The call for a day of prayer on October 3 will be found in this column. It is our wish that as never before that day may be observed. Surely we of all others need that girding of strength which can come alone through taking hold upon God in prayer. More and more our work is taking upon itself new features, and the magnitude of its scope is becoming more apparent. More and more we are realizing that this warfare upon which we have entered is the warfare of life against death; light against darkness; the righteousness of God against the unrighteousness of all that opposes Him. We are coming to see that we stand for the day when throughout the whole earth His will shall be done; when His kingdom shall be set upon the hearthstone of each home, the altar of each church, the market-places and the busy ways of all life's thronging activities. That day when "upon the bells of the horses shall be written Holiness unto the Lord"; when life shall take on its true meaning as "hid with Christ in God," given up on the self side for the full unfoldment of the Divine side, which is the all-embracing wholeness of a redeemed humanity.

In the strength of this thought, in the courage of this hope, in the fuller gleaming of that "light which never shone on sea or land," but which shines forth in the human face which has seen God, and been "changed into the same image from glory to glory," let us come together; and He who first called us into being, will surely lead us on to greater and still greater victories in His name.

Signed,

Frances E. Willard.

DAY OF PRAYER.

Official Call.

The annual meeting of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union will be held in Baltimore, Maryland, October 18 to 23, 1895.

In view of the custom to hold a day of consecration and prayer previous to the Convention, and as superintendent of the evangelistic department, I hereby call upon all local unions to set apart Thursday, October 3, for this purpose.

The recent convention of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union in London, with three hundred delegates from every part of the world, has filled us with thanksgiving, increased our sense of personal responsibility in our great work, and a realization of our dependence upon God. Hence, let us as individuals, and as unions, draw near to Him for a fresh enduement of power.

Prayer for special blessing upon our leader, and all our officers, superintendents, evangelists, organizers and delegates, also upon the faithful workers at home. Prayer for a Pentecostal season in our devotional services at 9 and 11:15 a. m. Prayer for wisdom and harmony.
Third hour, 1:30 to 3 p. m.

Appropriate hymns may be selected by each leader. As Thursday evening is so generally a church prayer-meeting service, let the local unions consult with pastors and arrange for special temperance themes, and prayer for our work—rather than for an opposition meeting.

A famous explorer in South Africa says that in a cannibal tribe with some of whose leaders he had made friends he was pitifully spoken to by them to this effect: "Master, never let any one of us go behind you. As long as we walk in front you are safe, but if we get behind you the temptation to kill you might be too great."

Mrs. Alice Gordon-Gulick, principal of the American school for the higher education of young women in San Sebastian, Spain, has prepared young women for the examinations in the State University at Madrid, and they have passed with higher honors than any of the young men. This is a thing unprecedented in Spain and marks the beginning of a new era for higher education of women.

Edward Clifford, artist and Christian worker, gives an illustration of the power of habit which for forcefulness we do not remember to have seen equalled. Mr. Clifford vouches for his having heard it from the minister to whom the strange experience came. He was sent for to pray with a dying man, and after he had talked with him in the most tender manner and the man had seemed responsive, the good minister knelt in prayer, and while he was praying he heard the man faintly say, "Do look out for your watch;" but the minister went on with his prayer, and at the close what was his consternation to see that the man who was a noted pickpocket had passed away, and with "the ruling passion strong in death" had taken the watch and held it in his dead hand.

The word "consort" means united in fate; the word "companion" means sharing the same bread. Consort is higher, being lifted from the material and transformed to the everlasting plane of thought.

The abomination of opium has never received a more stinging blow than the following statement made by Miss Ackermann: "When I was speaking on the opium question a high-class Brahmin arose in the audience and said, 'I should like to have you answer me one question. Here in India the poppy is cultivated; opium is manufactured by the government, every ball of opium that goes out from the factories bears the stamp and seal of the British crown. When I was in England I went to a chemist, and I said to him, "I want some opium." He said, "Where is your prescription?" "I have no prescription." "You must get it; you must go to a physician and get a prescription before we can sell you any opium." I went to a physician and the prescription was written out and the opium was placed in my hands and it was marked poison. Now,' he said, 'can you tell why it is that to England's white-skinned subjects it is sold as poison, and to its dark-skinned subjects it is sold as food? I could go out to the nearest opium den and buy opium enough to poison a hundred men. Can you explain this to me?'"

God's minorities are majorities. But if it seems hopeless then I would reduce the problem to its lowest terms like this: God on his throne, and on earth only three living souls—John Smith, who wants to run a saloon; John Jones, who wants to drink; and John Woolley, a son of God. What is Woolley's duty? Simply to wash his hands of that saloon. "But Jones and Smith are two against one, and will beat him." What do you mean by "two against one"? Who is one? Whom will they beat? Has God abdicated? "They'll have a saloon." Yes, but they will not have me. Four words answer all arguments. "We must be politic," says one. "Not from my bottle." "They will have it." "Not from my bottle." "It will always be drunk." "Not from my bottle." "It will be sold on the sly." "Not from my bottle." Perhaps the saloon is to go on. I am not bound to abolish it, but only my interest in it. There are twelve million voters in the United States. I'll vote my fraction right, and every time I vote I'll carry my share of that election as long as God is alive. That may not do the saloons any harm, but it will be good for me. I am not bound to be successful, but I am bound to be true. A square man is never wrong side up. "My vote won't count," says one. Listen. "Abraham believed God, and it was counted." Yes, the saloon may go on, like the brook, forever, and men may die in them like flies, and hell grow fat on drunkards. Women may still break their hearts in the vain efforts to woo their loved ones from drink. Ladies may sip their wine, boys learn to drink, and men burn their hearts to a crisp in alcohol, "but not from my bottle." —John G. Woolley.

EXTRACTS FROM REPORT OF YOUNG WOMAN'S BRANCH OF THE W. W. C. T. U. FROM 1893 TO 1895.

"The world some cycles nearer turned toward the eternities which cast on it a broader light."

To chronicle a widening of the temperance circle, a deepening of its principles, and an aggregation in membership and work, is a pleasurable task.

Following the order of organization, the United States reports Young Women's Branches in forty-two states and territories, under the immediate care of state Y secretaries, with a paid membership of nearly fifteen thousand and a following of over thirty thousand, not including the honorary membership of about ten thousand young men.

While the membership in the United States has not greatly increased in numbers during the past two years, owing to the organization of many young people's societies in the churches where young men are admitted to full membership, yet the reports show more systematic, faithful and efficient work done by the Y Branches in all well organized states and territories than in any previous years. Pennsylvania stands at the head of the list in number of regular members, showing an increase of one hundred during the past year, with continuous work done by the state Y secretary and her assistant, and an organizer is kept constantly in the field. The Crusade state, Ohio, ranks next in membership and activity, followed by Illinois, Massachusetts and New York, while Rhode Island, one of the smallest states in the Union, has expended during 1894 the largest sum of money for temperance work, $13,000. The Y Branches are engaged in promoting every department of the thirty-five inaugurated by the National W. C. T. U. Under the heading of health and sanitation may be classed the tea-rooms, noon rests, summer homes, ice water fountains and coffee carts in charge of the Y Branches. Demorest medal contests have been held in every state. The Hon. Neal Dow's ninetieth birthday was generally celebrated. A number of states report Y Branches among colored and foreign population, one a Y of Indian girls. The Branches of nearly every state have contributed to the young woman's room in the Temperance Hospital, Chicago, have sent offerings to the Temperance Temple, besides placing several tablets in the corridor of Willard Hall. They have united in gifts to the Isabel Gibson fund for temperance work in France, in the Columbian fund for temperance work in Spain, and have aided temperance work in Italy.

A fund was raised to distribute Y pledge cards at the Columbian Exposition in Chicago, of which thousands were given out. The Y's of Africa sent a most substantial contribution for this purpose.

At the opening of the college year of 1894 the National Y Branch, through the assistant secretary, Mrs. F. S. Evans, sent a printed address, prepared by Miss Willard, Lady Henry Somerset and Mrs. Mary Hunt, to the officials connected with educational institutions throughout the United States, including 1,435 schools and colleges, and nearly 3,000 World's Petitions, also 1,500 copies of a letter prepared by the general secretary to state W. C. T. U. presidents asking the coöperation of all unions in the towns where these institutions were located. This special line of work has been indorsed by a strong resolution passed by a number of state conventions. Thousands of students have been addressed, and several hundred organized into Y. W. C. T. Unions, many taking the name of the Somerset Y.

The money raised and expended for all purposes by the Y Branch of the United States for 1893 and 1894 was $65,968.52.

General Secretary, World's and National Y Branch.

THE Y. W. C. T. U. IN THE DOMINION OF CANADA.

There are up to date forty-four Y unions in the Dominion of Canada. These unions represent an active and honorary membership of between twelve and fourteen hundred.

Vancouver manages a night school for boys with great success and is doing good work along the line of parlor socials.

Victoria is about opening a large coffee house.

Brandon devotes special attention to L. T. L. and the supplying of literature for the boxes on the trains.

Winnipeg holds parlor socials frequently, distributes literature and also does large work in sending literature to outlying districts where the people are too poor to buy. A very successful flower mission is also maintained.

Ontario has twelve Y unions and five Y committees.

Quebec has sixteen unions all doing excellent work.

Maritime comprises the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. A mimeograph paper is issued by this provincial organization, which is brimful of inspiration. Two new unions have been organized during March, one of them in a ladies' college.

E. CORA HIND, Supt. Y. W. C. T. U.
Winnipeg, Manitoba.

HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

In spite of the disturbed condition of political affairs the Y. W. C. T. Union of Honolulu, organized in 1889, has held on its way and has, since 1893, contributed one hundred dollars annually toward Miss Green's work among the Hawaiians, has given to each society, the Loyal Temperance Legion and Band of Hope, fifty cents monthly, has sent to Miss Denton, for her work in Japan, ten dollars, and the work in France five dollars. Demorest medal contests have been held and efforts made to start anti-cigarette leagues. In a seminary, after a talk given by the Y secretary, followed by time for considering the seriousness of signing a pledge, thirty-nine young women had affixed their names and organized a union calling it the Kaahuman, after one of the noble native women. Over sixty girls have joined, and are to hold meetings once a month at a new boarding school, Kamehameha. The subject has also been presented and pledges left for signature at Olion College, and at a school on one of the other Islands an interest in temperance is being awakened which is encouraging when so many of the Hawaiians are being swept away by the vice of intemperance.

Y WORK IN GREAT BRITAIN.

The Y work was inaugurated in Great Britain in 1890, during a visit here of the international superintendent of the department, Mrs. Frances J. Barnes, of New York; and Lady Henry Somerset kindly consented to be the superintendent until some one less burdened with work could be found. In 1892 she handed the department over to the undersigned, who was made the honorary general secretary.

At first the work progressed but slowly, as the idea was new in Great Britain, but within the last two or three years it has begun to create a widespread interest. There are now about seventy Y Branches, with a membership of several thousand; and most of the Branches are actively at work.

ALYS WHITALL RUSSELL,
Honorary General Secretary.
London, Eng.

AUSTRALASIAN Y. W. C. T. U.

Queensland reports fourteen Y unions, with an active membership of over three hundred and sixteen, and one hundred and fifty-two honoraries.

Victoria, with its twelve Y unions, consisting of three hundred and thirty-six active and nineteen honorary members, reports thorough and earnest work. Three hundred and eighty-eight meetings of various kinds have been held, and eighteen entertainments.

New South Wales reports eleven Y unions, with two hundred and eighty-one active members and sixty-five honorary members.

South Australia reports eight Y unions, with an active membership of eighty-seven, and twenty-four honoraries. Four unions have held fifty-nine meetings and entertainments.

All unions have taken up press work; one Y reports items to two papers.

Total number of Y unions in Australasia, 45; active members, 1,032; honorary members, 259; total sum raised, £571; 21 unions have held meetings, 672.

RUTH LUCAS, Australian Y Supt.
2 Frances St., Hyde Park, Sydney, N. S. W.

SOUTH AFRICA.

Since the report of 1893 the Y's of England, Canada and the United States have had the pleasure of welcoming Miss Anna M. Cummings, the superintendent from South Africa, who, with her companions, Miss Solomon and Miss Pride, also members of Y unions, have visited several states and acceptably addressed many meetings, most notably the National Convention held in Cleveland, O. Miss Ella Dudley has had the work during Miss Cumming's absence. It is encouraging to know that ten unions have not only held their own, but that the recommendations and help sent out by the World's Y secretary have been received and used, and that the college letters have proven helpful; already W. C. T. Unions have been organized in five academies, and more are in prospect.

ASIA MINOR.

The union organized in Smyrna by Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt, composed of older and younger women has, amidst many difficulties, continued to hold regular meetings, elect officers, present topics, obtain signatures to the pledge, distribute literature and urge the wearing of the white ribbon. The meetings have been held in Miss Lord's school, one being addressed by Mrs. Blatchford, who gave an account of Miss Willard's work for temperance. Several individual cases have been benefited, one a young man, who had been intemperate signed the pledge, and an old woman wholly given to the habit of smoking, has confessed by the grace of God, to being entirely delivered from the vice. We have many cases to pray for, and have been impressed with a need in Smyrna of a temperance hospital. Who will help us open one?

MARY A. MASSAOUTI.
Smyrna, Turkey.

FRANCE.

The union at Suresnes, under the presidency of Mlle. Raynaud, has become an established factor for good, numbers of both young and old through this agency having become total abstainers. The young men of this organization commemorate holidays in France by arranging temperance programs which have been enthusiastically carried out; on these days new members have been obtained and an incentive given for organizing unions in several towns on the coast of France.

THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE IN BULGARIA.

The annual meeting of the Bulgarian Temperance Union was held in Philippopolis on the 5th of April. As it has previously been stated, our union consists of separate temperance bands in towns and villages, of which there are now eighteen. Three of these have organized during the past year. Twenty regularly appointed delegates, representing twelve of the bands, were present. Though few they represented all parts of Bulgaria. Only one day was allowed for the three sessions held. It was a busy day. The morning and afternoon sessions were devoted to reports and business matters. The reports showed that the efforts of the respective bands to popularize the temperance cause have not been in vain. The union has published during 1894, besides its semi-monthly, one temperance pamphlet. Its financial limitations have not permitted the publication of more temperance literature of which there is a great need. It was found more expedient for the present year to unite the two papers into one monthly. For president of the union was elected Mr. Vulko Shopoff, the Bulgarian commissioner to the World's Fair. He is heart and soul interested in the temperance cause. We hope this year for more aggressive work. It seems that the time has already come for a popular appeal to our government for the limitation of the liquor traffic. A committee for that purpose was appointed and a petition to be presented at the autumn session of the Narodno Sobranie (national assembly) is under way of preparation. The evening session was devoted to several stirring addresses which were listened to by a large audience. So much for the union.

Now a word or two in regard to a recent speech of Mr. Ivan Ev. Gesheff, our Minister of Finance. The ministry of commerce and agriculture, being vacant, is put for the present under his care. In this capacity he appointed a committee which is to consider the condition of our peasantry and the ways in which it may be bettered. In opening the sessions of this committee Mr. Gesheff clearly pointed out that one of the greatest curses of our peasantry are the krichmi (drinking places) of which there are many in every village. He stated to that committee that hundreds of thousands of women and children will bless them if they devise the best means of limiting the liquor traffic.

This is a great encouragement to all temperance workers in Bulgaria. We will therefore push ahead the above mentioned petition hoping that it will meet the approval of the people and the national representatives. M. N. POPOFF.

Ulitza Solonska, Sophia, Bulgaria.

WORLD'S WAVE CRESTS.

NANAIMO, British Columbia, union, with their membership of forty-two in a town of twenty-one saloons and three breweries, have help and support from all the churches and are encouraged to go forward in the ten different lines of work which they carry on.

MISS MARY SCOTT, of Ottawa, Canada, the editor of the Woman's Journal, the official organ of the Canada W. C. T. U., expects to attend the National Convention at Baltimore. Her estimate of our new World's treasurer, Mrs. Sanderson, is that she will look after the finances of the World's W. C. T. U. in a careful and conscientious way and our Canadian white-ribboners will feel glad that they still have a General Officer from among their number.

MISS HELEN HOOD was the same genial kind friend at the London meetings that white-ribboners have known so long and well. Her efforts to make the Convention a success were tireless, and she had the chief part in finding homes for guests. She also assisted in the work of sending items to the American press. No one of our women is more diligent and earnest in season and out of season than Helen Hood. It will be noted that she has been made secretary of the department for conducting schools of methods in the World's W. C. T. U.

IN a letter received by Miss Ackermann from the W. C. T. U. in Bangalore, India, Mrs. Laurin writes: "Each department of work in our W. C. T. U. is in good running order, just as you set it going, and each has on the whole gained in interest and in power. There is a Loyal Temperance Legion in connection with our union, fifty strong and well worked. We have just got two hundred pledge cards from Chicago. Our wall pocket for literature at the railway station is a grand success. The engineers pass the leaflets on to others down the line. The flower missions do a wide-reaching and Christlike work. Mrs. Hooper is more and more efficient as press editor. We are just arranging for our annual meeting. Mrs. Phillips, our National president for India, is tingling with life and suggestiveness. The White Ribbon (India's Union Signal) is increasing in circulation and at our last meeting two young ladies volunteered to secure a dozen subscribers. We like Dr. Bushnell's proposal that unions in America adopt and mother each a union abroad or that each foreign union should be so adopted. Do you know any one who wants to adopt us? We are ready for a proposal. Such a connection would help us about getting literature. Our visitors (we have divided up the city and all parts of it are reached) say they are besieged for tracts and leaflets."

MRS. ROBERT GREENLEE, of the Chicago Central W. C. T. U., who is now belting the world on a tour for pleasure and profit with her husband and family, writes interestingly regarding her meetings with white-ribboners in foreign lands. She found the white ribbon quite common in the Sandwich Islands, Honolulu and Hilo both having wide-awake unions. Concerning Japanese white-ribboners she writes from Tokio, the great center of the W. C. T. U. work:

"Tuesday afternoon a good number of the ladies met at the Presbyterian mission and I was called to greet them and there met the president of the National W. C. T. U. of Japan, learning through her—Mrs. Kaji Yajima—that the W. C. T. U. in Tokio was organized in 1886 and numbers one hundred and fifty members, about thirty being active. Their principal work in literature is editing a Woman's Herald, a small pamphlet for the navy, etc. They are wide awake and the largest union in Japan, all Japanese. There is a union in Hakodate organized in 1887, another in Chida, near Tokio, organized in 1893, and one in Yokohama, dating from 1894.

"I met the officers of the union in Yokohama through Mrs. Sakuri; as they are all Japanese, it was difficult to find them. They have one hundred members and an active force of about ten. Dr. Kate Bushnell was the one who started the union there. Wish there might be one among the foreigners, as it is sadly needed.

"I hear of Miss West's visit everywhere. I was much surprised in a porcelain store to look up and find her photograph on the wall. Though the parties in the store only spoke Japanese, they gave me to understand how fond they were of her and brought me a Bible to show that they were Christians.

"It has been a great treat to meet these workers and I wish I might remain longer with them."

WISCONSIN.

SUMMER RECORD.

Even in Wisconsin the summer holidays mark a minimum of effort along all lines of work; but the W. C. T. U. has not been altogether idle. The Monona Lake school of methods, under the efficient direction of our state president, Mrs. Campbell, was very helpful and the plan of work was successfully carried out. Mrs. Campbell's assistants were the Y secretary, Mrs. Maude Barkey, of West Superior; the superintendent of evangelistic work. Mrs. Addie De-Long, of Angelo, and our new superintendent of normal work, Mrs. Isadore Black, of Racine. Besides these Mrs. Carrie L. Grout, of Rockford, Ill., gave one address.

A unique feature of the school of methods was the organization of a Monona Lake union which is designed to form a connecting link between isolated members and the state organization. It is entitled to the same representation at the state convention as other unions. A Monona Lake Y was also formed on the same basis, the idea of both originating with the Y secretary, Mrs. Barkey. Two hundred and fifteen white-ribboners registered at the W. C. T. U. tent. The management of the assembly was pleased by the interest manifested by members of the organization, and we hope for even larger opportunities next year.

The fifth annual convention of the Wisconsin L. T. L. has also been held in Berlin since Wisconsin's last letter to THE UNION SIGNAL. It had an enthusiastic delegation of one hundred representatives, and seventy members were reported as having completed the course of study, although but twelve were able to be present to receive their diplomas. The state president was present at the convention, and a new impetus given to this most important work.

At Racine, Mrs. Hart, president of the W. C. T. U., gave a charming reception to the graduates of that city, and again, on August 27, Mrs. Hart opened her beautiful home for a lecture by Mrs. Lake, of Chicago, the superintendent of the purity work of Illinois. I am glad to record a widening of the social lines for our work, and the dedication of the parlors to the cause of humanity.

The W. C. T. U. of Tomah has recently presented to the city a drinking fountain, costing over one hundred dollars. The presentation was made at a public meeting, Mrs. Amy K. Morse speaking on behalf of the union. The mayor accepted it for the city with a gracious speech, in which he said: "This pure water should represent our city government." The fountain is named in honor of Mrs. Williams, one of the Crusaders.

On August 11 Sparta dedicated its temperance temple with appropriate ceremonies, Mrs. C. M. Foster presiding. The city, as represented by its officials, participated in the program, and the occasion was made the starting point for a Citizens' League, for the purpose of systematic temperance work in Monroe county. Beside the moral results, which cannot be estimated, eight new members and twenty-seven dollars were the material additions of the meeting to the local union.

The hall, the future home of the W. C. T. U., is a pleasant, well-lighted room on the second floor. Its seating capacity is 350. The first floor is to be used as a reading-room and public library, and the basement is occupied by a first-class restaurant.

Genevieve Faville Topping, whom, although recently employed in educational work among the colored people of the South, we are still proud to claim as a "Wisconsin girl," will soon carry the white ribbon badge to Tokio, Japan, where her husband goes as a missionary, under the direction of the Baptist Board of Missions. Mrs. Topping is a woman of rare breadth of character, delightful enthusiasm and winning grace, and what is more important, is an earnest Christian and a devoted white-ribboner. She will take up the kindergarten work in Japan and will be a rich addition to the white-ribbon forces in that far-away land.

Our state president, Mrs. Campbell, is making a month's tour in the ninth district, which people who are not familiar with Wisconsin's political geography, may not know, consists of thirteen large counties in the northwestern part of the state. The district has but two county organizations; there are three counties in which there are no unions, and six in which the W. C. T. U. is represented by only one union each. In a recent letter, Mrs. Campbell writes of a week spent at Mountain, forty miles from a railroad station, and which is reached by "the hilliest, sandiest, roughest road in the state."

The convention of Grant county was held at Fennimore, August 29 and 30, and the county organization completed. Many of our county and most of our district conventions occur in September or October, and more field notes may be gathered for the next letter.

VACATION NOTES.

I am very glad indeed to say that even during the long, hot days of summer, when so many are away at seaside or on mountain seeking a cool spot and a much needed rest, a faithful few are about their Master's work, as the following report from the Owensboro W. C. T. U. will show. They have just presented to the city two fountains.

The drinking fountain, a handsome bronze one, seven feet in height, is near the Custom House, and the humane fountain, presented by the children of the L. T. L., on the Court House square. Quite a crowd was present at the presentation and all joined in singing the temperance doxology which was followed by prayer by Dr. Kelly, of the Methodist church. In behalf of the W. C. T. U. Mrs. I. H. Axton presented the large fountain, and the response was made by the city attorney, Mr. Atchison. In an able and eloquent speech he extolled the W. C. T. U. for their efforts to lift up and bless humanity. After one of the most stirring hymns from the "White Ribbon Hymnal," the crowd adjourned to the L. T. L. fountain where Master Foster Howard made the presentation address.

Dr. Herberner, of the Presbyterian church, conducted the devotional exercises. The children sang in the most spirited manner, "Saloons Must Go," and as the words floated out on the evening breeze a prophetic fire seemed to burn in the hearts of all who heard their young voices. At the conclusion of the exercises all adjourned to the court-house yard, where the ladies had prepared an ice cream supper. A nice little sum was realized from this, which will help fill up the vacuum made by the purchase of the fountain. All of the departments of the union have good superintendents, especially the jail work, which is faithfully looked after by Mrs. Laura Barnes, a truly consecrated woman.

The cheering news comes from the Glasgow W. C. T. U. that at an election held to decide whether the local temperance law should be repealed, the victory was gained by a majority of seventy-four. For several weeks before the election the W. C. T. U. was turned into a prayer-meeting, five hundred pages of literature was distributed, and work done in every legitimate way. The day of the election an all-day prayer-meeting was held.

The W. C. T. U. of Paducah has just got-

OKLAHOMA.

AN OBJECT LESSON.

Fifteen months of drouth, and an uncertainty as to provision for the future, taught the W. C. T. U. of Oklahoma an object lesson of how God hears and answers prayers. Our far away sisters in Olympia, Wash., sent through Miss Emma E. Page, $17.86, to Mrs. Switzer, our territorial president, to be distributed among those who were in want. We quote from her letter to show how her heart was stirred in our behalf: "By personal letters and newspaper appeals we have been stirred up to put in our mites for the Oklahoma sufferers. Our citizens (who know what the pinch of hard times is themselves) send $17.86, praying that the Lord may bless it and lengthen out its sustaining power, even as He did the cruse of oil and the barrel of flour. I hope it may reach some person to whom it will give comfort. Some here are afraid their offerings never reach the end intended, but in the hands of white-ribboners they will surely be wisely and reverently placed to relieve actual suffering. May the Lord bless and help you in this work."

A "sister" from Indiana wrote almost in the same strain as the above, promising help if it were needed. Mrs. Switzer endeavored faithfully to use the money as the donors requested. She found one family that was subsisting entirely on boiled Kiffir corn. But the crisis is past; abundant rains have fallen since July, insuring late crops.

The personal seed-sowing of Rev. Irene B. Hester, who holds the fort at Cherokee, is wonderful. The union at that place has held three grand public temperance meetings. The Y's and Y. P. S. C. E. three. The questions discussed at these meetings were, "Suffrage," "High License," "No License," "Peace and Arbitration." This union has eight members and new ones promised. Mrs. Hester is one of our faithful evangelists, as well as a minister of the gospel in the Friends church. She has held and assisted in seven revivals during the past six months in which two hundred souls were saved. She preached over one hundred sermons, visited and prayed with seventy-five families, attended sixty prayer-meetings, and scattered seven hundred pages of literature, has given ten addresses on temperance, peace and equal suffrage. To accomplish this she has traveled one thousand miles by private conveyance. She never made any charge for her work; was donated two dollars and thirty-five cents. She says many would gladly have given more, but the people in the Strip are mostly in a needy condition themselves. Sister Hester writes encouragingly concerning the desire of the women to have unions organized among them.

The Enid union carried out the program arranged by Miss Ada Melville for flower mission day, held their services at the Presbyterian church there, together with the children adjourned to the jail where prayer was offered and Scriptures read. The children sang some appropriate hymns, the prisoners joining in; flowers, Scripture cards and literature were distributed.

"Citizenship day" the Guthrie union participated with others in holding an immense mass-meeting, Mrs. Buckner, in behalf of the union, rendering a fine recitation. Mrs. Buckner was formerly from Hebron, Neb. She is a gifted elocutionist, ready to speak or conduct meetings that would help forward our cause. The Guthrie union have been aiding the city council in their fight on the dives of infamy. They have also been holding cottage prayer-meetings which have increased in numbers till private houses scarcely hold the audience.

The county superintendent of Logan county, Miss Sarah Bodsworth, employed the W. C. T. U. county president to teach a class in physiology in the County Normal. It was the first time the effects of alcohol upon the human system had been taught in the Normal. The students were very much interested in the subject. Miss Olivet Thornby, superintendent of Payne county, has also led out in the teaching of scientific temperance instruction in all her schools and has accomplished wonders in that line. There are eight lady superintendents of county schools in Oklahoma.

The union secured a place on the program of the Logan County Sunday-school Association. The Guthrie and the Frances Willard unions have held an all-day meeting. Two of the subjects discussed were "What brought you into the W. C. T. U.?" and "What do you consider the most important line of work?" The Frances Willard union provided the dinner, and much enthusiasm for the cause was created.

The Oklahoma City union observed flower mission day by visiting the jail. A sketch of Jennie Casseday was read, and the usual exercises on such occasions were conducted. This union has distributed forty-nine thousand pages of literature within six months. Their rack in the postoffice is emptied as soon as filled. The union had the national temperance education law published in a city paper, and sent a number of the copies to the County Normal.

A union has recently been organized at Perry, and has shown its faith by inviting the annual territorial convention to convene there.

A call to "come up higher" has been given to two of our most useful sisters, Mrs. O. P. Light, territorial treasurer, who quietly and peacefully fell asleep in her rocking-chair, after eight months of patient suffering, and Mrs. M. A. Copland, of Guthrie, who had formerly been corresponding secretary for the territorial union, an active, brilliant worker. The W. C. T. U. assisted in laying away these sisters, providing for each casket a profusion of flowers.

News in a Nutshell.

MISS BELLE KEARNEY arrived from Europe August 31, and has decided to remain in the northeast until the National Convention. She will be open to engagements until then and may be addressed in care of Mrs. Ella Boole, Prohibition Park, Staten Island.

MILLIE M. LEWIS, state lecturer and organizer of Missouri, organized a W. C. T. U. Union August 28, in Poplar Bluff, Mo., of forty active and ten honorary members, and in a month has gained one hundred and nineteen new active members, four Y. W. C. T. U's and four W. C. T. U's.

A DEMOREST medal contest was given in Grace M. E. church under the auspices of the Women's Temperance union, of Oil City, Pa., on Friday evening. In addition to the contest a good musical program was rendered. Mrs. Gates received the silver medal, which was presented by Mrs. J. P. Strayer.

THE UNION SIGNAL readers and W. C. T. U. workers will be sorry to hear that Mrs. S. E. V. Emery, National superintendent of labor and capital, has, through illness, been unable to give her usual well-directed efforts to the furtherance of the department work during the past months. All will unite in desire for her recovery and that she may continue the good work in renewed strength.

MISS ELLEN D. MORRIS, corresponding secretary of Missouri, writes: "I wish to call attention to the National Meeting of Colored Women of America, held last month in Boston. When Miss Wells attempted to injure Miss Willard by her false statements concerning lynchings in the South, two white-ribboners from our state (colored women), Mrs. Libbie C. Anthony, of Jefferson City, state superintendent colored work, and Mrs. Mary Pitts, of St. Louis, both defended Miss Willard, and the W. C. T. U., and Mrs. Anthony, a very bright woman, was instrumental in changing the tone of sentiment. She presented the following resolution, which was passed without a dissenting vote: 'That we indorse the work and methods of the W. C. T. U.' Mrs. Anthony knew very little of the controversy that has been going on, but she says in a letter to me, 'I know the W. C. T. U. and Miss Willard are on the right side, and so I defended them to the best of my ability.'"

MRS. ADELAIDE L. SIMMONS, of Kenosha, Wis., has been requested by the board of women managers of the Atlanta exposition to collect and forward the work of women to exhibit in the woman's building at the exposition. All who have books, pictures, statuary, handiwork or inventions are requested to communicate with Mrs. Simmons and learn how to send and have returned free of charge.

MRS. HELEN M. BARKER has delivered her new lecture, "The New Woman," to a fine audience at Woodlawn, Chicago, and at other points recently. It is full of such excellent strong support for the true, advanced woman, that every woman, and man too, was convinced that she would have to "keep step," or be left behind in the world's movement. The lecture is a taking one, founded on fact, and well delivered, and it will prove a help to the cause.

THE union of Meriden, Conn., attained its majority April 14, and on June 16 dedicated a beautiful fountain as a fitting celebration of that event. The cost was about $1,500, and for nearly a year and a half the energies of the white ribbon women, led by their zealous, hard-working president, Mrs. C. A. Holmes, were given to raising money to defray all expenses. Entertainments were held, collections taken at the gospel temperance meetings, private subscriptions solicited, religious societies and other organizations asked to contribute, and little by little the fund grew. The members of the union gave their dollars as well as their time and work, and what at first seemed a gigantic undertaking became at last a successful fruition of hopes. The fountain is nine and a half feet high, and about four feet square at the base. It is constructed of Westerly granite, with polished panels on three sides. On one is engraved the names of the Mayor and ex-mayors of Meriden; on another the date of the presentation to the city, and the names of the founders of the union. The third bears the name of one of the oldest and most respected citizens, who first established "free ice water" thirteen years ago. The fountain is covered by a beautiful artistic iron canopy, which was given by the ex-mayors of the city and their families. We trust that many such fountains will be erected, thus giving the cup of cold water in the name of Christ, for ages to come.

LUMBER CAMP WORK.

Will all state superintendents of lumber camp work who have not yet sent in their reports for last winter's work, please do so at once and oblige their National superintendent,

Cor. Secy's Notes.

Seated once more at my desk, my thoughts go out first of all in loving gratitude to the dear sisterhood all over the land who have held me close in their hearts during the past weeks, and given such genuine proof of their sympathy in this, my hour of trial. I have not been able personally to answer all your letters of sympathy. Please believe it has not been because my heart has failed to respond. You know, I am sure, that I mourn not as one without hope. I have never been so certain of "the world which sets this right" as in these last few weeks. If you had known my father, you would have felt sure that a heart so full of love and justice, of tenderness, could go nowhere else than to the source of all love and justice. Because of what he was I rejoice to-day in what he is and go forward strengthened by the thought that a heart which never turned away from my need, which rejoiced in my work, and looked with fatherly pride upon all that I did, is not unmindful of me now. And yet, for all that, you know, as I know, what it means to have the vail of silence between, even though for a little time. Pray for me, that my strength fail not.

The official call, which appears in another column, needs no emphasis, and indeed so well were the facts of the Convention already known, that it hardly needed to appear. Please bear in mind that the states gaining five hundred new members must report not later than September 25, if they are to be counted in on the benefit night. Said benefit night will, without doubt, be on Tuesday of Convention week. Details can be better arranged when we know who are the successful competitors. The two states gaining the largest number of members in addition to the five hundred, as has been already stated so many times, are entitled to an address by Miss Willard for their next state convention. Remember, please, that it must be in excess of five hundred NEW members, not in excess of five hundred actual membership. This gain must be also reported by September 25, as Miss Willard must know when she arrives whether she is to go to the conventions this fall or whether the successful states are among those holding spring conventions.

Arrangements for the Baltimore Convention are rapidly progressing. During my absence at Mountain Lake Park and Chautauqua, I was enabled to consult with the president of the Maryland union, and also the secretary of the Baltimore city union. Lists of committees and other matters of importance will very soon appear in the columns of THE UNION SIGNAL. Meantime, I am requested to ask that the state officers, superintendents, organizers and evangelists who will not be present at Baltimore will send word to that effect as soon as possible, in order that the entertainment committee may know for how many it must provide entertainment.

The summer has been an exceedingly busy one and the promise of rest has been most elusive. Nevertheless, I am assured that its work has not been in vain, and that at our summer meetings and in other ways we have been enabled to make advances. The fall campaign is now upon us and there must be a new girding of strength, for the battle waxes sore. If your letters in the weeks to come do not receive the prompt attention they deserve, please remember the accumulation of matter upon my desk and also that Convention days draw on apace.

Yours in faith and hope,

KATHARINE LENTE STEVENSON.

Treasurer's Corner.

My attention has recently been called to the wide-awake union at Orange, N. J. They are doing excellent work on many lines, but I was struck by some things revealed by the treasurers' report. Their total receipts were $5,173.51; of this sum only fifty-nine dollars was credited as active membership dues; twenty-seven dollars was associate members' dues, and $420, sustaining members' dues. Five hundred and six dollars dues all told, while the donations amounted to $1,377.85. How little they could have done on dues alone. Their lodging house and other local enterprises gives them a claim upon public spirited people for help, which they seem very glad to accord. But I apprehend that the wise women of Orange W. C. T. U. would fail to receive this much needed help if they were not alert and ingenious in their methods of bringing before the people in an attractive way their actual needs. Recently they held a birthday party, and with the invitations they sent out this little card.

Here is a little purse about as big as a minute,
And this is the kind of coin we ask you to put in it;
A penny for each of the birthdays through all your happy years
(The most have been bright with blessings, if a few have been stained with tears).
The Silver of kindly words, the Gold of your heart's love true,
We know we shall find among them for the W. C. T. U.

One of the Orange papers gives the following account of this party and its results:

"A large number of people called during the reception hours, and each one brought with them the little satin bags which had been sent out accompanied with the rhyming card, in which they were requested to put into the bags a penny for each of their own birthdays. The responses were most liberal, and many did not limit themselves to the request. One of the bags from one of the members contained $75 in gold, counting 'seventy-five golden years,' two $20 gold pieces being received, as well as a number of $5 and $10 bills. The entire amount sent in was over $300. It is expected that many of the bags will still be sent in. During the entire afternoon there was continuous music from a harp and violin, stationed in the balcony on the west side of the hall."

Why cannot others go and do likewise? "The gold and silver are the Lord's," and they that do the Lord's work ought not to be crippled for money.

TEMPERANCE TEMPLE ITEMS.

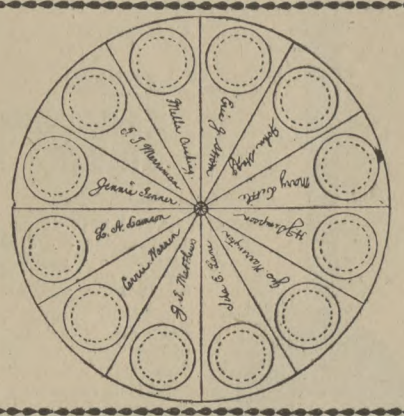
BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

All things, whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive.—Matt. 21:22.

One hundred thousand dollars, or one-third of the amount which we are desirous of raising by January 1, has been subscribed or paid outright, and another $1,000 received yesterday gives us a start on our second $100,000. The past week we received a subscription of $1,000 from Mr. Wm. G. Hibbard, Chicago; $1,000 from a friend in Chicago, who does not desire his name given to the public until later; $500 from Mr. Joshua L. Mills, Mount Palatine, Ill. Besides the amount above subscribed, Mr. Mills gave $100 to place in Willard Hall the name of his beloved daughter, Edith A. Mills, a devoted white-ribboner, who has passed from earth's shadows into heaven's glory. Mr. Mills was not solicited for the above amount; it was his own freewill offering. He is not a man of large means, but he loves the cause of Christ and temperance. He said to me: "You women must own this Temple, and I am going to do all I can to help you." Would that more of our temperance brothers were of the same mind as our good Quaker friend, Mr. Mills.

$11,000 HAS BEEN RECEIVED FROM WHEELS.....



36,000 WHEELS ARE OUT; SPIN THEM BACK QUICK, SISTERS.

Forty-five thousand Wheels have been sent out, and as yet but nine thousand have been returned filled. We trust as the unions take up their fall work the Wheels will be pushed with vigor. Miss Willard, when she left us in the early spring for England, sent out a letter of appeal to seven thousand five hundred unions, asking them to push the work of the Wheels vigorously. When she returns to us the 1st of October, let us cheer her heart by showing her we have had respect for her request by sending in a large number of filled Wheels, as well as orders for them from unions that have not yet been heard from.

Mrs. F. J. Grim lives in Franklin Grove, Ill., a small village of probably five hundred inhabitants, yet this plucky, energetic woman has sent for a hundred Wheels, and has already returned more than half of them filled. She writes: "I find one thing is necessary: when one wants a thing, go and ask for it; refusal does not hurt long, and the majority don't refuse. All that is needed to raise the desired amount for the Temple is to find those willing to go out and ask for the money. The people are in sympathy as soon as the plan is introduced and you get them interested." Miss A. N. Gilmore, Steubenville, O., returns three filled Wheels, one by the teachers in the high school, and two by the scholars. Mrs. M. E. Palmer, Hudson, South Dakota, returns four filled Wheels. One is a Cable Wheel, filled entirely by the Cable family. Ella Turner, of Fairview farm, Elgin, Ill., has filled a Wheel by blacking shoes. A little, ten-year old boy, Jay Egar, of Chicago, earned the money to fill his Wheel by selling vegetables.

The Ravenna, O., W. C. T. U., has sent $5, to be credited on the Mary Woodbridge tablet. Mrs. Mary M. Farwell sends $5 for the Redlands, Cal., W. C. T. U. Mrs. Nannie Clark sends $50 for the Frankfort, Ind., W. C. T. U., to be credited on a pledge of $100 for the county. Mrs. E. E. Crosby sends $23, to be credited on the pledge of the Dickinson, N. Y., union. The Y. W. C. T. U. of Terre Haute, Ill., sends $20, and there are only six members in the union. Mrs. Frances A. Olmstead sends $20 on the pledge of the Burlington, Vt., W. C. T. U., making $60 paid, largely through the indefatigable efforts of Mrs. Olmstead. Seventeen dollars is sent by Mrs. L. M. Smith, from the Pawcatuck, Conn., union, to be applied on the pledge of the New London county W. C. T. U. Mrs. N. B. Hunt sends $10, to be applied on the pledge of the Sudbury, Mass., W. C. T. U. Mrs. S. D. Conley sends $10 for the Cannon Falls, Minn., W. C. T. U. This union is small, but the members are hard at work doing their best to raise $100 for the Temple. Six dollars and thirty-one cents comes through Mrs. Helen E. Bliss, from the Clyde, New York, W. C. T. U. This makes $43.58 this union has paid on its pledge.

All orders for Temple Wheels, mite-boxes and Baby Band lists, and everything pertaining to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, the Temple, Chicago. Send two-cent stamp for either the Temple Wheel or mite-box. Money orders and checks should be made out in the name of Mr. G. B. Shaw, treasurer, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, Room 1111, The Temple, Chicago.

Convention Corner.

MUSIC HALL.

Music Hall, Baltimore, the place selected for the meeting of the National W. C. T. U., October 18–23, compares most favorably with some of the finest buildings of the kind in the country. The size and conveniences of the Auditorium, which is said to be the largest, handsomest and best appointed in the South, the number and arrangement of the other halls, of the dressing rooms, lavatories, passages, exits (sixteen in number), etc., commend it at once to popular favor.

The seating capacity of the main hall is three thousand, of the assembly hall five hundred, of the lecture and social halls four hundred each, and of the banquet hall three hundred.

The building is provided with electric lights, the heating and ventilating apparatus is said to be complete, and the acoustics fine.

The location is between Mt. Royal and Maryland avenues, near their junction, in a comparatively new neighborhood, and there are entrances on both avenues. Two lines of electric cars pass the door and the Blue Line cable is within a short distance.

Music Hall was first opened to the public October 31, 1894. It still lacks the handsome semi-circular front which is part of the design. This mars the effect of the building in appearance, and deprives the general plan of the interior of a striking and unusual feature, but interferes in no way with the objects for which the building is intended to be used. No structure in the city can compare with it at all for convention purposes.

"Do you want a boy?" he asked of the magnate of the office, standing before him cap in hand. "Nobody wants a boy," replied the magnate. "Do you need a boy?" asked the applicant, nowise abashed. "Nobody needs a boy." The boy would not give up. "Well, say, mister," he inquired, "do you have to have a boy?" The magnate collapsed. "I'm sorry to say we do," he said, "and I guess you're about what we want."

"Gran'ma," said little four-year-old Austin, as he twined his arms lovingly about his grandmother's neck, "you'll never know how much I love you till you have a child of your own."

Sylvia (aged three) was watching for the first time the unharnessing of the horse. When all was removed except the bridle (with its blinders) she remarked, "Now take his glasses off."

"My book on finance," said the exponent of the money question, "will be in the form of fiction." "Ah," said his political opponent, sneering in a mean way, "I don't see why you should take the trouble to tell that."

She was in the dimly lighted reception room of a city drygoods store, and walking up to a tall mirror placed against the wall remarked: "Why, how came you here?" Then observing some surprise, not to say amusement, on the faces of the other occupants of the room, she saw her mistake and explained in great confusion, "I thought it was my sister; we're twins."

Johnny Green, at school, was asked by his teacher: "If I gave you three cakes and your mother gave you four and your aunt gave you five, how many cakes would you have?"

"Huh!" said Johnny, "I guess I should have enough!"

"Well," muttered the collector as he sank wearily into a chair and turned to his employer, "there is one old saying that I can vouch for."

"What is it?"

"The one that says, 'You never find a man out till you trust him.'"

"No, Maude, dear, the birds do not try to keep warm in winter by roosting in fir trees."

Professor (to his wife) "Elsie, I have promised to deliver an address to-morrow evening on 'The Rational Exercise of the Memory.' Don't let me forget about it."

Patriotism is not pat-riot-ism, it is not the mob.

"Now, children," said the teacher, "what do you call the meal that you eat in the morning?" "Oatmeal!" promptly replied a member of the class.

NEW CURE FOR KIDNEYS AND BLADDER.

We are glad to announce to sufferers from kidney and bladder diseases, pain in back, and rheumatism, that the new botanic discovery, Alkavis, is pronounced a positive cure for these maladies. Many of its cures are certainly wonderful, and we advise our readers to send name and address to the Church Kidney Cure Company, 418 Fourth Avenue, New York, who will send you treatment free by mail postpaid. It costs you nothing.

Mrs. Smith—"I declare! This leg of mutton has shrunk away almost to nothing." Willie Smith—"Perhaps, mamma, it came off the same sheep as my flannels did."

"Miss, you can't bring dogs into the car," said a Third Avenue conductor to a young woman who tenderly held a wriggling little object wrapped up in a shawl.

"Tain't a dog," snapped the young woman, and the discomfited conductor retreated to the rear platform amid a general titter. He studied the case for a few minutes and then returning to the young woman said: "Miss, you can't bring cats in neither."

"Tain't a cat," said the young woman, "it's a rabbit," and the long ears emerged in confirmation of her assertion. At this the conductor looked puzzled for a moment and then said: "Well, that's accordin' to the rules of the company; dogs is dogs and cats is dogs; but rabbits is insects, so you can stay."

There is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from 10 drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address,

Home Hints.

Before filling the salt-cellars for table use, dry the salt thoroughly by putting for a little while in the warming oven. Roll it, and mix with it a very little cornstarch. You will then have no trouble with clogged salt-cellars, however damp the atmosphere.

To prevent the fading of colors in wash goods, make a strong solution of salt and hot water, about one-half cup of salt to two gallons of water. Put the garment in this solution while it is very hot, and let stand until it is cold. Wring out and dry. They may then be washed without danger of fading.

To test eggs place them in water. The good ones will turn, large end up; the bad ones will float.

If lamp burners are boiled in strong soap suds about once a month, and the wicks thoroughly washed and dried there will be no trouble with smoky lamps.

Small bags of orris powder have superseded the old-fashioned lavender with many persons for perfuming bed linen and underclothing. They are also very dainty to use inside dress-linings and anywhere that sachet powder is desired.

When milk boils over or anything is spilled on the hot stove, the suffocating smoke may be dispelled by sprinkling the spot with salt.

A teacher of dressmaking in one of our largest educational institutions, gives these directions for shrinking spool cotton, so that the puckering and drawing of seams in wash goods may be avoided. Soak the spool of thread over night in water, let it dry and it is ready for use. She also says to oil colored thread thoroughly with machine oil to make it stronger and have it work more smoothly.

A general rule in canning fruit is to use one-third of a pound of sugar to a pound of fruit. Always use a porcelain lined kettle, and when necessary stir fruit either with a wooden or a silver spoon, never with an iron one.

Old silk handkerchiefs make the best dusters for the piano, and other highly polished or delicate woods. There is nothing better than cheese cloth for general use.

Salted almonds and peanuts:—Melt a tablespoonful of butter in a pan, and stir into it a cupful of peanuts. Roast on top of stove or in the oven, shaking until they are hot and slightly colored. Remove to sheets of paper, sprinkle with salt and dry in a warm place.

To take out fruit stains from table linen and other white goods, stretch the stained part over the top of a bowl and pour on boiling water. The spots will immediately fade away.

Cantaloupes are much more relishable when served very cold, but it is a mistake to fill them with chipped ice, as it injures the flavor.

Do not turn roasting meat with a fork, as piercing it lets the juice out. Use either a spoon or a griddle-cake turner.

A solution of gum arabic made into a paste with plaster of paris is a delicate cement for porcelain and china. A cement the consistency of putty, made with litharge and glycerine, will fasten lamp tops and standards, fill cracks in iron kettles, close seams in leaky pans, cement iron, etc., and is impervious to heat or moisture.—The Household.

Lamps burned with but little oil in them generate a gas which is liable at any moment to explode. Fill lamps to within half an inch of the top. If filled full, the oil will leak out, and cover the lamp so that when lighted, through heat expansion the oil will run over and grease everything near.

A lady was asked how she managed to keep drinking water cool without a refrigerator or ice. She replied that "she set it in the sun." "In the—what?" "Yes, I mean it. I have one of those porous Mexican jars, and when the sun shines the water evaporates so rapidly that what is left is deliciously cool in a short time." It would be a good thing if more people owned and used these jars, thus doing away with the injurious effects of ice-water.

Publisher's Notes

SPECIAL OFFER.

Good to October 1.

From August 15 to October 1, with every cash order of literature or subscriptions amounting to $5, we will give a copy of "A Wheel Within a Wheel; or, How I Learned to Ride a Bicycle," by Miss Frances E. Willard.

For every cash order of literature or subscriptions amounting to $10, we will give a copy of "A Great Mother," a sketch of Madam Willard. "One of the noblest incentives to true motherhood this age has seen."

THUMB-NAIL SKETCHES.

We have received from the W. T. P. A. (publishers), one of the above named valuable, beautifully illustrated books. Its short, comprehensive sketches of prominent W. C. T. U. women makes its a valuable acquisition to every white-ribboner's library. It is filled with speaking likenesses of these women, so finely executed that one must say every face is handsome. We are sure if you send to the W. T. P. A., The Temple, for one of these books you will be delighted with it.—Ohio Messenger.

The season of conventions is at hand. Are you making a choice selection of music from the White Ribbon Hymnal? Good, thrilling, hearty music will give life to your gatherings, and a liberal supply of books is a necessity. Until October 1 we will sell these at $3 per dozen; $1.50 per half dozen for cash only. There surely will not be a better opportunity to supply your union, and a five or ten cent contribution from each member will help the "good cause" amazingly. The National Woman's Christian Temperance Union owns a large number of these Hymnals, and if each state convention would have a good supply on hand always, is it not wise to own them at such a trifling cost?

"Lift to Him thy heart, beloved,
Though a thousand needs may press,
He ten thousand blessings sendeth;
Courage, trust His faithfulness."

This beautiful verse is from the tiniest of booklets, entitled "Birthday Blessings." Price only five cents.

TO NEWLY APPOINTED SUPERINTENDENTS OF LITERATURE:

If you will send to us notification of your appointment signed by the PRESIDENT or SECRETARY of your union, we will promptly send stickers and other credentials.

If you are going to the National Convention and would enjoy it to the utmost, put in your extension sachel a copy of the White Ribbon Hymnal. Price 35 cents.

Are there not six members of your union who would like a copy of the White Ribbon Hymnal?

We have a limited number of copies of the Fair Number which we are ready to close out at $1.50 per hundred, cash in all cases to accompany the order.

Do you wish to give your school friend an inexpensive but appropriate birthday remembrance? If so, send five cents for "Another Birthday."

PREMIUM OFFER.

At the request of those who know the power of song, we repeat our most popular premium offer of a copy of the "White Ribbon Hymnal" for one new yearly subscriber to THE UNION SIGNAL. The offer will hold good to October 1, when it will be withdrawn.

AN UNPARALLELED OFFER.

From August 15 to October 1, we will send to all unions eight dollars' worth of leaflets for five dollars, cash to accompany the order. This is your opportunity to do many times eight dollars' worth of good for five dollars. Can you afford to miss it?

Now is your opportunity to obtain the beautiful aquarelle picture of Miss Willard. Just what you need for your union. From now to October 1 you can secure it for twenty cents, postpaid. Order early.

AMONG THE MAGAZINES.

ST. NICHOLAS' gay cover peeps out encouragingly amid the more soberly dressed magazines of the month and its most delectable bill of fare will cheer the rest hours of this first school month. Its list of stories, poems, instructive articles and illustrated jingles for the little ones never grows tame, and as we turn the varied pages we are glad that here is one bright stream at which young thirsty minds may drink without fear of poison, in the shape of unhealthy thoughts.

SCRIBNER'S for September begins another series of articles from the pen of Robert Grant, on "The Art of Living." The theme of the current issue is "The Case of Man," an amusing, incisive consideration of the present relations between man and woman as compared with those of past decades. With impartial pen he lays bare the extreme faults and foibles of either sex, touching with keen intuition woman's share in the reforms of the day, and the scope of the work she would see done at "one fell swoop" were it possible for her suddenly to realize her hopes.

The September CHAUTAUQUAN is full of good things for the reading that comes so acceptable in these first days of the cool "fall." A fine portrait of Henry W. Grady prepares one for the interesting sketch of this citizen and patriot, by Clark Howell, managing editor of the Atlanta Constitution. "The Dominion of Canada," by W. H. Withrow, D. D., gives refreshing glimpses at the rare scenery of the St. Lawrence valley. "Fresh Air Work in New York City," by William H. Tolman, Ph.D., is a story, better than any fiction, for it tells how the children of the poor are helped to some good times in God's fresh air. Mrs. Emily Huntington Miller contributes a brief but directly practical article on "The Ideal Hostess." A striking story by Martha Young is "A Boy of To-day," a character study.

A leading article in THE MISSIONARY REVIEW OF THE WORLD for September, "The Year 1895 in Japan," by Rev. George William Knox, D. D., from which we quote the following comprehensive statements: "For the first time in the modern era a non-Christian nation takes position abreast of the states of Europe and America. At last an Oriental people demonstrate their ability to care for themselves, and their fitness to be taken seriously. . . . One Oriental nation not only defends itself, but makes its influence felt beyond its bounds. It is courted as an ally and feared as a foe. It has mastered the mechanism of war; its troops can march, shoot, fight; its commissariat is amply supplied; its medical service meets modern scientific requirements; its ordnance is of the latest pattern; everything is foreseen, provided for and well carried out. . . . So Japan proclaims itself master of its own destiny. Without interference it will work out its own salvation or its own ruin. It only, of all, dares claim a career of its own."

The September FORUM presents a timely article from Hon. Theodore Roosevelt, president of the board of police commissioners of New York city, entitled, "The Enforcement of Law." At the outset Mr. Roosevelt states the proposition: "The question at issue in New York city just at present is much more important than the question of a more or less liberal Sunday excise law. The question is as to whether public officials are to be true to their oaths of office and see that the law is administered in good faith." The following narration of the experience of Commissioner Roosevelt on entering the arena is interesting and significant: "On entering office we found—what indeed had long been a matter of common notoriety—that various laws, and notably the excise law, were enforced rigidly against people who had no political pull, but were not enforced at all against the men who had a political pull, or who possessed sufficient means to buy off the high officials who controlled, or had influence in the police department. All that we did was to enforce these laws, not against some wrong-doers, but honestly and impartially against all wrong-doers. We did not resurrect dead laws; we did not start a crusade to enforce blue laws. All that we did was to take a law which was very much alive, but which had been used only for purposes of blackmail, and to do away entirely with the blackmail feature by enforcing it equitably as regards all persons. Looked at soberly, this scarcely seems a revolutionary proceeding, and still less does it seem like one which needs an elaborate justification."

has been brought out by our beloved Chieftain at her own expense, and is placed upon the American market by the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association that it may aid white-ribboners in the "all-round movement" it advocates.

"Everything is not in the temperance reform, but the temperance reform should be in everything."

"'Organized mother love' is the best definition of the white-ribbon movement, and it can have no better motto than, 'Make a chain, for the land is full of bloody crimes and the city of violence.'"

"If we can remember this simple rule, it will do much to unravel the mystery of the much controverted 'do everything policy,' viz.: That every question of practical philanthropy or reform has its temperance aspect, and with that we are to deal."

These extracts from the preface will suggest the helpfulness of the new manual. It should be purchased by unions in quantities at the nominal price of 25c.

Signal Notes.

EVEN in "hard times," 1894, the consumption of the "filthy weed" in the United States amounted to twenty-eight million dollars.

FROM thirty per cent (the non-tobacco users) of the Cambridge, England, students, come nine-tenths of the honor winners—a telling fact.

A BOSTON street car company sent twenty thousand free tickets for distribution among the charitable institutions of the city, a worthy example.

THE French Association for the Advancement of Science, in annual conference at Bordeaux last month, has published a warning against alcoholism.

SIR B. W. RICHARDSON, himself an enthusiastic cyclist, points out the danger of overexertion on the wheel in an article in September Review of Reviews.

THERE are two hundred and thirty societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals and children in the United States and Canada, with a membership of a million.

SIR WILLIAM VERNON HARCOURT, though defeated in Derby, was returned to Parliament on a temperance platform by a majority of seven thousand from West Monmouth.

OF the world's stock of gold, four billion dollars, France owns the largest amount per capita, $36.70; Italy, the Netherlands, the United States and Portugal follow in the order named.

A CURIOUS coincidence occurred in the recent Canadian parliament that every member who spoke against raising the age of consent also voted against woman suffrage—both bills being defeated.

THE rise and fall of values of brewery stock in England, with the forward or retrograde movement of the Direct Veto Bill, shows that the liquor interests have been affected by the bill in a way that tells.

A MOVEMENT has been inaugurated to raise ten thousand dollars for a "John N. Stearns memorial fund" the interest of which is to be used in missionary work among the colored people of the South.

THE Queen of Madagascar who so strenuously opposed the introduction of liquor-selling into her kingdom some years ago, now announces that she would rather perish than survive the ruin and slavery of the Hovas by the French.

IT is pleasing to learn that an attempt to introduce the Spanish bull fight in the United States, at Gillette, Col., has resulted in a practical failure. The animals, although goaded by the attendants, refused to fight, and the five thousand people who paid admission were deservedly deprived of a barbaric exhibition.

REV. DR. DANIEL STEELE has made a suggestion in a public article that might well be considered by progressive ministers of the Methodist church. He says that John Wesley always taught that class-leaders should be members of the official board and quarterly conference. As the custom is now, this board is likely to be made up of wealthy laymen not remarkable for their spiritual power, and if the pastor who has the right to do so were to appoint several women class-leaders there would be by this means infused into these important groups of persons who manage the affairs of the local churches and the quarterly conference an element which is precisely what they most need. The suggestion seems excellent, and it comes from one of the most honored and trusted members of the church, which is now universally conceded to be the largest in the United States.

CHARLES N. CRITTENTON has already founded seventeen Florence Crittenton homes in the United States, most of which are under the auspices of the white ribbon women. Mother Prindle and Mrs. Edholm are his chief co-workers and participated in the recent World's W. C. T. U. Convention in London. They have been in counsel with Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Willard relative to the opening of a midnight mission in London, and Mr. Crittenton will go to England in a few months to superintend the opening of this home. He has purchased a beautiful Pullman car, and is about to make railway tours, in America, to the different cities that he thinks are in especial need of purity work, and in which such homes should be established. Eight or ten helpers go with him and they will address their audiences from the platform of the car. The railway companies furnish free transportation with light and fuel. This is a method of spreading a good propaganda that might well be emulated by Christian workers generally.

IN TIME OF NEED.

"Have you a copy of the Birthday Book?" "Have you an extra silver pin?" were two questions asked us frequently on the outward-bound steamer, and it occurred to us that no white-ribboner should start from home without these essentials. Fountain pens were pressed into service constantly, and the possessor of a Birthday Book had an air of conscious superiority as she saw her neighbor asking for autographs on an ordinary pad of paper. Just what you need at state, county and National conventions is the White Ribbon Birthday Book.

A prominent literary woman who has read Miss Willard's experience in riding a bicycle, and who is indulging in the fascinating exercise, expresses the opinion that every mother should place in the hands of the son or daughter who owns a bicycle this most delightful book—not so much for the mastery of the art as the mastery of one's self.
